WSJournal Says McGuire's Downfall Could Add Fuel To Options Scandals. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, 2.03M) editorializes, "William McGuire, with his $1 billion-plus portfolio of unexercised stock-options, was a poster-child for the backdating scandal even before his ouster as CEO of UnitedHealth over the weekend. And if history is any guide, the claiming of a scalp this large will only add fuel to a pyre that is already licking at the heels of several even better-known CEOs, notably Apple's Steve Jobs." The Journal adds, "Accounting rules and SEC regulations are not things to be flouted lightly, even when they appear arbitrary or even harmful. In the end, though, it may have been Dr. McGuire's lack of honesty with the board that proved his undoing. … Just as top executives at public companies shouldn't set their own pay, they should not engage in side financial dealings with those who do. More so than the backdating allegations, this undisclosed conflict of interest seems to have been Dr. McGuire's hanging offense. On the other hand, UnitedHealth's stock was down 2.5% yesterday after the story broke, suggesting that Mr. McGuire's ouster was not the benediction shareholders were looking for."

More Fallout From Options Scandal Expected. The AP (10/17, Freed) reports, "The shake-up at UnitedHealth Group Inc. – whose top executive will step down no later than Dec. 1 – adds to the list of corner-office victims of stock option backdating." The AP continues, "Faced with an independent report that found widespread problems with the way UnitedHealth issued stock options, the nation's second-largest health insurer said Sunday that chairman and CEO William McGuire will leave the board immediately and leave the company no later than Dec. 1. .. .In addition, board member William G. Spears will resign, and General Counsel David J. Lubben will retire." The AP adds, "So far, at least 30 senior executives or directors at 16 companies with stock option problems have resigned or been fired. .. .There may be many more to come: At least 135 companies have disclosed Securities and Exchange Commission, Department of Justice or internal investigations according to an Associated Press review."

Comverse CEO Faces Additional Charges. The New York Law Journal (10/17, Bar) reports, "Eastern District of New York prosecutors last week filed a superseding indictment against Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander, accusing the former Comverse Technology chief executive of new charges that include obstructing justice." The Journal continues, "Alexander, who had been accused of creating a secret slush fund for backdated options and evading the requirements of the company's stock option plans, is now charged with offering 'another person' millions of dollars as a bribe to falsely take sole responsibility for the scheme." The Journal adds, "The government said Alexander first offered the unnamed individual $2 million, then $5 million, and then stated, in substance, 'name your price.' … Alexander was a fugitive for more than a month before being discovered in Namibia. He faces extradition back to the United States." The Journal notes, "The additional charges against him came the same week the government filed papers saying it was engaged in plea negotiations with two other former Comverse executives facing criminal charges in connection with the backdating scheme. The Eastern District U.S. Attorney has until Nov. 8 to decide whether to indict David Kreinberg, Comverse's chief financial officer, and William Sorin, its former general counsel."

Labor Department Sues Agway's Retirement Savings Plan. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, D3, Matthews) reports, "The Labor Department has filed suit against trustees of bankrupt agricultural cooperative Agway Inc.'s employee retirement-savings plan, charging the plan's fiduciaries improperly invested $50 million of the assets. According to the lawsuit, 47 members of Agway's investment committee, administration and the company's board allegedly valued the company's stock at prices higher than market value and gave plan participants false information about the investment. The Labor Department said the suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of New York, seeks a court order to require the defendants to restore the $50 million in losses along with interest and to forfeit any benefits if all losses suffered by the plan aren't restored."

DOJ_NMG_0081980

Hedge Fund Market Has Expanded In Recent Years. The New York Times (10/17, Anderson) reports, "The hedge fund business has exploded in recent years, with more than 9,000 funds now managing more than $1.2 trillion for pension funds, endowments and wealthy individuals. Part of the appeal to these sophisticated investors is the funds' greater freedom to bet on different markets, including exotic and risky investments. Many institutional investors use them to diversify their portfolios. These funds are paid enormous fees — typically, 2 percent of the assets they manage and 20 percent of the profits — for the bets they make that pay off." Hedge funds "have come to dominate certain riskier segments of corporate lending, including the second-lien loan market. In this market, if a borrower defaults, the primary lender gets repaid before the secondary lender; in exchange for shouldering this risk, that second-lien lender earns a higher interest rate from the borrower. The Times notes that "in the first half of this year, companies borrowed $12.4 billion in second-lien loans, an increase of 195 percent over the same period in 2003."

Schnitzer Settles Overseas Corruption Charges With SEC. Dow Jones (10/17, Hughes) reports, "Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. (SCHN), a provider of scrap metal, will pay $7.7 million to settle allegations that it made improper cash payments or gave gifts to managers of government-owned steel mills in China in order to win business, federal regulators said on Monday." Dow Jones continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission said that the Portland, Ore., company settled without admitting or denying wrongdoing. Schnitzer will give up $6.3 million in alleged profits and pay interest of $1.4 million to resolve the allegations." Dow Jones adds, "Schnitzer was accused of making the payments from at least 1999 through 2004, on its own behalf and on behalf of Japanese steel companies for whom it acted as a broker. The SEC said that Schnitzer's South Korean subsidiary made the payments in violation of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, an antibribery law that has been in place for decades. … The SEC also said that Schnitzer paid bribes to managers of privately owned steel mills in both China and South Korea during the same period. … The SEC said its investigation is continuing, raising the possibility that executives will face SEC civil charges. The SEC also disclosed that it is working with the Justice Department in the case."

Freddie Mac Hires New Finance Chief. The Washington Post (10/17, D1, Hilzenrath, 748K) reports that mortgage finance giant Freddie Mac yesterday announced that it has hired Anthony S. Piszel, chief financial officer of Health Net Inc., as its new finance chief. Piszel will lead Freddie Mac's efforts to fix its financial systems in the wake if disclosures of billions of dollars of accounting errors. Piszel "will replace Martin F. Baumann, who left Freddie Mac in March. Freddie's president and chief operating officer, Eugene M. McQuade, has been doing the finance job since Baumann resigned."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Pledges To Study Increase In Urban Crime. In a widely distributed story, the AP (10/17) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales offered no new crime-fighting initiatives Monday, promising only to study local crime rates in selected cities to see why homicides and other violent criminal activity is on the rise nationally." The AP continues, "In a speech to the International Association of Chiefs of Police, Gonzales said the Justice Departments' role for now is to look for trends in gang violence, drug trafficking, and how inmates released from prison may have contributed to the increase. … Nationally, violent crime rose 2.2 percent last year, the first increase since 2001. … 'We need to figure out the whys behind the numbers -- whether the story is good or bad,' Gonzales said in a 16-minutes speech. He did not specify which cities would be studied." The AP adds, "He acknowledged that local law enforcement agencies have had more crime-fighting problems to juggle since the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks. 'It wasn't like we didn't have a full plate already,' he said. … Gonzales' speech was greeted by a standing ovation from the estimated 3,000 local and state police at the Boston convention."

The Boston Globe (10/17, Cramer) reports, "US Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales told law enforcement officials Monday that his office will study selected cities across the country where violent crime has surged." The Globe continues, "Gonzales Monday addressed the International Association of Chiefs of Police conference at the convention center in South Boston. The gathering, which thousands were expected to attend, ends tomorrow. Gonzales said he wanted to know why violent crime had increased slightly in 2005 compared with 2004. … Nationally, violent crime such as murder, rape, robbery, and aggravated assault rose 2.3 percent in 2005 from 2004, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report. … 'In addition, we have recent anecdotal reports that even in this year there may be a rise in violent crime in some areas,' Gonzales said, according to a copy of his speech. … The cities will be selected in the next few weeks and will include communities of differing sizes and regions of the country. … 'They will also include cities that have experienced significant increases in crime and significant decreases in crime,'said Tasia Scolinos, spokeswoman for the Justice Department. The purpose of picking such cities is to understand why some have managed to keep violent crime down, she said."

DOJ_NMG_0081981

McClatchy Newspapers (10/17, Taylor) reports, "While Gonzales said the review was important to determine the causes of what he described as a 'small uptick' in violent crime, he emphasized that the overall crime rate is the lowest in more than 30 years." McClatchy adds, "Some police organizations expressed disappointment that the initiative didn't include immediate financial help for local police departments struggling to make up for years of reductions in federal funding. … President George W. Bush's administration has cut grants for state and local crime-fighting programs on the grounds that they have outlived their usefulness or have underperformed."

Officer.com (10/17, Slepicka) reports, "The First General Assembly of the International Association of Chiefs of Police at their 113th Annual Conference in Boston featured United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff as keynote speakers." Officer.com continues, "Both had a strong message on what local law enforcement and their respective federal offices could do and should do together to combat terrorism. … 'Our shared responsibilities are vast. None of us can do it alone,' Gonzales said." Officer.com adds, "Both men spoke of improving the federal and local relationship. Since September 11, there is no more us versus them according to the Attorney General. He said it is clear that local law enforcement has many more officers on the street. 'There can be no question that we learn from you, that we support you and that we are a team.' … The terrorist front is fought every day by local state and federal law enforcement. Gonzales said we never know when a gas station holdup is in fact a funding operation for a terrorist group and it will more the likely be the local law enforcement that discovers the initial evidence to prove that. … Gonzales emphasized that massive responsibility to find the terrorists among us was added to the responsibilities to crack down own drugs, gangs, violent crime, and crimes against children. 'We have not had a terrorist attack on American soil in five years and that is a testament to you and the police forces that you lead.'"

CBS Evening News (10/16, story 7, 3:10, Couric) reported, "Violent crime in this country on the rise again, and today Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez says he's sending out investigators to find out why. According to the FBI, violent crime was up 2.3% in 2005. That's the first increase in four years. But by far, the biggest increase came in mid-sized cities with violent crime up four times the national average."

Local Television. At least nine local television newscasts reported that attorney general Alberto Gonzales told a convention of police chiefs in Boston that his department plans to study local crime rates in selected cities. In general, violent and murder crimes were characterized as rapidly growing. KELO-TV Sioux Falls, (10/16, 12:08 p.m.) broadcasted, "At a convention in Boston today, attorney general Alberto Gonzales talked about the commitment to fighting homicides and other violent crimes across the U.S. Nationally, violent crime rose more than two percent last year. This is the first increase in four years. The Justice Department plans to study local crime rates in selected cities to find out why violent crime is on the rise."

WFMZ-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 6:07 p.m.) broadcasted, "The Justice Department plans to study local crime rates, by looking for trends in selected cities. Attorney general Alberto Gonzales says the survey will look at a number of factors from trafficking to former prisoners returning to society."

WWLP-TV Springfield, MA, (10/16, 11:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzalez addressed a convention of police chiefs in Boston today. He said the justice department will study at least five U.S. cities to determine what's behind the recent spike in murder and other violent crime."

WBBH-TV Ft. Myers, (10/16, 5:27 p.m.) broadcasted, "They'll look at a number of factors including gang violence, drug trafficking, and former prisoners returning to society."

WJZ-TV Baltimore, (10/16, 6:43 p.m.) broadcasted, "Violent crime in this country on the rise again, and today attorney general Alberto Gonzalez says he's sending out investigators to find out why. According to the FBI, violent crime was up 2.3% in 2005."

DOJ_NMG_0081982

WTVD-TV Raleigh, (10/16, 5:33 p.m.) broadcasted, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales made no promises to the nation's police chiefs who are looking for help to combat a spike in crime. The nation's top cop spoke to the International Association of Chiefs of Police in Boston this morning."

KTBC-TV Austin, (10/16, 9:01 p.m.) broadcasted, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales said the Department of Justice will study rising crime rates nationally, but will not increase funding for cities to hire more police officers."

FBI Agents Search Homes Of Weldon's Daughter, Friend. In the ongoing investigation of Rep. Curt Weldon, FBI agents yesterday searched four locations in Philadelphia and two in Jacksonville, Fla., including the homes of Weldon's daughter, Karen, and Charles Sexton, who is his longtime friend and her business partner. The searches are being portrayed as a severe blow to GOP chances to retain control of Congress. NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 5, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Three weeks to go now to the mid-term elections, and tonight the FBI has raided the homes of a Pennsylvania Congressman's daughter and those of a close friend, in the midst of a close fight for re-election." NBC (Reid) added, "FBI and federal law enforcement sources say that they're looking into whether…Weldon used his position as a congressman to help obtain lucrative lobbying contracts for an old friend and for his daughter. … He denies any wrongdoing, but this could not possibly have come at a worse time for him because he is in the toughest fight for re-election he has ever had."

USA Today (10/17, 8A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports that a "federal law enforcement official said the probe focused on whether the congressman used improper influence to steer business to his daughter and…Sexton. … The congressman's properties were not among the locations searched, the official said." USA notes, "In 2004, a liberal watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, called on the Justice Department to examine whether Weldon violated federal law by assisting companies that hired his daughter as a lobbyist." The AP (10/17, Dale) reports, "Earlier Monday, Weldon called the investigation politically motivated and the timing suspect. … 'What I find ironic, if there is an investigation, is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election,' Weldon said at an appearance in Media. … Weldon said his daughter received no special consideration because of him." The AP notes, "Weldon, regarded by some as a foreign policy expert, has clashed at times with the Bush administration. In the last year, he has repeatedly said a secret military unit called 'Able Danger' used data mining to link four Sept. 11 hijackers to al-Qaida more than a year before the attacks. A Pentagon report rejected the idea."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, Blitzer, 7:07 p.m.) called the FBI searches "a new October surprise in the battle for Congress" and noted that Weldon is "blaming Democrats for the probe, three weeks before the American public votes." CNN (Bash) noted, "For all of his lashing at Democrats," Weldon acknowledged "that the Justice Department is run by a Republican administration. Weldon said, 'I'm not stupid. I may have offended people – I have been known to do that.'" The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Schmitt, Neubauer, 918K) also notes, "The raids are another political setback for the Republican Party as it struggles to maintain control of Congress." Under the headline "FBI Raid Deals New Blow To Republicans," the Financial Times (10/17, Sevastopulo) reports, "Republican control of Congress was further endangered on Monday after the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided" Karen Weldon's home. "Already reeling from increasing voter concerns about the Iraq war – which has claimed the lives of 2,749 soldiers and seen almost 21,000 US military casualties – Republicans have more recently been dogged by the revelation that Mark Foley…sent overly friendly e-mails to page boys in the House."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/17, Shiffman, Lipka, Kerkstra, 399K) reports, "In Center City, agents searched the law office of John Gallagher, a Weldon friend who has conducted extensive business in Russia and former Soviet Republics. … Sexton and Karen Weldon formed Solutions North America in 2002, and won $1 million in contracts from two Russian energy firms and a Serbian family with ties to Slobodan Milosevic. FBI agents in Jacksonville, Fla., raided the office of one of the Russian energy firms, Itera, and a private residence whose connection to the investigation was not disclosed."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (10/17, Leonnig, Smith, 748K) reports "sources familiar with the investigation" said that "a grand jury, impaneled in Washington in May, has obtained evidence gathered over at least four months through wiretaps of Washington area cellphone numbers and has scrutinized whether Weldon received anything of value." The Post notes, "Prosecutors are usually loath to conduct raids against a public official so close to an election. But some involved in the investigation debated whether holding off could also appear to have been influenced by the election, sources said."

DOJ_NMG_0081983

The New York Times (10/17, Johnston, 1.21M) reports, "Law enforcement officials said the investigation into Mr. Weldon had been under way for several months. They said the government had not confirmed the existence of the investigation or conducted the searches until after news organizations learned of them. McClatchy Newspapers first reported the inquiry on Saturday, and it is not known how it got the information."

Under the headline "FBI Ups Ante On Weldon," Roll Call (10/17, Bresnahan) reports, "Karen Weldon's firm, Solutions North America, received a $500,000 public relations contract to represent Itera in September 2002, including $170,000 in up-front money. The contract was inked just days before the elder Weldon rounded up 30 Members to attend a dinner at the Library of Congress" to honor Itera CEO Igor Makarov. "And despite the fact that the U.S. Trade and Development Agency had withdrawn an $868,000 grant to Itera several months earlier, Weldon praised Makarov and Itera in a…speech on the House floor." The Washington Times (10/17, Seper, 88K) also reports the story, under the headline "FBI Targets Weldon In Influence-Peddling Probe."

The Norristown (PA) Times-Herald (10/17, Bender) reports, "The congressman's staff had insisted Friday evening that 'there is no investigation' because they had not been contacted by the Justice Department or the FBI. Weldon spokesman Michael Puppio said Saturday that their attorneys were considering filing a defamation lawsuit against McClatchy Newspapers, which broke the story Friday night." The Times-Herald adds, "Weldon said Monday he believed the FBI raids were linked to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) and the left-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW). … Days before the story broke, a DCCC-funded mailer began circulating the district, accusing Weldon, vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, of using his position to 'help his lobbyist daughter win defense contracts potentially worth millions for her clients.'"

Local Television. At least five local television networks reported that the FBI raided the house of Congressman Curt Weldon's daughter, Karen, and a business partner as it is probes whether the Pennsylvania lawmaker used influence to help his daughter's company win lobbying contracts.

KYW-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 6:02 p.m.) broadcasted, "Authorities are trying to determine if Weldon improperly use his position to help his daughter and friend profit from lobbying and consulting contracts. Congressmen Curt Weldon says he does not know why the FBI searched the Queen Village home of his daughter, Karen, and Springfield home of her business partner Charles Sexton, a prominent republican leader. He only knows no one did anything wrong. 'My daughter has never done anything wrong and never would. She's an honest person.' FBI is trying to determine if Weldon pressured government officials to sign contracts with a Russian natural gas company that had hired Weldon's daughter as its lobbyist and consultant."

WCAU-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 5:28 p.m.) broadcasted, "The FBI raids the homes and company office of Congressman Curt Weldon's daughter and her business partner. They are investigating whether Weldon used influence to help his daughter and her partner get lucrative contracts for their business."

.WBRE-TV Wilkes Barre, (10/16, 11:20 p.m.) broadcasted, "There is political trouble for Pennsylvania Congressman Curt Weldon. Federal agents raided the homes of Weldon's daughter and a close friend. Sources say investigators are looking into whether Weldon used his influence to help his daughter's company win lobbying contracts."

WPVI-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 5:34 p.m.) broadcasted, "A powerful local Congressman is under fire tonight. The FBI is investigating how Republican Curt Weldon used his influence."

WFMZ-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 6:15 p.m.) broadcasted, "Another Republican Congressman is under investigation with only three weeks left until Election Day. The FBI is looking into whether Pennsylvania congressman Curt Weldon improperly helped his daughter and a close friend win lobbying and consulting contracts. Today the bureau raided the homes of Weldon's daughter and friend. Six locations in all were searched. Weldon describes the investigation as politically motivated and he questions the timing."

WCAU-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 6:01 p.m.) broadcasted, "Congressman Weldon calls the investigation politically motivated. He says he was totally shocked by the probe and the Justice Department has yet to contact him."

DOJ_NMG_0081984

More Commentary. The Delaware County (PA) Daily News (10/17) editorializes, "Is U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon a crook? That was the question on everyone's lips Monday as word spread that the FBI had raided the homes of his daughter, Karen; a key political confidante, Springfield GOP leader Charles Sexton; a Philadelphia attorney and a Florida business. … The feds are investigating the role of the 10-term incumbent 7th District Republican from Thornbury in the creation of an international consulting firm run by Karen Weldon and Sexton - and how it quickly won some $1 million in contracts from foreign entities tied to the congressman." The Daily News continues, "The story was embraced by a left-leaning government watchdog group called Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), which called Weldon's actions 'possibly criminal' and asked the U.S. Justice Department two years ago to investigate. Until this weekend, there was no indication that the feds were complying with that request. … That hasn't stopped Weldon from claiming that politics is behind the investigation - and the fact that it became public three weeks before the toughest election day in his career. Still, there is no indication that his Democrat opponent, retired Navy Adm. Joe Sestak, or his allies have anything to do with the probe, or the leak about its existence." The Daily News concludes, "In all likelihood, Monday's search warrants were executed because word of the probe had leaked over the weekend. Agents usually act in cases like this to preserve evidence that could potentially be destroyed. Cartons of documents were removed from the target sites Monday, and no one who knows what the FBI has is talking. … In all, the situation is eerily reminiscent of developments during the 2003 re-election campaign of Philadelphia Mayor John Street. An FBI bug was found in the ceiling of his office weeks before the mayor faced a strong challenge from Republican Sam Katz. Street and his allies - citing the Republicans in charge of the Justice Department - cried politics and won re-election handily. It probably helped that Street was a Democrat. … So, the question remains: Is Curt Weldon a crook? The bottom line is, nobody knows. And, unfortunately, voters will have to make their decision on Nov. 7 before any firm determination can be made."

Attorney For Doolittle In Talks With Justice Department. The Sacramento Bee (10/17, Whitney) reports, "Rep. John Doolittle acknowledged Monday that his lawyer, whom he has paid more than $38,000 in the last two months, is talking with the Justice Department about the congressman's relationship with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The Bee continues, "The Washington Post and other papers, citing unnamed sources, have said the Roseville Republican and Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., are under investigation in the Abramoff matter." The Bee adds, "Doolittle's office in a statement late Monday, again insisted that the congressman is not under investigation. … Instead, it characterized the meetings as an effort to clear the congressman's name. … 'The congressman's attorney has had several conversations with the Justice Department which we believe have been helpful toward clearing the congressman's name,' said Laura Blackann. … 'The congressman's attorney has committed to the Justice Department that in order to preserve the integrity of the ongoing investigation, details of their interactions will remain private,' she said. 'To date, the congressman has not been contacted or questioned by the Justice Department and has no reason to believe that he is the target of an investigation.' … Blackann said Doolittle 'instructed his attorney to establish contact with the Justice Department to further express the congressman's willingness to be helpful and satisfy the Justice Department that the congressman has done nothing wrong.'"

The AP (10/17, Werner) reports, "Doolittle, a conservative eight-term incumbent and member of the House GOP leadership, has numerous ties to Abramoff, whom he has described as a good friend. Doolittle accepted campaign cash from Abramoff, helped his tribal clients in dealings with the Interior Department, and helped the lobbyist win a contract from the Northern Mariana Islands by endorsing a sympathetic island politician. … Doolittle's wife, Julie Doolittle, was paid a retainer by Abramoff for event planning work from 2002 to 2004. … The ties between Doolittle and Abramoff have caught the interest of government prosecutors, The Associated Press has reported. More than two years ago Julie Doolittle was subpoenaed for documents in connection with the probe."

FBI Seeks Public's Help In Wales Murder Investigation. Under the headline "Five Years After Killing Of Prosecutor, A Stumped FBI Asks The Public for Help," the Washington Post (10/17, A3, Harden, 748K) reports, "Alone in the basement of his house and sitting in front his computer monitor, Thomas C. Wales was shot to death…five years ago. … But after interviewing more than 4,000 people in all 50 states and half a dozen countries, after chasing down about 1,800 silver gun barrels of a kind that ballistics experts say was affixed to the shooter's pistol and after abruptly transferring control of the investigation out of the Seattle office of the FBI, law enforcement officials still cannot say for certain whether Wales was killed because he was a prosecutor. Instead…an FBI task force leader insisted last week that the case has not gone cold, and authorities released for the first time a composite sketch of a 'person of some interest' who was seen wandering around Wales's neighborhood…before the killing." Portland SAC Robert Jordan "stressed, using the same words twice, that the Wales case 'remains a very significant investigation.' That emphasis comes on the heels of what appears to have been a manpower dispute in the inquiry. In May, an FBI supervisor in Seattle reduced by two the number of agents assigned to the case. In June, after reports of squabbling inside the bureau, the case was shifted to the FBI's Portland office and beefed up with more investigators."

DOJ_NMG_0081985

Betonsports Strikes Tentative Deal With Federal Prosecutors. Bloomberg (10/17, Harris, Israel) reports, "Betonsports Plc., the British Internet bookmaker indicted in the U.S. for illegal gambling, has reached a preliminary deal with prosecutors to end a civil suit seeking to ban the company from doing business in the U.S." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. District Judge Carol Jackson in St. Louis granted the parties one week to complete what Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Fagan said was a 21-page accord resolving a civil suit filed against the company in July by the Justice Department. … 'My impression is there are no substantive disagreements,' Fagan told Jackson today. A temporary order barring Betonsports from doing business in the U.S. has been in place since July 17. Neither side disclosed terms of the preliminary agreement in court." Bloomberg adds, "On July 17, prosecutors also unsealed a 22-count indictment charging Betonsports founder Gary Kaplan, former Chief Executive Officer David Carruthers and nine others with racketeering and violating federal interstate gambling laws. In 2003, the company's Web site, Betonsports.com, had 100,000 active players who placed 33 million wagers worth more than $1.6 billion, the U.S. has said. … Carruthers, 48, was arrested in July as he changed planes at a Texas airport. He pleaded not guilty and is currently under house arrest in St. Louis. Kaplan is still at large. Six other defendants have pleaded innocent."

Former FDA Chief To Plead Guilty To Conflict Of Interest Charge. CBS Evening News (10/16, story 5, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "An old lie is back to haunt the former head of the Food and Drug Administration. His lawyer says Lester Crawford will plead guilty tomorrow to failing to disclose that he continued to hold stock in companies that are regulated by the FDA. He could face a year in prison on each of the two counts." The Wall Street Journal (10/17, A3, Mathews, 2.03M) says Crawford "will plead guilty to two misdemeanors for failing to properly disclose stock ownership and violating conflict-of-interest rules while he was at the agency." The Journal adds, "The companies named in the charges -- shares of which were owned by Dr. Crawford and/or his wife during years when he served at a high level in the FDA -- include soft-drink and snacks company PepsiCo Inc.; Kimberly-Clark Corp., which sells some medical devices; Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and food distributor Sysco Corp. Dr. Crawford also held stock options in Embrex Inc., an agricultural biotechnology company on whose board he once served." He "exercised some of the options while at the FDA, the Justice Department said."

The New York Times (10/17, Saul, 1.21M) reports Crawford, "now a senior staff member at the Washington lobbying and communications firm Policy Directions, could not be reached for comment." But "his lawyer, Ms. Van Gelder, said the fact that the charges were misdemeanors reflected Dr. Crawford's having amended his financial forms after his departure, making a full disclosure."

The Washington Post (10/17, A19, Kaufman, 748K) reports, "Crawford's short tenure as commissioner was best known for his August 2005 decision to postpone action on the "morning after" contraceptive Plan B. He had earlier told the Senate that the agency would act on the application, and Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) allowed a vote on his nomination as a result." Democratic Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey, "who helped initiate an investigation into Crawford's departure by the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services, said that further digging into Crawford's finances should and will continue. 'By blatantly ignoring the law on financial holdings and conflicts of interest, Lester Crawford used his position as the head of the FDA to send all the wrong signals to other FDA employees and the American public,' Hinchey said in a statement."

DOJ_NMG_0081986

NYC Assemblyman Expected To Face Corruption Charges Today. WNBC-TV New York (10/16, Dienst) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Queens assemblyman Brian McLaughlin is expected in federal court on Tuesday. The expected corruption charges relate to McLaughlin's work as one of the city's power brokers -- his years as an elected leader and also as one of the city's top union leaders. The charges could cap a multi-year corruption investigation by the city's Department of Investigation, the FBI and Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office. Sources said McLaughlin is expected to surrender in the morning, and federal prosecutors are expected to announce corruption charges against him." WNBC noted, "Investigators had been focusing as to whether McLaughlin was helping certain street lighting companies in a possible bid-rigging scheme."

The New York Times (10/17, Newman, Rashbaum, 1.21M) notes that McLaughlin is "the head of the country's largest municipal labor council and a powerful force in New York City politics for more than a decade," and reports, "Details of the charges were unavailable last night, but an official, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing, said that they would be announced at a news conference today. … The official said that Mr. McLaughlin would probably be the only person charged today but that the investigation, by the F.B.I., the federal Labor Department, the city's Department of Investigation and the United States attorney's office in Manhattan, was continuing."

Protesters Urge FBI To Investigate Botched Kentucky Murder Probe. The Louisville Courier-Journal (10/17, Adams) reports, "The father of Jessica Melissa Currin, an 18-year-old Mayfield woman murdered in the Western Kentucky town in 2000, rallied with about 15 supporters at noon Monday in downtown Louisville to call for the FBI to investigate her unsolved killing. The group, joined by the Rev. Louis Coleman, stood in a cold rain for more than an hour…carrying signs demanding 'Justice for Jessica.'" The Courier-Journal notes, "The investigation for its first three years was headed by the Mayfield Police Department, but the Mayfield department's mishandling of evidence caused the dismissal of criminal charges against three people in 2003."

Pellicano Continues To Oppose Trial Delay. The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Philips, Krikorian, 918K) reports, "The long-awaited racketeering and wiretapping trial of indicted Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano and six others is likely to be postponed again for months if federal prosecutors and defense attorneys can scale one significant hurdle: Pellicano. Though attorneys for the government and five of Pellicano's co-defendants have agreed to delay the trial date until September 2007, Pellicano has so far resisted." The Times adds, "If U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer agrees with Pellicano…the trial would continue as scheduled in February or perhaps on a date far short of the one-year delay now agreed to by the government and all but one other defendant. The proposed delay was outlined in a stipulation jointly filed by prosecutors and defense attorneys Monday." The Times notes, "Pellicano has been particularly dismissive of the government's allegations, repeatedly denying that the FBI and U.S. attorney's office have any real evidence that he broke the law."

Ohio Fundraiser Goes On Trial. The AP (10/17, Seewer) reports from Toledo, OH, "Less than a month before Election Day, a politically connected coin dealer accused of embezzling from a state investment in rare coins went on trial Monday in a scandal that has rocked Ohio's Republican Party." The AP continues, "Tom Noe, 52, is accused of stealing more than $2 million from a fund for injured workers and spending it on his business and renovating his home in the Florida Keys. … 'He needed money. He needed it desperately,' prosecutor John Weglian said in opening statements." The AP adds, "Noe, once a member of state boards that oversee the Ohio Turnpike and Ohio's public universities, was a top GOP fundraiser who gave more than $105,000 to Republicans, including President Bush and Gov. Bob Taft during the 2004 campaign. … He is charged with corrupt activity, theft, money laundering and forgery. If convicted, he could get up to 10 years in prison on the corrupt activity charge alone. … Defense attorney William Wilkinson said Noe's contract with the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation allowed him to borrow money from the investment fund or loan it to others." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors have not said whether any of the coin money was used for political contributions. If the state money had been funneled to campaigns, authorities could have sought a stiffer penalty."

Ralph's Grocery Chain Enters Guilty Plea. The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Zimmerman) reports, "A federal judge today approved the Ralphs grocery chain's guilty plea to criminal charges that it illegally rehired locked-out workers during the Southern California supermarket labor dispute almost three years ago. Under the agreement, Ralphs will pay $20 million in fines and $50 million into a fund to reimburse workers and their union. Ralphs also agreed to cooperate with the government in its ongoing investigation of the role corporate executives played in the scheme, which involved using fake names and Social Security numbers to hide the identities of workers illegally rehired during the dispute."

DOJ_NMG_0081987

War Against Child Porn Intensifies. USA Today (10/17) reports that "an unprecedented war against child pornography is intensifying. Internet service providers such as AOL are using sophisticated technology to identify porn sites. Credit card companies are tracking purchases. More police detectives are posing as minors online."

Industry Anti-Piracy Coalition Presses For Robust Federal Crackdown. CongressDaily (10/16, Swindell) reported, "A business coalition is aiming to secure during the lame-duck session more federal funding to crack down on piracy of U.S. products and counterfeit goods. The Coalition Against Counterfeiting and Piracy, which represents moviemakers, auto parts manufacturers and pharmaceutical companies, has waged a campaign to lobby for more funding to stem the flow of fake goods into the United States." CongressDaily noted, "Appropriators this year have responded to such pleas. The House fiscal 2007 Science-State-Justice Appropriations bill would provide for at least $13 million for intellectual property rights enforcement, with directions that the FBI increase the number of prosecutors and agents working such cases. The Senate version of the bill would provide $6 million for such efforts. The Senate bill also would create a unit at FBI headquarters that would house at least five full-time agents to work those cases and two additional agents for each of the agency's 18 computer hacking and intellectual property units scattered across the country."

Families Win Right To Attend Murder Trial. The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Mozingo) reports, "Day after day, the aging Ukrainian couple has stepped into a federal courtroom in downtown Los Angeles to endure a severe test of wills: listening to the details of their son Alexander's killing while containing their emotions. … The couple and five other relatives of the victims had to fight to win the right to attend the trial of the two men accused of kidnapping and murdering their son and four other Los Angeles business people. Iouri Mikhel and Jurijus Kadamovas are accused of luring the five victims to their upscale San Fernando Valley homes in 2001 and 2002, holding them for ransom, killing them and dumping their bodies in a reservoir in the Sierra foothills. Prosecutors say the conspiracy was, in part, directed by organized crime figures in Russia. The defendants face the death penalty."

Completely Expunging Criminal Records Becoming Increasingly Harder. The New York Times (10/17, Liptak) reports, "In 41 states, people accused or convicted of crimes" can have "their criminal records expunged, and in theory that means that all traces of their encounters with the justice system will disappear. But enormous commercial databases are fast undoing the societal bargain of expungement, one that used to give people who had committed minor crimes a clean slate and a fresh start. … But real expungement is becoming significantly harder to accomplish in the electronic age. Records once held only in paper form by law enforcement agencies, courts and corrections departments are now routinely digitized and sold in bulk to the private sector. Some commercial databases now contain more than 100 million criminal records. They are updated only fitfully, and expunged records now often turn up in criminal background checks ordered by employers and landlords."

Maryland Prosecutors Investigate Spending By Suspended Mayor. The Washington Post (10/17, B5, Rich) reports, "Investigators from the Maryland State Prosecutor's office searched the home of the suspended mayor of Forest Heights yesterday, adding a criminal probe to the catalogue of palace intrigues that have roiled the tiny Prince George's County town for more than a year. The investigation centers on spending by Mayor Myles Spires Jr., town officials familiar with the investigation said. Among the specific areas of interest, they said, are two disbursements of about $3,333 in public funds -- one to Spires and one to the nondenominational Internet church Abundant Life Ministries, of which he is bishop."

Hit And Run Deaths Up 20% Since 2000. USA Today (10/17, Heath) reports, "The number of pedestrians killed by hit-and-run drivers has jumped 20% since 2000 and is at its highest level in a decade, a USA TODAY analysis shows. The increase compounds the problems of investigating hit-and-run cases, which investigators say are among the most difficult crimes to solve because they often happen at night with no witnesses." USA adds, "Of the 4,881 pedestrians killed last year, 974 died in hit-and-runs, National Highway Traffic Safety Administration records show. The total number of pedestrians killed nationwide increased by about 2% since 2000, but hit-and-run deaths increased at almost 10 times that pace, the USA TODAY analysis found."

DOJ_NMG_0081988

CIVIL LAW:

Bankruptcy Filings Down Under New Law. The Miami Herald (10/17, Danner) reports, "A year after sweeping reforms to U.S. bankruptcy law took effect, the number of people seeking protection from their creditors is down. Way down." The Herald continues, "Fewer than 5,200 South Floridians filed for bankruptcy in the past year -- less than half the number who filed in just the two weeks before the law took effect Oct. 17. The question is why." The Herald adds, "Banks and credit card companies say the law has succeeded in making it harder for people to seek bankruptcy protection. But bankruptcy lawyers and trustees say the numbers are down now because some people rushed to court before the reforms, and because others believe -- wrongly -- that they can no longer file for bankruptcy. … The laws were changed after an eight-year campaign by financial-service companies to cut down on credit card users who piled up debt and then wiggled out of repaying by filing for bankruptcy."

The Washington Post (10/17, D1, Day) reports, "Lawmakers, consumer advocates and industry executives say that much of the sudden drop in filings after Oct. 17, 2005, can be explained by the fact that 600,000 people filed in the two weeks before the law took effect, a scramble that was 10 times the normal level of filing over 10 business days in recent years. … But the filing rate for the first half of 2006, about 10,000 a week, is well below what could be attributed to last year's mad dash, surprising the lawmakers who wrote the legislation and the industry executives who lobbied for it." The Post adds, "The legislation, the most significant change to the nation's bankruptcy laws since 1978, was the culmination of a decade-long push by the credit card and auto-financing industries to make it harder for consumers to wipe out debts through bankruptcy. The new law toughened the rules with the intent of steering more debtors into a form of bankruptcy that requires people to repay more of their debts. … Industry executives had argued that about 10 percent of debtors filing each year for Chapter 7 under the old law, or about 100,000 people, abused the system because they could repay a large portion of their obligations and therefore should be required to do so under Chapter 13. Consumer groups and several lawmakers, mostly Democrats, argued that the number of Chapter 7 filers who misused the system is closer to 3 percent but that, in any case, the new legislation does little to weed them out. … The new law requires people seeking bankruptcy protection to pay higher filing fees and attend mandatory credit-counseling sessions with an accredited firm before and after they file. The goal is to discourage people from filing if they don't have to, and if they do, to pay off as much of their debt as possible."

Katrina Victims Forced To File Under Chapter 13. USA Today (10/17, Chu, Hansen, 2.27M) reports, "A year after a stricter federal bankruptcy law took effect, a growing number of filers in states hit by Hurricane Katrina are having to repay their debts rather than being able to eliminate them. A big reason is that lenders are increasingly cracking down on past-due mortgage payments in the storm-ravaged Gulf region, consumer bankruptcy attorneys say. The tougher bankruptcy law, which took effect a year ago today, made it harder for people to file for Chapter 7, which erases most debts. Instead, some debtors have been forced to file under Chapter 13, which usually requires a debt-repayment plan."

Six States Require Pension Funds To Divest From Darfur. USA Today (10/17, Lynch) reports, "A courtroom battle over an Illinois law requiring state pension funds to sell any investments linked to Sudan is shaping up later this month as a critical test for a grass-roots movement seeking to pressure the regime behind the Darfur genocide. Illinois is one of six states that over the past year have passed laws requiring their pension funds to divest themselves of stakes in companies that do business in Sudan, a central African nation that has been consumed by warfare almost continuously since it became independent in 1956." USA adds, "Other human rights activists want to use divestment to discourage corporate activity in Sudan and ultimately cause Sudanese leaders to halt their support for the militias that are killing and raping in Darfur."

DOJ_NMG_0081989

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Monitor's Report Finds Detroit Still Lagging In Consent Decree Compliance. The Detroit News (10/17, Egan) reports, "More than three years after the Justice Department and the city of Detroit signed consent decrees to improve the Detroit Police Department, only 15 percent of the patrol cars inspected have working video cameras required by the court orders, a federal monitor reported Monday." The News continues, "The Police Department continued to get poor marks in the monitor's latest quarterly report. The monitor examined 89 paragraphs and subparagraphs in the two consent decrees related to use of force and conditions of confinement and reported the department was in compliance with only four of them. … By signing the consent decrees in 2003, the city settled two federal lawsuits that accused the police of repeatedly violating the rights of suspects, prisoners and witnesses." The News adds, "The longer it takes the department to comply, the longer it will be under the scrutiny and multimillion-dollar expense of a federal monitor. The Justice Department could also ask a federal judge to find the department in contempt and impose sanctions, though that is considered unlikely at this point. … The report also said supervisors are not randomly reviewing the videos recorded by the patrol car cameras as required. The report is by Kroll Inc., a New York City-based risk consulting company that was hired to monitor the Police Department's compliance with the court orders. … The report, filed Monday in U.S. District Court in Detroit, also hammers the department for failing to fill out required reports or filling them out incorrectly."

DOJ Sues Philadelphia Over Voting Rights Of Spanish-Speakers. The Philadelphia Daily News (10/17, Davies) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has accused Philadelphia of violating the voting rights of Spanish-speaking citizens, and is asking for federal election observers in the city through the end of 2009." The Daily News continues, "A federal lawsuit filed Friday charges that the city has failed to provide enough bilingual poll workers in Hispanic areas and adequately translate election materials into Spanish. … As a result, the suit alleges, 'limited English-proficient Hispanic voters have had difficulty understanding the election process and have been prevented from voting.'" The Daily News adds, "Mayor Street's spokesman, Joe Grace, said the city already provides translators and voting materials in Spanish, and will 'vigorously contest' the suit. … 'The timing of this is a little questionable, coming three weeks before an election,' Grace said. Asked if he thought the Republican White House was seeking to suppress Democratic votes in a key U.S. Senate race, Grace said, 'The timing is suspect, and we'll leave it at that.'" The Daily News notes, "Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said she couldn't be more specific, but officials of the watchdog group Committee of Seventy said they'd provided some of the information that led to the suit."

FBI Says Hate Crimes Dropped By 6 Percent Last Year. The AP (10/17, Jordan) reports, "Hate crimes in the United States dropped last year by 6 percent, the FBI reported Monday, although violence against people based on their race accounted more than half of the reported incidents. Police nationwide reported 7,163 hate crime incidents in 2005, targeting victims based on their race, ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation and disabilities. That was down from 2004, when the FBI reported 7,649 incidents."

The Washington Times (10/17, Seper) reports, "The report, by the FBI's Uniform Crime Reporting Program, said that 55 percent of the 7,163 reported single-bias incidents last year were motivated by racial bias -- an increase of one percentage point. The overall number represents a 6 percent drop from 7,649 in 2004. Religious bias triggered 17 percent of incidents cited in the report, followed by 14 percent for sexual-orientation bias and 13.2 percent by an ethnicity or national-origin bias. Less than 1 percent involved bias against a disability. The report also noted that of 5,190 hate-crime offenses classified as crimes against people in 2005, intimidation accounted for 48.9 percent of them, followed by simple assaults at 30.2 percent and aggravated assaults at 20.5 percent."

NAACP To Monitor Elections In 10 States. The AP (10/17, Dominguez) reports, "The NAACP will monitor voting in Ohio and nine other states next month, sending observers to polling places, taking citizen complaints and notifying the Justice Department of any serious problems, the civil rights organization announced Monday." The AP continues, "The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People planned to have hundreds of volunteers monitoring the election in Ohio, Maryland, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Pennsylvania and Texas, said Bruce Gordon, president of the Baltimore-based organization. .. The NAACP said the states were chosen because of pivotal elections, concentrations of black voters, or a history of polling problems." The AP adds, "Gordon said the organization intends to be proactive 'to ensure that Nov. 7 comes and goes smoothly and that every citizen across this country, and particularly in the state of Maryland, who has an interest in voting, in fact is able to vote.' .. .Maryland's primary election last month was riddled with problems that caused precincts to open late or other delays, prompting court action in some areas to extend voting hours."

DOJ_NMG_0081990

The Detroit News (10/17, Martino) reports, "The NAACP announced Monday that Michigan is among 10 states that will have observers at polling places during next month's election to take citizen complaints and let the Justice Department know about any serious problems." The News continues, "The effort comes after numerous reports of problems with the Maryland voting system during the primary last month. … Participating states were chosen using three factors: a high concentration of black voters, a history of polling problems or pivotal elections. … 'While the NAACP will take steps to counter obstacles to voter participation, we are encouraging our communities to cast their votes, even if it requires extra effort,' NAACP President Bruce Gordon said in a statement Monday." The News adds, "Locally, in past election years the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People filed injunctions in federal court against individuals harassing people at the polls and challenging their right to vote by questioning their identification, criminal record or whether they paid child support. … 'We're very pleased that NAACP national will be monitoring the elections. We in Detroit have been monitoring elections for the last several years,' the Rev. Wendell Anthony, president of the Detroit branch of the NAACP, said Monday."

The Baltimore Sun (10/17, Brewington) reports, "With problems from Maryland's chaotic primary elections still being sorted out, NAACP President and CEO Bruce S. Gordon said yesterday that the civil rights organization will monitor polls in Maryland and nine other states on Election Day and report any voting irregularities to the U.S. Justice Department. … But Gordon also called on Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. to take steps before Nov. 7 to ensure a smooth and fair election by fixing the shortage of poll workers and the malfunctioning electronic voter check-in system. … 'With all the concerns that were raised, we intend to be proactive and put necessary safeguards in place so that every citizen who wishes to vote has that right,' Gordon said at the headquarters of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Baltimore." The Sun adds, "The plan announced yesterday would continue recent election-monitoring efforts by the NAACP, in which volunteers have looked for irregularities. … During the 2004 presidential elections, the civil rights organization and its partners enlisted 25,000 volunteers to monitor precincts nationwide and to answer a toll-free voter assistance hot line. Nearly 5,000 of those volunteers were attorneys, prepared to challenge voting irregularities with lawsuits. … Last month, the NAACP's national office and some local branches received complaints from frustrated voters in Maryland's primary, prompting the group and the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights to seek a court order extending poll hours in some jurisdictions by an hour."

The Washington Times (10/17, DeBose) reports, "In the letter, Mr. Gordon commended Mr. Ehrlich for ordering that backup paper ballots be used to avoid any problems with the touch-screen voting machines. … He also requested the governor order the Board of Elections to hold statewide demonstrations of the new machines, ensure that the electronic registration rolls are updated, and make certain there are adequate numbers of trained election judges at the polls on time and for the entire day. … In addition, he asked that each precinct have a sufficient number of provisional ballots -- many ran out during the primaries -- and maintain privacy for voters, whether they vote using touch-screen or paper ballots." The Times adds, "The NAACP will run an Election Day voter command center at the Baltimore headquarters. Volunteers will observe targeted precincts in the Baltimore area and Prince Georges and Montgomery counties, where the majority of the irregularities occurred. … The voter command center will also be staffed with lawyers from the group's partnering organizations, including the liberal Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and People for the American Way, to monitor complaints of voter irregularities and to advise voters experiencing problems at the polls."

The Washington Post (10/17, Helderman) reports, "The group said that poll watchers will observe precincts in Prince George's and Montgomery counties and in Baltimore and that lawyers will be available to document complaints from voters and, if necessary, forward reports of irregularities to the U.S. Justice Department. Maryland is one of 10 states the civil rights organization plans to monitor that day. … During September's primary, some polls in Maryland opened late because election judges or technicians did not show up. Also, an electronic registration system regularly crashed, and many poll workers had trouble submitting results electronically at the end of the day."

DOJ_NMG_0081991

Former Georgia Governor Sues Successor Over Voter ID Letter. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/17, Suggs) reports, "Former Gov. Roy Barnes has filed a lawsuit against his successor, Gov. Sonny Perdue, and the State Election Board for the mailing of 200,000 letters to registered Georgia voters that suggested a photo ID was needed to vote in the Nov. 7 general election." The AJC continues, "The problem? The letters were sent out days after a judge ruled the law requiring a photo ID to be unconstitutional." The AJC adds, "Barnes filed the civil suit Monday in Fulton Superior Court on behalf of a 60-year old disabled Atlanta woman, Rosalind Lake, who does not have a state-issued photo ID. … In the complaint, the governor and election board are charged with contempt for violating a court order that struck down the photo ID law. Barnes is asking the court to force the state to send out another letter informing registered voters that they do not need a photo ID to vote. … 'The delivery of approximately 200,000 "Dear Georgia Voter" letters was a blatant action in which seriously incorrect information on voting was disseminated to a substantial number of Georgia voters,' Barnes wrote in the motion filed Monday. 'The events after this Court's order make clear that the violation was deliberate.'"

Missouri High Court Strikes Voter ID Law. The AP (10/17, Wiese) reports, "The Missouri Supreme Court on Monday struck down a new law requiring voters to show a photo identification at the polls, upholding a lower judge's decision." The AP continues, "Supporters of the ID requirement, mostly Republicans, said it was necessary to prevent voter fraud and increase confidence in the election process. … Opponents, primarily Democrats, argued people impersonating others when voting is rare, and that the ID requirement would especially harm the poor, elderly and disabled who may be less likely to have a driver's license." The AP adds, "A lower judge ruled last month that the ID requirement was an unconstitutional infringement on the fundamental right to vote. The Supreme Court agreed in a 6-1 unsigned opinion. … The law required voters to present a photo identification card issued by Missouri or the federal government to cast a ballot starting with the November election."

Federal Agents Remove Records From Mississippi Jail. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (10/17, Fitzgerald) reports, "The federal government removed boxes of jail records last week from the Harrison County Sheriff's Office for its investigation of an inmate's death and related allegations, U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said on Monday." The Herald continues, "Lampton told the Sun Herald that the FBI and prosecutors from the Justice Department's civil rights criminal division took records last week from the sheriff's Gulfport offices at the Harrison County Courthouse and the Harrison County Adult Detention Center. … Lampton said there was no need to use search warrants because Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. and his new warden, Don Cabana, have been '100 percent cooperative.' But, he said, 'they can't be a part of the investigation.' … 'When we get to the bottom of everything, people can be secure or satisfied to know everything at that jail has been looked at, and anything that might have been done improperly has been corrected.'" The Herald adds, "Removal of the records is the latest in a series of new developments in criminal matters surrounding the death of Jessie Lee Williams Jr. Williams, 40, died after a beating on Feb. 4 in the jail booking room. He was taken off life-support at a hospital within two days, and his death was later ruled a homicide. … Former corrections officer Regina Rhodes, 29, was to be sentenced Monday on guilty pleas to criminal accusations that she assaulted Williams and lied to cover it up. She accepted a plea agreement and became a government witness."

Supreme Court Deals Setback To Boy Scouts. In what the Los Angeles Times (10/17, Savage, 918K) calls a "setback" for the Boy Scouts, the Supreme Court has rejected "a free-speech challenge to a Berkeley policy that denies city-subsidized dock space to a Scouting group because it excludes gays and atheists. The court's action lets stand rulings in California and elsewhere that have said cities, schools and colleges may deny public benefits to groups that refuse to comply with broad nondiscrimination rules involving religion and sex orientation. Some conservative groups had joined the challenge to the Berkeley policy, saying that advocates of 'traditional moral values' are being subjected to discrimination across the country by 'politically correct' government officials." The Times notes that High Court's action "no legal precedent," and "the justices could well take up the issue in the future."

DOJ_NMG_0081992

53 Percent Of Likely Virginia Voters Back Gay Marriage Ban Amendment. The Washington Post (10/17, A1, Jenkins, 748K) reports a majority of Virginians "support a proposed constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage and civil unions, although voters split on the measure when presented with interpretations of its potential impact, according to a new Washington Post poll." Fifty-three percent of likely voters "said they would vote for the amendment, and 43 percent would oppose it, the poll found, indicating that three weeks before Election Day opponents still have a long way to go to make Virginia the first state in the country to defeat a same-sex marriage amendment." But when respondents "were read the arguments on both sides of the question, enough voters showed a willingness to reconsider that the gap narrowed to a virtual tie -- 48 percent said they supported the measure and 47 percent opposed it, within the poll's margin of error of three percentage points."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Expands SRAM Antitrust Probe To Samsung. IDG News Service (10/17, Ben Ames) reports, "Antitrust investigators with the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) have issued a subpoena to Samsung Semiconductor Inc., just hours after asking its competitors Mitsubishi Electric Corp. and Cypress Semiconductor Corp. for information about their sales practices in the SRAM (static RAM) chip market." IDG continues, "Toshiba, another major SRAM chip producer, declined to comment on whether it had also been subpoenaed. A spokeswoman referred questions to the company's Tokyo headquarters." IDG adds, 'Samsung plans to comply with the request for information about sales and marketing practices throughout the industry, spokeswoman Chris Goodhart said in a statement. … 'Samsung will cooperate fully with the Department of Justice on this matter,' she said. 'Samsung is committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior.' … Samsung has already been charged with antitrust violations in a DOJ investigation of the DRAM (dynamic RAM) market. Justice Department lawyers found evidence that several DRAM chip makers manipulated prices while bidding for business with the U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Apple Computer Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co. and IBM Corp. Several DRAM makers have been ordered to pay fines as high as US$300 million and three Samsung executives were sentenced to time in prison."

Microsoft Shares Security Data With Software Makers. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (10/17, Richman) reports, "Striving to satisfy European antitrust officials, Microsoft Corp. said Monday that it has given security-software makers some of the data they want to make their products work with Microsoft's forthcoming operating system, Windows Vista. … But one of those companies, Cupertino, Calif.-based Symantec Corp., on Monday reacted to the release by repeating complaints it made at the end of last week: that it's not getting enough information fast enough. … 'The operative question remains "When?"' Symantec spokesman Cris Payden said. 'When are we going to get what we need?'" The P-I continues, "Microsoft Director Adrien Robinson said the means of connecting outside software to Vista's Windows Security Center were uploaded Monday morning to a Web site accessible only by security-software developers. … The Security Center is a set of on-screen controls -- nicknamed the 'digital dashboard' -- that customers will use to adjust and monitor their computer's security features." The P-I adds, "Symantec's Paden said the company is inspecting the new Web site 'to be sure it has everything we need to let our customers see our digital dashboard instead of Microsoft's.' … Microsoft also said Monday that it plans to discuss with Symantec and McAfee Inc. changes they want made to Patch Guard, part of the 64-bit version of Vista that restricts who can alter the operating system's core, or kernel. … But Paden said Microsoft has yet to explain how Symantec's technology can access 64-bit Vista's kernel, or even to say when it will provide that explanation. The 64-bit version of Vista is expected to be popular among businesses, he said."

HP Again Extends Tender Offer For Mercury. The Financial Times (10/17, Allison) reports, "Hewlett-Packard, the world's second-biggest computer maker, on Monday announced a further extension of its tender offer for Mercury Interactive, a business software group that was forced to de-list its shares earlier this year because of stock options backdating." The Times continues, "The move marked the third time HP has extended its tender offer, which values the software maker at $4.5bn. It came in spite of news that HP had locked up more than 90 per cent of Mercury's oustanding shares - far more than the amount needed to complete the company's biggest acquisition since its $19bn takeover of Compaq, a rival computer maker, in 2002." The Times adds, 'One person familiar with the matter said Mercury's de-lisitng had complicated efforts to receive anti-trust approvals from regulators. The person said the delays were procedural and nature and were not expected to infuence the outcome of the tender offer. … HP's tender offer values Mercury at $4.5bn, or $52 a share - a 33 per cent premium over the comapny's share price the day before the deal was announced in July."

DOJ_NMG_0081993

E.On Sues Saying Acciona Misled SEC. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, B10) reports, "E.On AG said it filed a lawsuit in New York to clarify a situation about Endesa SA shares held by Spanish energy-and-construction company Acciona SA." E.On "has accused Acciona of making misleading statements to the Securities and Exchange Commission about its strategic targets in buying a 10% stake in Endesa. Acciona denied the charges. … E.On's lawsuit says information Acciona filed to the SEC was 'false, inexact and incomplete' among other things, because 'Acciona has contracts with third parties who intend to block E.On's bid.' An E.On spokeswoman said it is unclear how many Endesa shares Acciona controls and whether Acciona has agreements with third parties on further share purchases."

Silverman Testifies In Forbes Trial. USA Today (10/17, Farrell) reports, "The retrial of former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes took a new twist Monday when Henry Silverman, the hard-driving founder of HFS, testified about his decision to merge HFS in 1997 with Forbes' firm, CUC International, to form Cendant. Following the merger, in April 1998, Cendant disclosed that CUC executives had overstated their company's revenue by hundreds of millions of dollars. The disclosure shocked investors, who went on a selling spree, wiping out $14 billion, or half the company's market capitalization, in one day."

Oshkosh Truck To Buy JLG Industries. The New York Times/AP (10/17) reports, "Military and commercial vehicle maker Oshkosh Truck Corp. on Monday said it is buying JLG Industries Inc., a maker of aerial work platforms and booms, for about $3 billion in cash. … The deal, which has been approved by the boards of both companies and still requires the approval from JLG shareholders and antitrust regulators, is expected to close in early December. The company agreed to pay $28 per share for JLG, which represents a 35 percent premium over the stock's Friday closing price of $20.75. According to the New York Stock Exchange, JLG has 106.7 million shares outstanding. Oshkosh will also assume more than $200 million in JLG debt as part of the deal."

Macquarie Wins Auction For Thames Water. The Financial Times (10/17, Saigol, Bream) reports, "Macquarie, the Australian bank, on Monday night won the hotly contested auction for Thames Water, the UK's biggest water company, which is being sold by RWE, the German utility group, in a deal valued at £8bn. … It beat three other serious bidders in the auction, including Qatar Investment Authority, which had teamed up with UBS's global infrastructure fund. The Thames deal, which includes £3.2bn of debt, is subject to approval by RWE's supervisory board at a weekend meeting. If approved, the sale is due to close by early December. The deal marks the biggest buy-out in the UK this year."

WSJournal Says 1993 Steel Anti-Dumping Duties No Longer Justified. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, A14, 2.03M) says in an editorial that "on the table before" the International Trade Commission today is "whether the anti-dumping duties imposed in 1993 on 'corrosion-resistant steel' should be lifted. This steel is crucial to making cars. Pushing back against the automakers, steelmakers are expected to argue, as they did 13 years ago, that they need the duties to repel unfair foreign competition and avoid harm. Well, times change, and it's time to lift these duties on steel. This isn't 1993." From "corporate America to Mom and Pop operations, the U.S. needs this steel to stay in business. The automakers will testify on the side of the foreign companies accused of dumping, but in fact they're testifying for the U.S. economy." Pricing power "and profitability are a direct consequence of the supply restraints caused by anti-dumping duties. Those duties, which can range from 2% to 40%, are also assigned retroactively; so foreign sellers of steel to the U.S. -- which have to collect the duty as part of their price -- never know what their final financial exposure will be."

DOJ_NMG_0081994

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Judge Considers Setting Deadline For Everglades Restoration. The AP (10/17, Anderson) reports, "Lawyers for the (Florida) state Department of Environmental Protection and South Florida water managers urged a federal judge Monday not to issue an order imposing deadlines for Everglades restoration work, contending it is both illegal and unnecessary." The AP continues, 'Charles Demonaco, attorney for the state agency, told U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno that a federal court has no business imposing its will on how a state follows its own laws. Demonaco said a cleanup plan meeting court approval for the Everglades is already enshrined in state law, making a court order unneeded. … 'There is a long-term plan that is in effect,' Demonaco said at a hearing. 'A federal court would be intruding in the daily activities of a state. That would be an unlawful order.'" The AP adds, "But Dexter Lehtinen, attorney for the Miccosukee Tribe of Indians of Florida, said court orders are the only way to ensure that Florida agencies continue to meet the terms of a settlement reached over a decade ago to restore the Everglades and reduce phosphorus-laden runoff from continuing to damage the ecosystem. … Lehtinen, a former U.S. attorney, said without such court supervision Florida officials could modify their restoration plan unilaterally. The Miscosukees consider the Everglades their ancestral home and have joined the case to ensure enforcement of water quality goals."

ConocoPhillips To Pay More Than $2.3 Million For Puget Sound Spill. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (10/17) reports, "In a settlement reached Monday with the U.S. Justice Department, ConocoPhillips will pay more than $2.3 million in costs and penalties for a 2004 incident that spilled more than 1,000 gallons of crude oil in Puget Sound's Dalco Passage." The P-I continues, "The agreement with the company, and its wholly owned subsidiary, Polar Tankers, was reached following an extensive investigation by the U.S Coast Guard and the state Ecology Department following the Oct. 13, 2004 spill. The investigation found that the tanker Polar Texas released the oil as it took on ballast while departing Commencement Bay." The P-I adds, "The spill went unnoticed until the following morning when the captain of a tug boat reported oil in the water south of Vashon and Maury islands. Although state law requires the offending vessel to report and participate in the cleanup, the Polar Texas did neither, the Coast Guard said yesterday in a press release. … The $2,233,293.94 in pollution removal costs under the federal Oil Pollution Act of 1990 represents 100 percent of all costs the federal government incurred during cleanup operations in Dalco Passage. The federal and state government's claims against ConocoPhillips for injuries to natural resources, however, have not been resolved and are not included in the total. … ConocoPhillips, however, also will pay an $80,000 civil penalty under the federal Clean Water Act. Last Friday, the state Ecology Department settled a $540,000 claim against the oil corporation under state law."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Washington State Lawyer Pleads Guilty In Money-Laundering Case. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (10/16) reports the purchase of a Laundromat "didn't wash with federal drug investigators. Medina lawyer Stephen Plowman, who represented a cocaine trafficker, pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court to a financial reporting crime after helping his client buy the Queen Anne Maytag Laundry." Prosecutors said Plowman "admitted he received more than $100,000 in cash from his client to buy the Laundromat for him in June 2005 and failed to file a currency transaction report." Prosecutors accused his client, Carlos Ford, of wanting the Laundromat to launder drug proceeds. "The guilty plea by the lawyer 'sends a strong message that no one is above the law,' said Rodney Benson, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in Seattle."

In Connecticut, Federal Anti-Meth Law May Be Slowing Cold-Medicine Sales. The Hartford (CT) Courant (10/16, Waldman) reports that in the two weeks since a federal law "put more than a dozen popular cold and sinus pills behind the drugstore counter, the Arrow Pharmacy in Hartford has not sold a single box of Sudafed. It may be that it's not really cold season yet, pharmacist Eddie Martucci speculated. Or it may be that customers are put off by a new law that requires them to show a photo ID and sign a logbook before purchasing products that contain pseudoephedrine. It's a 'pain,' said Angelo DeFazio," the pharmacy owner. "On the upside, DeFazio said, the law allows pharmacists to monitor pseudoephedrine sales and to warn people with problems such as heart conditions that they probably should not be taking the drug." The Courant notes that the logbooks must be made available to DEA agents.

DOJ_NMG_0081995

Walters Praises Montana's Meth Project. The AP (10/16) reports the Montana Meth Project, "a campaign with graphic messages about the perils of methamphetamine use, received White House recognition Monday. John Walters…appeared in Great Falls and cited the project as one of the nation's most powerful anti-drug efforts. … The project is Montana's largest advertiser, and its messages reach 70-90 percent of the state's teens at least three times a week, according to the White House. … 'The Montana Meth Project is a key component of a balanced strategy against meth and is an extraordinary example of the results we can achieve when we combine the power of advertising with the dedication and expertise of the leaders of this community,' Walters said." The AP story was used by Montana's Great Falls Tribune and Billings Gazette.

ONDCP Says Government Partnerships Are Needed To Combat Meth. The Fort Collins Coloradoan (10/16) reports that about 100 community leaders "looking for solutions to the growing use of methamphetamine in Larimer and Weld counties gathered [yesterday] for a day-long summit. … About 80 percent of the meth found in the United States comes from Mexico or large 'super labs,' said John Horton, associate deputy director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy. The number of small labs in the country is down 29 percent in recent years, he said." Horton "said partnerships between governments at home and abroad are needed to curtail the production and use of the drug."

The Greeley (CO) Tribune (10/17) reports Horton "spoke early in the meeting about the national [meth] problem. He said local governments need to lead the way in tackling the problem and he applauded Colorado's laws that make it more difficult to purchase ingredients used for the drug."

Horton Speaks Out Against Amendment 44. The Denver Post (10/17) reports Horton said a proposal on the state ballot to "loosen marijuana laws in Colorado would make it harder to fight the war on methamphetamine abuse." Horton "said Amendment 44 - which would allow people 21 and older to legally possess an ounce or less of pot - would make marijuana accessible to more people and allow them to fall victim to the highly-addictive and destructive properties of methamphetamines." Horton noted that there "have been strides in cutting meth traffic, including reducing the number of small labs in the country by 29 percent. He said efforts like Amendment 44 would only hurt the fight, however, because marijuana is a 'gateway drug.'" Mason Tvert, campaign director for Amendment 44, "said Horton and other officials are using scare tactics to sink the proposal." Tvert said studies "have shown marijuana's status as a gateway drug is overblown."

In Florida, Colombian Gets 15-Year Sentence Following Cocaine Bust. The Naples Daily News (10/16) reports a Colombian man "caught with nearly two tons of cocaine in international waters was sentenced…in Fort Myers to 15 years in prison. Leopoldo Caiceda Caiceda…pleaded guilty in June to possession of cocaine and conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute cocaine. He was found last December along with three other men in a fishing boat off the coast of Costa Rica. In their wooden fishing boat U.S. Coast Guard officials found 3,500 pounds of cocaine," according to Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Doug Molloy.

Report: Border Patrol, Others "Outgunned" By Drug Cartels. The Houston Chronicle (10/17, Mittelstadt) reports the U.S. Border Patrol and other law enforcement agencies at the U.S.-Mexico border "are outgunned by increasingly ruthless and well-armed Mexican drug cartels," according to a new congressional report. The House Homeland Security oversight subcommittee report "said drug cartels are able to break the encryptions on Border Patrol and sheriffs' deputies' radios. Lookouts for the cartels, using military grade equipment, are positioned at strategic points on the U.S. side of the border to monitor movements of U.S. law enforcement,' it continued." The Chronicle notes that while federal law enforcement "seized 1.1 million pounds of cocaine and 6.8 million pounds of marijuana, [it's] estimated the total cocaine flow may have topped 11 million pounds."

Cable TV Coverage. Fox Special Report (10/16, story 6, 3:15, Hume) reported, "It appears tonight that a forthcoming government report will describe a dire situation along the southern US border with enforcement authorities catching only a small percentage of illegal immigrants and the wars on drugs and terrorism being fought on the nation's doorstep. …

DOJ_NMG_0081996

The U.S. already provides Mexico-with tens of millions to help secure its side of the border. But that's a drop in the bucket to the cartels, who continue to smuggle drugs and people with little interference from the Mexican authorities. … The authors call this report a 30-page wake up call. It was compiled with extensive cooperation from the FBI, DEA, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and counter-terrorism officials. Now it is up to Congress, they say, to provide the political will and resources to answer this growing threat."

US Claims Head Of Rebel Group Plotted To Keep Hostages. The AP (10/17, Yen) reports, "The government said Monday that a top Latin American rebel leader plotted to keep three Americans hostage and use them as political bargaining chips after their plane crashed in Colombia. … But the defense portrayed Ricardo Palmera as a tangential sympathizer of the leftist FARC group who unfairly got caught in the middle after trying to negotiate a deal between guerrilla fighters and the U.S.-backed Colombian government. … 'This man had nothing to do with the capture of the three Americans,' said Palmera attorney Robert Tucker. 'He became the pawn in the power play.'" The AP continues, "Justice Department attorney John Crabb opened his case by arguing that Palmera — better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad — was guilty on charges of hostage-taking, conspiracy and providing material support to terrorists. … 'We'll trade you hostages — including three Americans — for all FARC prisoners in jail. That was Simon Trinidad's offer,' Crabb said. … 'He admitted he was a member of FARC, he admitted FARC takes hostages,' he said. 'That man, Simon Trinidad, tried to use them as get out of jail cards for FARC.' .. Tucker countered that there was little evidence tying Palmera directly to the hostage-taking after the plane carrying the U.S. military contractors encountered engine trouble and crashed in February 2003."

US General Backs Reducing Aid To Colombia. The AP (10/16) reports the U.S. military's commander for Latin America "says Washington should gradually reduce its roughly $600 million in annual military and anti-drug aid to Colombia, support that has been crucial to putting the region's most potent rebel force on the defensive. 'I'm not concerned there's going to be a loss of funding,' Gen. John Craddock said Monday when asked about reports that the State Department wants to phase out Plan Colombia, which has provided the country with some $4 billion in total aid since 2000. 'First of all, there should be (decreased funding), over time. It makes sense. The Colombians are winning,' said Craddock." The AP adds, "And though it is questionable whether Plan Colombia has put a serious dent in drug trafficking from the world's leading cocaine producing nation…the Colombian military's gains are measurable."

McClatchy Newspapers (10/16) also reports Craddock is not concerned about the U.S. possibly reducing funding for Plan Colombia and notes, "There is no certainty that the United States will have to abandon its down-range air operations at Manta, Ecuador, used by U.S. surveillance aircraft and other forces for anti-drug operations" due to presidential elections in Ecuador. A runoff election is scheduled for Nov. 26.

Moonshiners Seen As Vanishing Breed In West Virginia. The Charleston Daily Mail (10/17, Anderson) reports, "The West Virginia moonshiner is a vanishing breed made all but extinct by economics and modern law enforcement techniques, experts say." The Daily Mail continues, "Moonshine is not profitable to make for widespread sale anymore. … And in the modern era of ATVs and helicopter aerial searches, it's harder for a moonshiner to hide. … But moonshine hasn't gone away entirely." The Daily Mail adds, "An elderly Roane County man was recently arrested for allegedly shooting his nephew after a night of drinking moonshine. When police found Wayne Howard Mallory passed out in his trailer, they roused him and asked him about the shooting. Mallory couldn't remember anything about it. … In August, authorities seized $1 million worth of marijuana and a moonshine still at a Greenbrier County couple's 29-acre property. … 'There's probably a bit of it going on, but I don't think it's a problem,' said Paul Cross, agent in charge of the Charleston office of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … Cross said his agency hasn't come across a real case of moonshine-making in about seven years. 'People get into that stuff to make money,' he said. 'It doesn't seem to be economically viable to do it at this time.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Chicago Child Abuse Suit Creates Immigration Concerns. CBS 2 Chicago (10/17, Johnson) reports, "A child abuse lawsuit aimed at helping illegal immigrants stay in the country is creating some waves. … Some people believe the lawsuit in support a Chicago mother and her son misses a critical point, and CBS 2's Rob Johnson reports that others believe it's right on target." CBS2 continues, "The immigration debate has become one of America's most pressing issues. The latest salvo fired came last week with the filing of a class action lawsuit on behalf of children like 7-year-old Saul Arellano, whose mother Elvira is hunkered down in a Humboldt Park church fighting deportation. … The suit names President Bush and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, among others, and claims that such deportations are a form of child abuse. … 'They should be able to live in this country with their parents and that is not happening,' said Emma Lozano with the Center Without Borders." CBS2 adds, "That strategy, says CBS 2 legal analyst Irv Miller, is a long shot. … 'It's probably not going to be a class action, which is what the mom and the child want it to be to gain the notoriety,' Miller said."

DOJ_NMG_0081997

Some Democrats Taking Harder Line Than Party On Immigration. The New York Times (10/17, Swarns, 1.21M) reports Democratic congressional leaders have "maintained a united front on immigration, demanding legislation that would legalize illegal immigrants and create a guest worker program to ensure a reliable legal flow of foreign workers." But in Tennessee, "and in at least a dozen other fiercely contested Congressional races, Democratic candidates are publicly breaking with that message." In North Carolina, House candidate Heath Shuler "ran a television advertisement declaring he would never 'give amnesty' to illegal immigrants." Georgia Rep. John Barrow "has played up his vote to build a fence on the southwest border," while in Ohio, Democratic challenger John Cranley "has accused" Republican Rep. Steve Chabot of "voting to legalize hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants." In Tennessee, Rep. Harold Ford "reminds voters repeatedly that federal agents raided his Republican opponent's business and found four illegal immigrants working there. Mr. Ford also proudly describes his vote for the border security legislation passed by the House last year, a measure condemned as anti-immigrant by many Democrats in Congress." The Times adds, "The appearance of some candidates vying to be tougher than Republicans on border security, particularly in tight races in conservative states, shows how divisive the immigration issue remains. The tough border security message is carried mostly by Democrats in the South and the Midwest, where a surge of Hispanic immigration is transforming small towns and cities."

Mail Order Bride Law Seeks To Reduce Incidents Of Domestic Violence. The New York Times (10/17, Porter, 1.21M) reports on the impact of a "Congressional effort intended to protect women from potential abuse by American men who seek brides from other countries on the Internet. In June, the federal immigration service froze 10,000 visa applications for foreign fiancées because they did not conform with a law that went into effect in March." The International Marriage Broker Regulation Act, "or Imbra, is intended to give foreign women and the American government more information about the men who seek so-called mail-order brides." Sen. Sam Brownback, "a leading sponsor of the law," said, "This is an unequal partnership where you have somebody dependent on somebody else in a profound way. It puts women at a significant disadvantage, in a potentially violent situation." The Times adds, "Reports of violence in international marriages, some of them Internet matches, have increased in recent years." But the "new law has angered many men, who argue that there is no definitive evidence that violence is more likely to take place in an international marriage arranged over the Internet than in a domestic one."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Kuo Says Faith-Based Initiative Grant Review Was "A Farce." The Washington Post (10/17, A19, Cooperman, 748K) reports White House officials "realized they had a problem, former staffer David Kuo writes in his new book, 'Tempting Faith,' when they saw how a panel rated the first applications for grants under the 'faith-based initiative,' President Bush's vaunted effort to help religious charities." On a scale "of 1 to 100, respected national organizations such as Big Brothers Big Sisters of America scored in the mid-70s to mid-80s, 'while something called Jesus and Friends Ministry from California, a group with little more than a post office box,' scored 89 and Pat Robertson's overseas aid organization, Operation Blessing, scored 95, according to Kuo." Kuo wrote, "It was obvious that the ratings were a farce." He and "other White House aides feared that if the list became public, 'it would show once and for all that the initiative was purely about paying off political friends for their support.'" The Post adds the excerpts from

DOJ_NMG_0081998

Kuo's "explosive book" brought "heated denials from White House press secretary Tony Snow and other current and former Bush administration officials." In addition to "being a memoir of his three years in the White House, where Kuo was deputy director of the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives until December 2003, the book is a saga of falling in, and out of, love with conservative Christian politics."

In his Washington Post column (10/17, A21), E.J. Dionne says, "The headlines that have come Kuo's way have focused on the author's claims that White House staffers ridiculed some of their evangelical supporters as 'nuts' and 'goofy' and that public events surrounding Bush's faith-based initiative were geared toward Republican electoral fortunes. As a former deputy director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, Kuo has a fair claim to knowing what he's talking about." But the "most useful thing that could flow from Kuo's revelations would not be a splashy exchange of charges and countercharges but rather a quiet reappraisal by rank-and-file evangelicals of their approach to politics. I hope Kuo's book promotes serious discussions in religious study groups around the country about whether the evangelicals' alliance with political conservatism has actually made the world, well, more godly from their own point of view."

2001 Concert Organizers Say Kuo Left Them On Hook For $25,000. The Washington Post (10/17, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 748K) reports Kuo "has plenty of GOP loyalists furious with him right now. They can line up behind organizers of the October 2001 'United We Stand' concert, who say Kuo stiffed them to the tune of $25,000." Kuo was "the administration's point man for the star-studded concert at RFK Stadium (featuring Michael Jackson, Aerosmith, James Brown, Janet Jackson, Mariah Carey, P. Diddy, Rod Stewart, Destiny's Child), which was thrown together in the weeks following the 9/11 attacks to benefit the American Red Cross and other relief funds." Republican fundraiser Rob Jennings "told us Kuo seized on an idea to hand out 50,000 American flags to the audience and repeatedly assured organizers he could find an underwriter for the $25K cost -- and so the flags were ordered and paid for by the promoter." But the "money never arrived, despite Kuo's continued promises. Kuo eventually stopped returning calls, and organizers were quietly asked by the White House to back off, said Jennings."

Internal Report Found Specter Aide Broke No Rules On Earmarks. Roll Call (10/17, Stanton) reports, "An internal investigation of a senior aide to Sen. Arlen Specter…and spousal connections to Congressional earmarks found that no illegal or unethical activity occurred, according to a copy of the report reviewed by Roll Call. However, the report found that Senate ethics rules do not adequately address the large number of spouses, children and other immediate family members who also work as lobbyists, prompting Specter to institute a series of changes to his internal rules of conduct. The investigation was conducted following news reports that questioned the role that Specter aide Vicki Siegel may have played in securing earmarks sought by clients of a lobbying firm founded by her husband."

Hastings Says Foley Probe Will Go "Wherever The Evidence Leads." House ethics committee chairman Rep. Doc Hastings finds himself in the spotlight as his panel looks into sexually explicit messages sent by former Rep. Mark Foley to teenage male House pages. The AP (10/16, Daly) reported that Hastings "pledges that the Foley investigation will go wherever the evidence leads. 'I take that responsibility that I have as the chairman of the ethics committee very seriously,' he told The Associated Press. 'Life gives you all sorts of responsibilities, and sometimes you just have to deal with them. I feel very confident in the direction we are moving.'" The AP added, "Asked whether he personally supports [House Speaker Dennis] Hastert, who named Hastings to lead the ethics committee, Hastings said, 'I think the speaker has done an excellent job.' Hastings later clarified that his remarks were 'not related to the matter at hand here.'"

Kildee Says Page Board Discussed Allegations Of Improper Conduct Toward Pages. Rep. Dale Kildee, the only Democratic member of the House Page board, said the board on Monday discussed allegations of improper conduct toward House pages which do not involve former Rep. Mark Foley. The AP (10/16, Margasak) reported that Kildee "would not elaborate on whether the discussion involved lawmakers. He said, however, that none of the allegations discussed have been proven." Kildee "commented after he testified before the House ethics committee on the Foley matter. … Kildee has said previously, and repeated again after his testimony, that he was not informed about Foley's e-mails and instant messages to former male pages until the scandal became public in late September."

DOJ_NMG_0081999

Foley Scandal Said To Show GOP Hypocrisy. In his Washington Post column (10/17, A21), Richard Cohen) says the Mark Foley congressional page scandal is "so far…the ultimate Washington sex scandal: There is no sex. Maybe there will be sex. Maybe some underage page or former page will be discovered to have had sex with Foley, but so far this has not happened. This lack of a physical victim -- with the arguable exception of Foley and the entire Republican Party, that is -- may explain why certain GOP congressional bulls, from committee chairmen to the speaker of the House himself, did not bolt from the joint, pulling every alarm on the way out." Cohen concludes, "A sex scandal-turned-political panic involving just one person lacks a certain something. That it has attained such critical mass, that it threatens the speaker of the House and the GOP majority, says little about the repellent Foley but a lot about how the GOP has been hoisted by its own petard."

Reid To Amend Ethics Report To Account For Land Deal. NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 5, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported on "Harry Reid of Nevada, the top Democrat" in the Senate, and "a story that continues to follow him." NBC (Reid) added "Harry Reid had this real estate deal. Eight years ago he bought land for $400,000 and sold it six years later. Made a $700,000 profit. His critics say he violated Senate rules because he did not report it on his Senate financial forms. He said he'll fix the forms if he has to. Today he decided to jump ahead and to amend those forms and give the full story. He still insists that the deal itself is perfectly legal."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, Blitzer) reported Reid is "amending his report to the ethics committee on a controversial land deal that earned him more than a million dollars. Reid did initially report it, but he's now facing new questions. He says he wants to account for the deal more fully. He also now says he failed to report two smaller land deals because of what he calls clerical errors."

The Washington Post (10/17, A4, Weisman, 748K) reports Reid "will amend four years of ethics reports to Congress to more fully explain a real estate transaction that allowed him to collect $1.1 million in 2004. At the same time, he said he will personally reimburse his political campaign $3,300 that his campaign fund contributed for the Christmas bonuses of support staff at the Ritz-Carlton in Washington, where he lives." The "actions, prompted by reports by the Associated Press, are proving to be a headache for Democrats as they press their case that Republicans have succumbed to a 'culture of corruption.' The land deal, in particular, has brought comparisons to a real estate transaction last year that netted House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) $2 million."

Roll Call (10/17, Billings, Ackley) reports while "admitting no wrongdoing, the top Senate Democrat said he has directed his staff to revise his ethics reports to make clear that he didn't sell the property in question in 2001, but merely transferred the title to the land to a limited liability corporation. Reid also said he would address 'two minor matters' left off his original disclosure forms relating to two smaller land transactions."

Reid Used Campaign Donations To Pay Condominium Tips. The New York Times/AP (10/17) reports Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "has been using campaign donations instead of his personal money to pay Christmas bonuses for the support staff at the Ritz-Carlton hotel here, where he lives in a condominium. Federal election law bars candidates from converting political donations for personal use." When "questioned about the campaign expenditures, Mr. Reid's office said Monday that his lawyers had approved them but that he nonetheless was personally reimbursing his campaign for the $3,300 he had directed to the staff holiday fund at his residence." The bonuses — "$600 in 2002, $1,200 in 2004 and $1,500 in 2005 — went from Mr. Reid's re-election campaign to an entity listed as the REC Employee Holiday Fund. His campaign listed the expenses as campaign 'salary' for two years, which Mr. Reid said was a clerical error, and as a 'contribution' one year."

The AP (10/17, Solomon) reports, "Back in 2000, Congress rebuked powerful House Transportation Committee Chairman Bud Shuster, R-Pa., for among other things creating the appearance, through poor record-keeping, that campaign committee expenditures were for personal rather than bona fide campaign uses." The Washington Times (10/17, 88K) also runs the AP story.

Many Relatives Of Members, Aides Lobbied Successfully For Clients. USA Today (10/17, Kelley, Eisler, 2.27M) reports, "No laws prevent family members from trying to influence lawmakers or top congressional staffers. Many have succeeded in getting millions for their clients, a USA TODAY investigation shows." While members of Congress "and their staffs are barred from using their positions for personal profit," their "spouses and other relatives can — and often do — cash in when lawmakers spend taxpayer dollars." USA found lobbying groups "employed 30 family members last year to influence spending bills that their relatives with ties to the House and Senate appropriations committees oversaw or helped write." They "connections are so pervasive that, in 2005 alone, appropriations bills contained about $750 million for projects championed by lobbyists whose relatives were involved in writing the spending bills." USA "found 53 cases in which relatives of lawmakers or their top aides worked at lobbying firms last year. In 30 instances, those relatives, or firms in which they are principals, sought money in the appropriations bills their family members or their family members' bosses helped write. Of those 30 relatives, 22 succeeded in getting specific language inserted in the bills that guaranteed money for their clients, USA TODAY found."

DOJ_NMG_0082000

USA Today (10/17, Kelley, Eisler, 2.27M) also reports, "Family ties give lobbyists insight into how legislation is written — and access to those who are in positions to secure millions for specific projects" through earmarks.

Abramoff Scandal Said To Highlight Need For Charity Reform. In a New York Times op-ed (10/17), Frances R. Hill, a professor of law at the University of Miami and director of the tax program at the Campaign Legal Center, says, "A report issued last week by the minority staff of the Senate Finance Committee details how the fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff exploited tax-exempt organizations — both sham nonprofits and otherwise legitimate charities — to move money from clients he disdained to congressmen he hoped to influence." The "primary attraction" of the groups to Abramoff "was their opacity: Their ability to raise money in any amount, without limit, from any individual or entity anywhere in the world without disclosing the contributors to anyone." This "grim report from the Senate Finance Committee's Democratic investigators should remind Congress and tax-exempt organizations that reform is overdue." The "guiding principle should be simple and direct: a politician's only relationship with a charity should be as a contributor. Elected officials should not accept travel or meals or golf course fees, even if they claim that participating in charity events will induce others to write checks for a good cause." Congress should "begin by eliminating exceptions in ethics rules, campaign finance laws or lobbyist registration laws for benefits channeled to politicians through nonprofit, tax-exempt entities."

Bush To Visit North Carolina School To Tout Success Of NCLB. In its broadcast last night, News 14 Carolina (10/16, 9:01 PM, Mathis) reported, "One Greensboro elementary school will be welcoming a very exciting visitor this week. President Bush is scheduled to visit Falkener Elementary School on Wednesday, and that means Greensboro has plenty of preparing to do in time for the president's big visit." Principal Amy Holcombe said, "I thought it was one of my brothers playing a joke on me at first." The school was selected as "a successful example of the No Child Left Behind legislation." Students "made a sign to welcome the president" and "the first dog, Barney." The school "will put all of its effort into making the school look great for President Bush's visit."

WGHP-TV High Point, North Carolina (10/16, 4:40 PM) reported, "The national recognition will spotlight the success Falkener has made in raising test scores. The majority of the school's students come from economically depressed backgrounds." Principal Holcombe said the school's success "comes after hard work and good student-teacher relationships."

Chairman Says TSP Could Grow To $200 Billion By Year's End. The Washington Post (10/17, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Account balances in the Thrift Savings Plan could grow to $200 billion by year's end, the chairman of the board that oversees the 401(k)-type plan for government employees said yesterday. Hitting $200 billion would make the TSP twice as large as four years ago, Andrew M. Saul , the head of the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, said at the board's monthly meeting."

USA Today Supports Spellings' Proposal For College Student Database. USA Today (10/17, 2.27M) writes in an editorial favoring a recent proposal by U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings to establish "a privacy-protected database that would collect information on all students attending college." The database "would open the way to comparative data and greater accountability." Claims by "private schools" that it would "compromise student privacy" are described as "dubious" and "hypothetical" while, "the need for a new system is real" because it would offer parents the answers to "many pressing questions" such as "what students actually pay, after financial aid," "why students drop out and where they go" and "what impact college has on their future success." American taxpayers and parents and students "deserve a more accurate picture of what they're getting for all that money."

DOJ_NMG_0082001

Meanwhile, David Shi, president of Furman University and chairman of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, replies to the editorial in USA Today (10/17, 2.27M) arguing that, "the proposed database would put at risk fundamental privacy rights, especially the right of students to control their academic records -- a federally protected right since 1972." Supporters of the plan are said to "ignore the wealth of data already available online" including "graduation and retention rates, financial aid data, estimated student expenses, degrees awarded and much more." Instead of a database, Shi favors a plan for the USED to "make this data user-friendly."

WPost Decries Brownback's Hold On Neff Nomination. The Washington Post (10/17, A20, 748K) editorializes, "If you thought that fights over judicial nominations couldn't get any worse, consider the case of Janet T. Neff, whom President Bush has nominated to a federal district judgeship in Michigan." Neff "once attended a commitment ceremony for a lesbian couple -- and that has Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R) reaching for the smelling salts and blocking the nomination. Mr. Brownback has said he wants to satisfy himself that the judge was not presiding over an 'illegal marriage ceremony' in Pittsfield, Mass., in 2002 -- before the state legalized same-sex marriage. He has written to Judge Neff asking for an explanation, his spokesman says, and will hold up her nomination until he learns the nature of the ceremony and its legality." Bush "has finally reached a compromise with Michigan senators to ease one of the more intractable irritants in the wars over lower court nominations. Judge Neff is a piece of that deal, all of which could get derailed if Mr. Brownback does not back off."

OTHER NEWS:

Economists Say Bush Taking Credit On Economy Where Little Is Due. The Washington Post (10/17, D1, Montgomery, 748K) reports that President Bush last week took credit for figures showing the federal budget deficit shrinking by 40 percent over the past two years, which he hopes will strengthen his push for additional tax cuts. Bush "hailed the dwindling deficit as a direct result of 'pro-growth economic policies,' particularly huge tax cuts enacted during his first term. … Economists said Bush was claiming credit where little is due. The economy has grown and tax receipts have risen at historic rates over the past two years, but the Bush tax cuts played a small role in that process, they said, and cost the Treasury more in lost taxes than it gained from the resulting economic stimulus." The Post adds, "Democrats criticized the president for celebrating a deficit that still ranks among 'the largest in our nation's history,' as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California put it. And they pointed to CBO projections that the deficit will rise again next year and balloon in coming decades as 78 million retiring baby boomers make claims on Social Security and Medicare."

Economist Says US Economy Doing Well. Brian S. Wesbury, chief economist at First Trust Advisors L.P., writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/17, 2.03M) that "it is getting harder for cynics and pessimists to argue that the US economy is doing poorly. But this does not stop them from trying. Lately, the old class-warrior standby, that 'Wall Street may be doing fine, but Main Street suffers,' is echoing down the alleyways. Fortunately, no matter how many times this theory bounces off the walls, there is little in the way of facts to back it up." Wesbury adds, "Massive positive revisions to employment and incomes, rising stock prices and a flood of new tax revenues paint a much different picture than conventional wisdom had expected. But history is clear. As long as government policies do not hinder entrepreneurship, the US economy can overcome even the most daunting of challenges. Have faith."

Dow Jones Edges Closer To 12,000 Mark. NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 6, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York today, so close but still no 12,000-mark for the Dow -- though the numbers were up. The Dow was up 20 points [to close at 11,980.60]. NASDAQ also up for the day about 6 and a half points [to close at 2,363.84]." The Wall Street Journal (10/17, C1, McKay, 2.03M) says "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock Index rose 0.3%, or 3.43 points, to 1369.05, up 9.7% on the year and at a new 5½-year high."

USA Today (10/17, Block, 2.27M), in a story about the stock market, says that if it "sustains its strong performance through the rest of the year, investors won't be the only winners. Charities will likely benefit, too. Historically, stock market performance has been closely correlated with charitable giving, research by the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University shows."

DOJ_NMG_0082002

As Drop In Gas Prices Continues, Analysts Dismiss Talk Of Price Manipulation. CBS Evening News (10/16, story 6, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The way things are going at the gas pump, there's no point in topping off your tank today. Chances are, the price will be even lower tomorrow. As of tonight, gas is the lowest it's been all year. A nationwide average of $2.23 a gallon. It hasn't been that low since last Christmas. But is this an election year present from President Bush to fellow Republicans?" CBS (Mason) reported, "Gas started going down just as the fall campaign started heating up. Coincidence? Some drivers don't think so." Unidentified male: "I think it's basically a ploy to sort of get the American people to think, well, the economy is going good, let's vote Republican." Mason: "Call the conspiracy theory crazy, but it's spreading through Internet blogs. And over the airwaves. A recent poll found 42% of people believe the Bush Administration has deliberately manipulated the price of gas to affect the election." Mason: "But analysts say there's no conspiracy." Andy Lapemiere, analyst, ISI Group: "It's preposterous." Mason: "Supply and demand determine gas prices, he says, and apart from controlling the relatively small Strategic Petroleum Reserve," Lapemiere: "There's virtually nothing the President can do to impact oil prices and gas prices." Mason: "In any case, Iraq is now weighing down President Bush's poll numbers. Lower gas prices have made Americans feel better about the economy, but they're not making them feel better about the President."

NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 8, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "As you no doubt recall, it was something of a crisis when [gas] prices hit their high at the peak of the summer driving season. Average price for a regular gallon back then hit $3.04. Now it's fallen to $2.23. We sent Kerry Sanders to a colorful part of the country this time of year, New England, to see if the lower prices are having an impact." NBC (Sanders) reported, "Everybody is affected by the price of gas." Sanders said, "The Pulaski family also thankful for lower prices but suspicious." Unidentified female: "I think it's pretty convenient given the elections are coming up." Sanders reported that lower gas prices "encouraged people to hit the back roads of new England this autumn."

Columnist Says Low Gas Prices Will Test Commitment To Alternative Fuels. In his "Eyes on the Road" column, the Wall Street Journal's (10/17, D7) Joseph B. White says October is "turning into a big month for alternatives to century old gasoline car technology" as various automakers have announced plans to increase production of gas-electric hybrids, so-called "plug-in" hybrids, and vehicles capable of running on ultra-low sulfur diesels. "To top it off," White notes that President Bush on Thursday "used the podium of a Renewable Energy Conference in St. Louis to express his enthusiasm for a wide range of oil-conserving technologies, including corn and cellulosic ethanol, fuel cells, and plug-in hybrids, as well as nuclear power, natural gas and coal." However, White says, "There's just one problem: Gasoline is once again getting cheap, or at least, cheapish." Bush said Thursday that the low gasoline prices are "not going to dim my enthusiasm for making sure we diversify away from oil," but White says the next several months "will be a test" of how committed Americans are to reducing their gas consumption. Toyota has "publicly defined success as selling 60,000 Camry hybrids a year," and White warns, "If the Camry misses that target, it could be a sign that President Bush is right to be worried about the resolve of Americans to end oil addiction, just because they should."

NYTimes Criticizes Bush's DOE On Appliance Standards. The New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "President Bush touched a lot of the right bases in a speech in St. Louis that focused on the urgent need for increased efficiency and alternative fuels to address the country's energy problems, including its dependence on imported oil. It would be helpful, though, if he could get his Department of Energy on the same page." Under Bush, the Department "has been more passive than ever, failing to issue a single strengthened efficiency standard" for appliances "since he took office."

White House Seeking To Solidify Support Among Talk Radio Hosts. The New York Times (10/17, Rutenberg, 1.21M) reports that last month, White House aides "ushered an influential group of conservative radio hosts into the Oval Office for a private audience with the president. For an hour and a half, Mr. Bush discussed his case for the war in Iraq, his immigration proposals and even the personality of his Scottish terrier Barney, who scratched on the door during the session until the president relented and let him into the office, according to several hosts who attended." The meeting, "which was not announced on the president's public schedule, was part of an intensive Republican Party campaign to reclaim and re-energize a crucial army of supporters that is not as likely to walk in lockstep with the White House as it has in the past." Conservative radio hosts "are breaking with the Republican leadership in ways not seen in at least a decade, and certainly not since Rush Limbaugh's forceful advocacy of the party in 1994 spawned a new generation of stars, said Michael Harrison, publisher of the industry's lead trade publication, Talkers." The "disgruntlement can now be found not only among the more flamboyant radio voices, like Michael Savage, who raged against Mr. Bush's proposals on immigration and other issues, but also among more mainstream hosts, like Laura Ingraham," who criticized the Republican leadership after the Foley page scandal. The "challenge now falls to party strategists to persuade the hosts to overcome the frustrations of many hard-core listeners over issues like spending and border security without alienating them." The effort will peak on Oct. 24, when the administration will hold something of a talk-radio summit meeting, inviting dozens of hosts to set up booths on the White House grounds, where top cabinet officials are expected to sit for interviews." Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman "has already been working overtime on the talk radio circuit. From Wednesday to Friday of last week, he was interviewed a total of 20 times in Missouri, Tennessee and Ohio, promoting party stances on tax cuts and terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0082003

Taxes, Terrorism Are Key Bush Campaign Themes. USA Today (10/17, Jackson, 2.27M) reports President Bush's "political pitch boils down to two words and one argument. The words are taxes and terrorism. The argument: Democrats are wrong on both." The themes "dominate the half-hour stump speech Bush gives on behalf of Republican candidates across the country. Seeking to preserve precarious GOP majorities in Congress, he has delivered nine campaign speeches in October and could give as many as 20 more before the elections Nov. 7." This week, Bush "will speak at a Republican National Committee dinner in Greensboro, N.C., and on behalf of two embattled GOP incumbents, Rep. Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania and Sen. George Allen of Virginia." Like an "old song with new verses, Bush's basic text is constantly updated. White House communications director Kevin Sullivan said most of Bush's speech comes from the president's handwritten notes, from an outline he developed." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said the president's stump speech also carries a 'subtext. He's got a plan, and it's not clear the other guys do.'" USA Today (10/17, 2.27M) also includes a chart outlining the standard Bush stump speech.

Cheney Remains A Big Draw For GOP Faithful In The Heartland. The New York Times (10/17, A1, Liebovich, 1.21M) reports "the heart of Cheney Country" consists of "hotel ballrooms, military bases and private homes deep in the reddest of red states like Kansas (where President Bush and Mr. Cheney won by 25 percentage points in 2004). As a rule, people still love Mr. Bush in Cheney Country, at least relative to some locales. But the president cannot be everywhere, so Mr. Cheney comes instead, exposing as he goes the durability and devotion of his party's base." Cheney is "dispatched around the country — to Topeka last week, to Casper, Wyo., the week before, and to Wyoming, Mich., the week before that — to preside over events largely ignored by the national news media but covered big-time by the local press." He "raises a lot of cash for the Republican Party and its candidates — more than $40 million at 114 events since January 2005, many of them in off-Broadway political settings like Topeka. And he reaps a full helping of love."

The Christian Science Monitor (10/17, Feldmann, 58K) reports on a trip as the pool reporter covering Vice President Cheney's visit to Topeka, Kansas, and New Orleans. On the flight, Lea Anne McBride, "Cheney's communications director, came back to talk to the reporters about the speech the vice president would be delivering in Topeka at a fundraiser for Rep. Jim Ryun (R). Cheney was still putting finishing touches on his remarks, but he would focus on the economy and security, with an emphasis on 'consequence,' she said. The meaning of that last part soon became clear when we received an advance copy of the text: what to expect if the Democrats take control of Congress." The speech was "classic Cheney - red meat for core Republican voters at a time when anxiety is high over the GOP-led Congress's poor public image, the Iraq war, and scandals. Congressman Ryun appears in no danger of losing his seat, but no one's taking any chances." It was Cheney's "113th campaign appearance in the current two-year election cycle. The event raised $215,000 for Ryun, boosting Cheney's total fundraising for Republican candidates and committees since March 2005 to $40 million."

GOP Maintains Cash Edge, Despite Democratic Fundraising Surge. USA Today

DOJ_NMG_0082004

(10/17, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Democratic candidates "out-raised their Republican opponents in nearly half of 27 tossup races for the House from July through September, new campaign finance reports show." Most of "the GOP candidates — 19 — had more cash on hand as of Sept. 30. And as of last week, the Republican Party and its allies were spending more heavily in the 27 districts." But independent analysts "called the Democratic surge unusual and said it suggests momentum for Democrats going into the final weeks of the campaign." Stuart Rothenberg said, "Most of the time the late money follows the winner, and the winner is mostly the incumbent." He added that this year, "the smell of Democratic victory is in the air." USA adds that six Democrats 'seeking open seats now held by Republicans in Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota and New York raised more money in the third quarter than their opponents. Another six challengers -- four in Pennsylvania and one each in North Carolina and Indiana — also pulled in more than their opponents."

The Washington Post (10/17, A5, Birnbaum, Goldfarb, 748K) reports that nonetheless, "Republican incumbents in highly competitive races in the House have a substantial cash advantage going into the final weeks before the midterm elections." Democrats "spent more heavily over the summer and early autumn than their Republican rivals in pivotal House districts, leaving themselves at a disadvantage of more than 2 to 1 in money on hand, according to a Washington Post analysis of the latest campaign disclosures." At the same time, Democrats "are on a better financial footing in open seats -- those in which an incumbent is not running. Of the 12 open House races considered tight, Republicans have more cash on hand in seven of them and Democrats are ahead in five, the Post analysis shows."

Roll Call (10/17, Whittington) reports House Republicans "are largely continuing to spend resources to boost the more than two dozen incumbents who appear more vulnerable by the day instead of diverting funds to second- and third-tier races that now look more promising for Democrats." The National Republican Congressional Committee "spent $9 million in independent expenditures on Friday — the largest one-day total for the committee this cycle — bringing the total number of races where the committee has invested at least $1 million for the general election to 18." The NRCC has "spent close to $1 million in at least two other contests, and all but one of these 20 seats are currently held by the GOP." House Democrats, "meanwhile, had spent more than $1 million in just three races as of Friday." House Republicans' "biggest investment so far — not counting the special election earlier this year in California's 50th district — has been in Ohio's open 18th district seat, where the NRCC had spent $2.35 million as of Friday to defend the district being vacated by Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), an admitted felon. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had spent almost $900,000 on the race by that same point." The NRCC "had spent $2.24 million on the effort to re-elect Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) as of Friday, making his 6th district race the second-most expensive for the committee."

Consensus Three Weeks Out Has Republicans Losing Only The House. The White House Bulletin/US News (10/16) reported, "Republicans are heading to defeat in the House and a close victory in the Senate, according to several political operatives and pollsters interviewed this morning." There is general agreement that Democrats "will pick up the needed 15 seats to claim the majority and will probably add another 10. But in the Senate, it appears that the Republicans will hang on to a one or two seat majority, according to the political insiders from both sides of the aisle." A GOP strategist said, "I have heard no political operative from our side saying we keep the House. In the Senate, though, the Democrats will pick up some but only gain to 49." The Bulletin adds a Republican pollster "speaking on background said the seat to watch in the Senate race is in Missouri, where Sen. Jim Talent is battling state auditor Claire McCaskill. 'Where Missouri goes, so goes the Senate,' he said." The pollster "also said that Pombo and Doolittle race in California are the ones to watch, suggesting if Republican Reps. Richard Pombo and John Doolittle lose, it's a signal the Democrats could pick up 25 or more seats." Pollster John Zogby in an email seemed to agree, saying, "Barring an October surprise or that vaunted Republican turnout machine versus ho-hum Democratic turnout, Democrats win the House and probably big."

White House "Insiders" Ponder Rove's Fate If Democrats Take The House. The White House Bulletin/US News (10/16) reported, "A big topic among White House insiders as the mid-term elections approach is the fate of Karl Rove if the Republicans lose control of the House or Senate. The consensus is that Rove's image will suffer, big time." "He will be taken a lot less seriously," a senior Republican strategist and informal White House adviser says. The Bulletin adds Rove's "luster has been diminishing in the GOP as the party's prospects for the mid-term elections look more and more bleak and as many Republicans blame the Bush administration for being too arrogant, inflexible, and isolated from its GOP allies on Capitol Hill and around the country." Rove's plan, "worked out in concert with Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman and White House political director Sara Taylor, is to make the November election a choice between individual Democratic candidates and individual Republicans, rather than a nationalized election based on Bush's record and the Iraq war. But, says the senior GOP strategist, 'it's increasingly clear that this is not a 'choice' election -- it's a referendum on Bush.' And whether or not this is fair to Rove, he will be blamed if the GOP suffers big reverses on November 7, GOP insiders say."

DOJ_NMG_0082005

Gerrymandering Seen As Limiting Voters' Influence. In a USA Today op-ed (10/17), Ross K. Baker of Rutgers University says, "House incumbents have always held an advantage when Election Day arrived. But the system is now virtually rigged to keep lawmakers entrenched in Washington. The danger: Power has shifted to lawmakers and away from the people." The practice of gerrymandering House districts "will bolster incumbents of both parties and probably limit Democratic gains in the upcoming midterm elections that have historically favored the party out of power. Worse, it places in the hands of a tiny minority of voters in a handful of congressional districts the responsibility for indicating, with their ballots, the direction of the nation over the next two years." Scientific gerrymandering, "and the astute use of other advantages that accrue to incumbents, have resulted in an electoral sea wall around the House of Representatives that can withstand all but the most powerful political tsunamis. This year, it appears that only the gentlest tides will be lapping against this redoubt, and even though Democrats need only a 15-seat gain to recapture the House, such a narrow majority would carry no mandate."

Rothenberg Not Ready To Add Democratic Long Shots To House Watch List. In his Roll Call column (10/17), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says he is "tempted to add anyone who could possibly ride a wave to victory" in House races, because it is "the easy way out, and I've always taken that route in the past. But I've decided that I won't do it this year — at least not yet. I won't add Reps. Scott Garrett (R) in New Jersey's 5th district, Mark Souder (R) in Indiana's 3rd, Jim Ryun (R) in Kansas' 2nd, Cathy McMorris (R) in Washington's 5th or other potentially threatened Republicans just because their Democratic opponents have an allegedly encouraging poll or are up with TV ads. While I can't completely rule out the possibility that some or all of them could drown in a Democratic tsunami, I believe the chances are so small that I can't bring myself to put them on a list of endangered incumbents. As I said, at least not yet." In Garrett's district, Democrat Paul Aronsohn "distributed a polling memo, based on an initial March survey and a late-September poll, that alleged his race against Garrett was 'tightening up' and that a Democratic victory was 'very possible.'" But "even though the Republican 'generic' number has slipped, and even though the 'wrong track' number and President Bush's job approval rating have eroded, Garrett's trial heat number has remained the same, just a whisker under the 50 percent mark." The situation "is a bit different, but only a bit, in Colorado's 5th district, where a media poll shows a dead heat between Democrat Jay Fawcett and Republican Doug Lamborn for the open seat of retiring GOP Rep. Joel Hefley." But the "fundamentals of Colorado's 5th are so terrible for Democrats that it's hard to believe Fawcett will win." For Democrats, "the more interesting long shots may include Rep. Melissa Hart (R-Pa.), whose 4th district gave Bush 54 percent of the vote in 2004 and 52 percent four years earlier. Or Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R), who represents a competitive district in southeastern Minnesota. A true national wave could hit hard in districts like those, creating opportunities that Democrats ought not have in a normal year. That's why both of these races now are on my list of Democratic challenges to watch."

Democrats Outraise Opponents In Key Senate Races. The Wall Street Journal/AP (10/17, A6) reports Senate Republicans "were outraised by Democratic opponents in key races in third-quarter fund-raising, setting the stage for a competitive campaign stretch." In Virginia, Sen. George Allen "reported raising $1.94 million in the quarter ended Sept. 30 compared with $3.3 million raised by his Democratic challenger Jim Webb." In Missouri, Democrat Claire McCaskill "outraised Republican Sen. Jim Talent by about $1 million. Mr. Talent reported $4.2 million still in the bank, while Ms. McCaskill reported $246,000 in cash on hand after a major final television ad buy." Democrat Bob Casey "reported raising $3.94 million in his campaign to unseat Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Rick Santorum. The Santorum camp reported having $3.6 million in the bank at the end of September; Mr. Casey reported $3.7 million."

DOJ_NMG_0082006

Lieberman Endorses Bolton For Confirmation As UN Ambassador. Sen. Joe Lieberman yesterday endorsed John Bolton for a permanent slot as UN Ambassador. The New York Daily News (10/17, Kennedy, 729K) reports that Lieberman's statement put him "at odds once again with Democrats, including his Senate colleague Chris Dodd. … 'I see no reason not to be for Bolton,' Lieberman told a meeting of the Daily News Editorial Board. 'Based on his capabilities -- and now based on his performance -- I believe Bolton is well-qualified,' he said."

Chafee, Whitehouse Revisit Familiar Themes In Second Debate. The Boston Globe/AP (10/17, Smith) reports Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee and Democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse "tangled over corruption, independence and the Republican Senate on Monday in their second radio debate." Whitehouse said, "The Bush administration has been a disaster for America and a disaster for Rhode Island." Chafee said Whitehouse's "record as a former state attorney general and U.S. attorney was one of 'incompetence and willful blindness.'" The Globe adds the "conversation continued the themes the candidates have focused on in recent days, with Chafee assailing Whitehouse's record as a prosecutor and saying he ignored corruption by friends of powerful Democrats, and Whitehouse tying Chafee to President Bush and the 'Republican agenda.'"

The Providence Journal (10/17, Peoples, 168K) reports the debate "was largely civil -- and largely repetitive." Chafee did "his best to turn the debate to local issues and Whitehouse's actions as a former U.S. attorney in Rhode Island, compared to Whitehouse's repeated efforts to focus on the direction of the country and other national issues such as health care and Iraq."

Allen Says His Conservative Position On Key Issues Will Win Race. The Washington Times (10/17, Bellantoni, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Sen. Allen "said that he will be re-elected by sticking to conservative issues, even as national liberals are funneling cash to his Democratic opponent and linking the senator to an unpopular president.." On Thursday, Allen will "appear with President Bush to refuel his campaign coffers in an effort to counter Democrat James H. Webb Jr.'s robust fundraising and to rally his anti-tax and socially conservative base." Allen said, "If it's based on issues, stands on issues, solutions, ideas and a proven record of performance, I think we're going to win. The people of Virginia know me as a senator and as a governor."

Mark Warner Campaigns With Webb. The Washington Times/AP (10/17, Barakat) reports, "Virginia's two most popular politicians jumped full-bore into the state's Senate campaign yesterday, with former Gov. Mark Warner promising to do all he can to get Democrat James H. Webb Jr. elected and U.S. Sen. John W. Warner making a joint televised appearance with Republican Sen. George Allen." Mark Warner, who "surprised political observers Friday by forgoing an anticipated run for the presidency, campaigned yesterday with Mr. Webb at a Fairfax County retirement community and said many more joint appearances are forthcoming." Meanwhile, Allen "for the second time in his campaign purchased a two-minute block at 7:58 p.m. yesterday in all of Virginia's broadcast markets -- this time for a taped joint appearance with Sen. Warner."

Don King Campaigns With Steele In Maryland. The Washington Times (10/17, Ward, 88K) reports, "Boxing promoter Don King yesterday campaigned with Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in Prince George's County and Baltimore, telling black voters to support Mr. Steele's U.S. Senate candidacy even though he is a Republican." King said, "For black people, there can't be a fealty to party. That's not fidelity to truth." The Times adds, "With his trademark hair standing straight up, Mr. King appeared with Mr. Steele at a cafe in Largo Town Center and then on a street corner in West Baltimore. The two then visited a youth boxing center." King "criticized the state Democratic Party for not promoting black leaders."

Corruption Seen As Key Issue In New Jersey Senate Race. The Washington Times (10/17, Fagan, 88K) reports profiles the New Jersey Senate race, noting the same "Democratic leaders who have long hoped to regain control of Congress by blasting a Republican 'culture of corruption' are in danger of losing their shot at the Senate because of accusations of corruption against Sen. Robert Menendez." Menendez "has been plagued by news reports that he's under federal investigation for a long-standing rental deal with a nonprofit group that received millions in federal funding while he was a House member." Republican Tom Kean Jr. has "hammered the Democratic incumbent in negative ads. And the criticism increased last month after the Philadelphia Inquirer reported a taped conversation in which a Menendez ally told a government contractor that he would have 'protection' if he hired a doctor with ties to Mr. Menendez." Democrats say "they're not surprised by the Republican focus on accusations of corruption but say Mr. Menendez will win anyway by linking Mr. Kean to President Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0082007

Brown's Pulitzer Prize-Winning Columnist Wife Aiding His Bid To Unseat DeWine. The Washington Post (10/17, C1, Slevin, 748K) runs a lengthy profile of OH13 Rep. Sherrod Brown's (D) wife, Connie Schultz, a Pulitzer Prize-winning columnist for the Cleveland Plain Dealer, who left the newspaper in February after her husband decided to run against Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine (R). The Post reports, "The campaign role is new to her. So, for practical purposes, is the marriage. Schultz and Brown met in 2003 when each was long divorced. … Brown, 53, is a doctor's son schooled at Yale. Schultz, 49, is a maintenance man's daughter who became her family's first college graduate. Yet with their progressive philosophy, their passion for the underdog and their gregarious flesh-pressing, there is no mistaking that they are a matched set." The Post adds, "Their collective decision to challenge DeWine, a family values conservative with an agreeable public persona in a state long dominated by Republicans, is the biggest political risk of their professional lives."

Candidates Build Presence On Popular Social Networking Websites. USA Today (10/17, Keen, 2.27M) reports candidates are "using popular websites Facebook, MySpace and YouTube for the first time to give their campaigns free publicity, reach young voters and bypass traditional media. Once they're online, though, they risk being mocked and losing control of their messages." Facebook.com "created 1,400 candidate profiles that listed names, states, parties and offices. Of those, about 300 are updated by candidates or their staffs, marketing director Melanie Deitch says." But what's "online can be embarrassing: •Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's Facebook profile has many posts from her Green Party rival, Howie Hawkins, who lists reasons he thinks the New York Democrat should be defeated." A Facebook search "for 'Mike DeWine' turns up the Ohio Republican senator's profile as well as links to several self-organized political groups of Facebook members. One group calls itself 'Mike Dewine and (Ohio Rep.) Deborah Pryce are tools,' a derisive slang for dupes."

Hillary Clinton's Avoidance Of Iowa Could Aid Rivals In 2008. The New York Times (10/17, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has zigzagged through much of the country" over the last three years, "bouncing among Ohio and California, New Jersey and Colorado, Pennsylvania and Michigan, raising tens of millions of dollars and meeting with legions of Democrats. But she has conspicuously bypassed Iowa, whose caucuses will be the first presidential nominating contest, and New Hampshire, the state with the earliest primary, where her last visit was even longer ago." Clinton's strategy is "a tacit recognition that crossing the border into a state that will matter early in 2008 would set off a cascade of attention and be tantamount to an official announcement that she is running for president." But "depending on how long she waits, her absence from Iowa also risks giving her Democratic rivals an opening to curry favor with voters here. Other candidates are already in a nearly constant march through the state, hiring operatives and seeking commitments from grass-roots organizers." Former Democratic National Committee Chairman Terry McAuliffe "acknowledges that 'the other candidates are there rounding up donors.'" McAuliffe added, "But beyond that, it doesn't matter at this point. She's in a unique position." The Times adds McAuliffe was quick to add Clinton "was engaged 'in a deliberative process,' deciding whether to run. 'Anybody who tells you she's running today is crazy,' he said." The Times adds, "Other strategists agree that if Mrs. Clinton does run, then the moment she begins to devote her attention to a presidential campaign her financial and name-recognition advantages will wash away any memory of the years she declined to visit Iowa and New Hampshire."

States Consider Privatizing Major Highways. USA Today (10/17, Kim, 2.27M) reports, "A number of states have looked at privatizing major highways to fill budget holes and cover the expense of fixing other crumbling roads. Gov. Jon Corzine of New Jersey is considering leasing the New Jersey Turnpike and other toll roads, while road privatization has emerged as an election topic in Illinois and Ohio. … Northern Virginia lawmakers have resisted toll hikes on the Dulles Greenway, which is privately run. Leaders in Harris County, Texas, defeated a proposal this year to privatize toll roads in the Houston area, deciding to run the road themselves." Indiana's East-West Toll Road "is in its fourth month of private operation. In July, a private Australian-Spanish consortium took over the 157-mile highway, which runs east from Chicago to the Ohio border. The consortium will operate, maintain and collect tolls on the road for 75 years. In return, it gave Indiana a one-time, lump-sum payment of $3.8 billion. … State Treasurer Tim Berry said Indiana has reaped more than $55 million in interest from the consortium's payment."

DOJ_NMG_0082008

US Population To Top 300 Million Today. NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 7, 3:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It will take place across this country tomorrow morning and if you didn't know it was coming, there's no way you would know." Today, "at 7:46 AM Eastern time and don't ask us how they estimate it, the US population will click over to 300 million. That's a lot more people in the same amount of space. Americans are on the move and they are heading in one basic direction it appears to be Southwest. That makes Nevada the fastest-growing state in the United States."

Missouri Amendment Said To Be Cloning Trojan Horse. In his syndicated column, running in the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (10/17) among other papers, Robert Novak says a new video "available on YouTube marks a late attempt by pro-life forces to avert serious defeat in Missouri Nov. 7, with national implications. Cathy Ruse, speaking for Missourians Against Human Cloning, declares: 'Amendment 2 is a fraud. It is an attempt to trick Missourians into approving -- in their Constitution -- human cloning, the right of biotech firms to do human cloning in Missouri -- something Missourians oppose by an overwhelming majority.'" Novak adds, "But Amendment 2 is identified for many Missouri voters by the language at the beginning of the five-page ballot initiative: 'No person may clone or attempt to clone a human being.' That explains why polls have shown a substantial margin of support for the constitutional amendment, which is also backed by key Republican politicians and business interests. It seems to offer the best of all worlds: government support of stem cell research without fear of cloning." But the initiative "so narrowly defines cloning as to open the door to any cloning procedure that takes place outside the womb. If this is approved by a state that historically is a barometer of national trends and is considered a pro-life stronghold, it will be a national model for breaking popular resistance to what the scientists and biotech companies want."

WPost Says Maryland Gubernatorial Candidates Didn't Keep Promises On Crime. An editorial in the Washington Post (10/17, A20, 748K) says, "As the Democratic candidate for mayor of Baltimore in 1999, Martin O'Malley set a goal of cutting the city's annual number of murders to 175; they were then running at more than 300 a year. He failed. … As the Republican candidate for governor of Maryland in 2002, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. also set a goal: to reform the state's decrepit, Dickensian system of juvenile jails. He also appears to have fallen short, though that record is not as easily quantified. … Messrs. O'Malley and Ehrlich, in the heat of the campaign homestretch, are busy bashing each other over issues of crime and punishment. They are key questions for voters throughout the state, particularly in the high-crime areas of Baltimore and Prince George's County, and they played a prominent role in the candidates' back-to-back debates this past weekend. … The hard problems of drugs and gangs are impediments to denting the problems that both men inherited. But the disappointing results in Maryland's juvenile jails and on Baltimore's rough streets raise questions about the managerial abilities of both candidates."

NYTimes Critical Of Legal Move By Blackwell Supporters. The New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) says in an editorial that Ohio Republican gubernatorial nominee Kenneth Blackwell, "who is also the Ohio secretary of state, could rule that his opponent is ineligible to run because of a technicality. We'd like to think that his office would not ultimately do that, or that if it did, such a ruling would not be allowed to stand. But the mere fact that an elected official and political candidate has the authority to toss his opponent out of a race is further evidence of a serious flaw in our democracy." Democrat Ted Strickland is leading Blackwell in the polls, and one Blackwell supporter has filed a residency challenge to Strickland's candidacy. The Times adds, "The complaint itself is without merit. No one disputes that Mr. Strickland lives in Ohio, or that he is registered." The case shows "election administration should be removed from partisan politics, in Ohio and everywhere else."

NYTimes Praises Bloomberg For Family Anti-Poverty Program. The New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) says in an editorial that New York is "searching for new ways to fight persistent poverty, and Mayor Michael Bloomberg's Commission for Economic Opportunity has recommended useful reforms. To encourage families to participate in these programs, the mayor hopes to recruit private donors to provide parents with a cash incentive to make the right choices for their children — like taking them in for regular checkups and making sure they stay in school." The idea is "based on a highly successful Mexican antipoverty program, known as Oportunidades, that is now being tried by at least 25 other countries." To "get payments for food, mothers must bring their children in for regular health checkups and attend informative talks at health centers."

DOJ_NMG_0082009

North Korea May Be Preparing For Second Nuclear Test. NBC Nightly News (10/16, lead story, 3:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported North Korea is now "a full-scale crisis." US intelligence "has picked up fresh evidence they might be planning yet another test on the very same day when we were able to confirm the first test was indeed the real thing." ABC World News (10/16, lead story, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) noted that "confirmation that the North Korean's did indeed set off a nuclear device last week, a small one. Air samples prove it, showing radioactive particles in air above the site of the blast and anticipation that North Korea may be on the brink of set off a second device." The New York Times (10/17, Shanker, Sanger, 1.21M) says that "confirmation of a plutonium-based weapon "strongly suggested that [Pyongyang's] second path to a nuclear bomb — one using uranium — was not yet ready."

An AP (10/17, Chang) report this morning focuses on a possible second test, saying Seoul and Tokyo "warily monitored unconfirmed reports Tuesday of possible preparations by North Korea for a second nuclear test. Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said his government has 'information' concerning media reports that North Korea could be laying the groundwork for another blast," while Seoul said it "also was aware of signs related to possible preparations." The CBS Evening News (10/16, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) showed Secretary Rice saying of the unconfirmed reports, "We're watching it, obviously, and discussing it with other parties as well. I think it goes to say that that would further deepen the isolation of North Korea and I hope they would not take such a provocative act."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, Malveaux) reported, "With confirmation that North Korea did, indeed, conduct a nuclear test and is possibly ready to carry out another, a measured warning from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." Rice: "It goes to say that that would further deepen the isolation of North Korea and I hope they would not take such a provocative act." The AP (10/17, Raum) reports Rice's tone yesterday "at times was conciliatory." She said, "Let's give some time to these sanctions to work. Let's give some time to the diplomacy to work. Let's see if North Korea can be pushed in a different direction. But we've got a much stronger set of tools with which to do that."

ABC World News (10/16, lead story, 2:20, Karl, 8.78M) said that in South Korea, "they were preparing for war. Wailing sirens sent people scurrying to underground bomb shelters. Just a drill, but considering the latest developments, a drill with added urgency."

Bush Says One-On-One Talks Would Not Work. President George W. Bush was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16) why the US will not talk to North Korea one on one. Bush said, "We tried that and didn't work," adding, "What I'm saying is there was kind of a good faith effort made to engage North Korea and try to convince them in a bilateral way to give up their weapons programs. There was an agreement made and they didn't honor the agreement. And so I decided since that didn't work, we ought to try another way forward in order to solve this problem peacefully and this is to have China at the table and South Korea at the table and Japan at the table and Russia at the table. My attitude is real simple on this. More voices saying the same thing to North Korea makes it more likely that we will be able to solve this issue peacefully."

In Asia, Rice Will Seek To Lock-Up Support For UN Resolution. Under the headline, "Rice Trip To Push Full Sanctions For North Korea," the Washington Post (10/17, A12, Kessler, Linzer, 748K) reports Secretary Rice "said yesterday that she will push for full implementation of U.N. sanctions against North Korea as punishment for its recent nuclear test when she makes a critical visit to Asia and Russia this week." She is quoted saying, "Every country in the region must share the burdens as well as the benefits of our common security." She "called on nations to 'collectively isolate' North Korea, adding that it 'cannot destabilize the international system and then expect to exploit elaborate financial networks built for peaceful commerce.' Rice also warned Iran…that the Security Council will begin work on a resolution condemning Tehran for not suspending" its uranium enrichment program. At a press conference, Rice "told reporters that on her trip she will reassure Japan and South Korea that 'the United States has both the will and capability to meet the full range of our security and deterrent commitments.' That is a diplomatic way of saying that the U.S. nuclear umbrella will make it unnecessary for those nations to consider developing their own nuclear weapons."

DOJ_NMG_0082010

The AP (10/17, Shrader) reports Rice "declared that UN sanctions prove the world is united in opposing Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions. Such strong opposition should be a warning to Iran, too, said Rice, who is leaving Tuesday morning for an Asian trip that is expected to be dominated by the nuclear issue." She "acknowledged international concerns of escalating the crisis and said she would address that on her trip." The AP adds that Pyongyang's "unpredictable behavior and its history of trading weapons and components makes its nuclear advancements particularly worrisome to its neighbors and the international community."

AFP (10/17) reports Rice "announced she would visit Russia later this week as part of a foreign tour focused on enacting tough UN sanctions against North Korea over its nuclear test. Rice said she would travel to Moscow following visits to Japan, South Korea and China in the wake of" the approval of UNSCR 1718. "'The purpose of my trip is to rally the support of our friends and allies in Northeast Asia for a comprehensive strategy,' she said."

The Financial Times (10/17, Dinmore, Sevastopulo) reports Washington "insisted on Monday on the right to intercept suspicious North Korean cargo under the authority of [UNSCR 1718], setting the stage for a difficult trip to Asia for" Secretary Rice. "Describing resolution 1718 passed unanimously as 'a very powerful tool,' Ms. Rice said it made possible the 'interdiction of dangerous and suspicious cargo. We expect every member of the international community to fully implement all aspects of this resolution and we expect the Security Council to aggressively monitor the process,' she said." The Times says, however, that Chinese PermRep Wang Guangya "disagreed, telling reporters: 'Inspections yes, but inspections are different from interception and interdiction.' He said the resolution did not make it mandatory for all nations to inspect cargo going to and from North Korea. States could carry out such an operation as necessary 'in accordance with their national legal authorities,' he said."

The AP (10/17, Guan, Ang) focuses its reporting on active Chinese enforcement of UNSCR 1718 along its 880-mile land border with North Korea. "At a border-crossing post in the Chinese city of Dandong, about 30 Chinese trucks were seen being checked on Monday morning while 50 empty North Korean trucks waited in line to enter China to pick up cargo. Customs officers opened the back of each truck and looked at its cargo as it rolled up, though they didn't open individual boxes or bags. By contrast, reporters who visited the border post last week didn't see inspectors open any trucks." Furthermore, "in a sign of Beijing's wariness about refugees, construction of a massive concrete and barbed wire fence along parts of [the border] has picked up in recent days. Scores of soldiers have arrived in communities along the banks of the Yalu River, up from Dandong, over the past week to erect the barrier, farmers and visitors to the area said."

USA Today (10/17, Nichols, Slavin, 2.27M) reports that China, "which had expressed concerns about inspecting cargo bound for North Korea, on Monday checked trucks going to North Korea from the city of Dandong." China's UN ambassador "said Beijing would not stop and board ships, however."

The AP (10/17, Klug) quotes R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, saying, "We have indications this morning the Chinese are beginning to apply this to their very long land border" with North Korea, and "we also have announcements from Japan and Australia. I spoke to both governments this morning. They are both implementing this." He added "there will be 'enormous pressure on China to live up to their responsibility' in enforcing United Nations punishment of its ally, North Korea. 'We are all banking on that.'" White House press secretary Tony Snow "said President Bush had not personally been making any calls Monday on the matter. Snow urged patience before judging China's commitment to the inspections."

The CBS Evening News (10/16, story 2, 2:30, Pizzey, 7.66M) reported, "To be effective, the new UN sanctions must isolate North Korea even more than it already is and the China/North Korea border crossing may be the most crucial. Controls along that 880-mile long frontier appear to be more stringent today, even after China said it was lukewarm to the idea of inspecting North Korean cargo." Christopher Hill, Assistant Secretary of State: "I think this nuclear test has really brought us all much closer to China and brought China closer to us."

ABC World News (10/16, story 2, 2:30, Litke, 8.78M) said "the Chinese government opposes tougher sanctions that could lead to the sudden collapse of North Korea and a flood of desperate Korean refugees. So, while China is still furious with the North for carrying out its nuclear test, it was clear from the traffic jam across the Yalu River today, the Chinese are not ready to abandon their troublesome neighbor -- not yet."

DOJ_NMG_0082011

Abe Said To Seek More "Active Role" For Japan. An analysis piece in the Wall Street Journal (10/17, A6, Hayashi, 2.03M) reports UNSCR 1718 "provides a new test for Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe: how to play an assertive role without straying from the nation's nonmilitaristic constitution." Tokyo "is trying to figure out how to participate in a provision of the resolution…that allows nations to board North Korean ships suspected of carrying banned items and inspect their cargo." The Journal adds, "Japan's pacifist constitution would make it difficult for it to inspect any ships," however, "officials are considering invoking for the first time a clause in a 1999 law that allows its self-defense forces to provide support functions to the U.S. military under a special situation: if Japan faces an emergency situation in the Asian region in which a direct military attack on the country seems imminent." Tokyo's "attempt to play an active role in condemning North Korea reflects an attempt by [Abe] to give Japan greater influence in East Asia. … It also is the latest example of Japan's effort to have its military, known as Self-Defense Forces, take on greater responsibility outside its borders."

Bush Says Putin Agrees Iran Cannot Have A Nuclear Weapon. President George W. Bush said on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16), "I had a good talk with Vladimir Putin the other day about the Iranian issue and he knows full well that Iran cannot have a nuclear weapon. Those weapons can fly west or they can fly north." Asked why Russia is selling Iran all kinds of weaponry, Bush said, "I don't think he is arming Iran to the point where they are using a lot of Russian weapons in the theater. There were a lot of Russian weapons in Iraq before we even got there. And of course that would concern me if there is a lot of evidence that he's doing that. I'm concerned -- I do believe, however, that he understands the strategic importance of making sure Iran doesn't have a nuclear weapon. Let me say this. To the extent that we find anybody helping the enemy inside of Iraq we bring our concerns forward."

Moscow May Link Iran UN Vote To Russian Firms' Sanctions. The AP (10/17, Lederer) reports Moscow "demanded Monday that the United States lift sanctions against two Russian companies accused of making deals with Iran involving sensitive technology and hinted that a U.S. refusal could affect negotiations on a U.N. sanctions resolution against Tehran." PermRep Vitaly Churkin "said the sanctions against state arms exporter Rosoboronexport and top aircraft maker Sukhoi for allegedly violating a U.S. law known as the Iran Nonproliferation Act of 2000, create a 'predicament' for Moscow." He "said Russia wants the sanctions lifted off the two companies, whether or not U.N. sanctions are leveled against Iran." Washington "alleges the Russian companies have made deals with Iran involving sensitive technology. Russia has objected to the U.S. law, and both Russian companies deny any violation."

Administration Said To Have Eased Push For Egyptian Democratization. Under the headline, "US Eases Push For Egypt Reforms," USA Today (10/17, Slavin, 2.27M) reports, "Last year, [Secretary Rice] canceled a visit to Cairo to protest the arrest of an Egyptian opposition leader, Ayman Nour. … When Rice visited here earlier this month during a tour of the Middle East, not much had changed: Nour was back in jail, along with thousands of other political prisoners; and political reforms seemed to be on hold." The Administration, "like its predecessors — Republican and Democratic — has supported Egypt with an annual $2 billion in aid since Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel. In the aftermath of 9/11, however, President Bush began calling for democratic reforms in Egypt and the wider Middle East," and now "Rice says that there has been no change in policy." USA Today adds that "recent events in the Middle East have complicated U.S. efforts to push democracy" in Egypt, and Rice "said the Bush administration has not given up on democratic reforms but that each country has to move at its own pace."

Olmert Says He's Willing To Meet With Lebanese And PA Leaders. The New York Times (10/17, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told the Israeli Parliament on Monday that he was willing to meet the leaders of Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority in an effort to ease regional tensions, though no such meetings appear imminent." It was "the first day of Parliament's winter session." Olmert said, "I want to take this opportunity to call on Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora to meet with me face to face." In Beirut, "Siniora's office issued a statement saying that he had 'announced more than once that Lebanon will be the last Arab country to sign a peace deal with Israel.'"

Meanwhile, McClatchy (10/17, Nissenbaum) reports, "In the wake of this summer's war in Lebanon, the Golan

DOJ_NMG_0082012

Heights have re-emerged at the center of the latest land-for-peace proposal that some see as a chance to reshape regional dynamics. In an unexpected move, Syrian President Bashar Assad has offered to end his conflict with Israel if it gives back the disputed territory it's held for nearly 40 years." Olmert "and influential US diplomats have rejected the proposal as a meaningless feint from a weak authoritarian ruler." But "others, including a growing number of influential Israelis, see the offer as an opportunity to jump-start dormant negotiations at a time when the Middle East is drifting towards further instability."

Six States Require Pension Funds To Divest From Darfur. USA Today (10/17, Lynch, 2.27M) reports, "A courtroom battle over an Illinois law requiring state pension funds to sell any investments linked to Sudan is shaping up later this month as a critical test for a grass-roots movement seeking to pressure the regime behind the Darfur genocide. Illinois is one of six states that over the past year have passed laws requiring their pension funds to divest themselves of stakes in companies that do business in Sudan, a central African nation that has been consumed by warfare almost continuously since it became independent in 1956." USA adds, "Other human rights activists want to use divestment to discourage corporate activity in Sudan and ultimately cause Sudanese leaders to halt their support for the militias that are killing and raping in Darfur."

Sri Lankan Suicide Bomber Kills 94 Sailors And Civilians. The New York Times (10/17, Senanayake, 1.21M) reports, "A suicide bomber rammed a truck packed with explosives into a military convoy on Monday, killing at least 94 people and wounding 150. The explosion, about 100 miles northeast of the capital, was one of the deadliest attacks since a 2002 cease-fire between the government and separatist Tamils." Sri Lankan officials "blamed" the Tamil Tigers "for the attack, a charge the group neither acknowledged nor denied. The vast majority of those killed and wounded were sailors, but a military spokesman said some civilians were caught in the explosion." However, Colombo said it "still planned to attend peace talks with the rebels, which are being brokered by Norway and are to resume Oct. 28 in Geneva after an eight-month hiatus. The separatists have said they may back out of the talks." The Times calls the bombing "yet another sign that the four-year-old cease-fire was no longer being observed, even though neither the government nor the rebels have publicly disavowed it." The Washington Post/AP (10/17, A16, Francis) also reports the story.

Venezuela, Guatemala Deadlocked In Bid For Security Council Seat. The Washington Post (10/17, A13, Lynch, Forero, 748K) reports Caracas "was stymied Monday in its bid to win a seat on the UN Security Council, a result that shocked diplomats who had expected President Hugo Chavez's leftist, oil-rich government to gain a platform on the international stage. Guatemala finished ahead of Venezuela in nine of the first 10 rounds of secret" UNGA balloting, "but neither secured the required two-thirds vote to succeed Argentina" in the rotating Latin American seat. Caracas "never did better than a 93 to 93 tie with Guatemala. Afterward, several envoys expressed surprise that Venezuela had fared so poorly." The Post says the outcome "came as a relief to the United States, which had lobbied actively on behalf of Guatemala," and is "a personal blow to Chavez, who had run a costly political campaign that involved millions of dollars in aid to poor countries as well as state visits to Russia, China and the Middle East." Also, "South Africa, Indonesia, Italy and Belgium were easily elected Monday for their regions."

In more positive tones, the New York Times (10/17, Hoge, 1.21M) reports Caracas' "campaign…suffered a setback on Monday when Guatemala, backed by the United States, established a wide lead and maintained it after 10 ballots." Guatemala City "ended the day with a lead of 110 to 77," and the voting continues today "and could last days, until one prevails or the Latin American group decides to bring forth a compromise candidate." The Times calls the vote "a distinct blow to the ambitions of Hugo Chávez," who seeks "a global platform to vent his grievances against Washington." Ambassador Bolton is quoted saying, "In the year 2000, I was in Florida for 31 days. This has just begun."

The AP (10/17, Wadhams) adds, "Neither Venezuela nor Guatemala appeared willing to drop out of the election." Yesterday's voting "reflected the ambivalence toward Guatemala, the preferred American candidate. Even Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal had earlier expressed discomfort about the highly public American campaign against Venezuela and in support of Guatemala."

Ecuadorian Leftist May Have Been Hurt By Link To Chavez. The New York Times (10/17, Romero, 1.21M) reports, "Rafael Correa, the charismatic economist who garnered a surprisingly weak showing Sunday in the first round of voting for president, finds himself in a situation that has plagued leftists in other Latin American elections this year: defending his ties to President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela." Álvaro Noboa, "a conservative banking and banana magnate, surged ahead by attacking Mr. Correa's admiration for Mr. Chávez and his advocacy of nationalistic economic proposals that seemed inspired by Mr. Chávez's policies. The two candidates are expected to compete in a runoff election on Nov. 26. Noboa "called Mr. Correa a 'friend of terrorists, a friend of Chávez, a friend of Cuba.'"

DOJ_NMG_0082013

Mexico's PRD Loses Key State Election. The New York Times (10/17, McKinley, 1.21M) reports, "The leader of the Mexican left, who has refused to accept his defeat in the summer's presidential race, saw his party take a beating over the weekend in a governor's race widely viewed as a referendum on his charisma and power as a populist. Though aides to the leftist leader, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, dismissed the loss as a minor setback, his detractors noted that it was the latest in a string of signs that he is losing public support, even in his home state, Tabasco." Sunday's election for governor in Tabasco, "in the south, suggested that Mr. López Obrador's ability to sway voters has waned since the presidential race. Returning to his home state, Mr. López Obrador, the former mayor of Mexico City, campaigned hard for weeks on behalf of his party's candidate, César Raúl Ojeda. He often upstaged the candidate during the final days of the campaign."

The Christian Science Monitor (10/17, Llana, 58K) notes Tabasco "voted heavily for Mr. Obrador" in the presidential race. Sunday's defeat of the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD) candidate, "is being viewed as a referendum on the future of Obrador's national protest movement." The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Enriquez, 918K), among other newspapers, also reports the story.

Victims Of Colombian Paramilitaries Criticize Decommissioning Process. The Washington Post (10/17, A14, Forero, 748K) reports, "In the midst of a relentless conflict, Colombia's government and its ally, the Bush administration, are hailing the demobilization of 32,000 fighters from right-wing paramilitary groups -- a disarmament that authorities here say is larger than any of those that closed out Central America's civil wars in the 1990s." However, the Post says, a "far more critical picture of the disarmament has emerged" from reports that "paramilitary commanders have killed hundreds of people in violation of a cease-fire, trafficked cocaine and stolen millions of dollars from state institutions they had infiltrated." Sen. Patrick Leahy is one of the "lawmakers on Capitol Hill have also voiced concerns about the disarmament," and he is quoted saying, "The demobilization process has been as much about avoiding justice and consolidating ill-gotten gains as it has been about disarming the paramilitaries. The government needs to stop appeasing the leaders of these outlaw militias and listen more to their victims." Even "critics acknowledge that the disarmament has yielded benefits," and "Colombian officials are pledging to conduct exhaustive investigations of paramilitary atrocities and launch trials of the militias' most bloodthirsty commanders." However, "in communities hit hard by paramilitary violence, …victims are incredulous about the government's lofty claims. Once fearful that speaking out could get them killed, they are increasingly organized and assertive. And they are sharply criticizing a process that they say is tilted more toward whitewashing crimes than punishing perpetrators."

China's Extensive Foreign Exchange Reserves Give It Unprecedented Clout. On its front page today, the Wall Street Journal (10/17, A1, Browne, 2.03M) reports China's approach of the $1 trillion mark in foreign-exchange reserves "has made Beijing a colossus in the financial world, cushioned against shocks at home, but potentially able to trigger them abroad." Chinese actions have "major repercussions for the global economy," and, "for the U.S., how China deploys its reserves is a question of some consequence." Some US experts "fear that China might one day dump its holdings of dollar-based assets, setting off a tidal wave of sales that might swamp the U.S. economy. Despite such fears, there's no sign that China is making a major move out of dollars and into euros or other foreign currencies, even though Chinese economists have occasionally warned that the weak dollar holds down the value of China's holdings." It's "enormous nest egg adds to its ability to project its influence around the world." The Journal says this wealth is "a direct result of China's effort to manage the exchange rate of its currency," however, "Chinese central bankers also worry that the plentiful supply of yuan is overheating China's economy and causing unwelcome inflation."

DOJ_NMG_0082014

Wal-Mart Close To Purchasing Chinese Retailer For $1 Billion. The New York Times (10/17, A1, Barboza, Barbaro, 1.21M) reports that Wal-Mart is "laying the groundwork to become the biggest foreign chain in China with the $1 billion purchase of" Taiwanese-owned Trust-Mart, a major retailer in China. This "represents a large step for Wal-Mart's strategy in China, allowing the American retailer to more than double its presence in a country that, despite its size and growing middle class, remains largely untapped by foreign retailers." The Times adds, "Wal-Mart expects to close the deal for Trust-Mart by the end of the year, but it still needs approval by Chinese authorities, according to a person briefed on the transaction. … The deal puts Wal-Mart neck-and-neck in China with Carrefour, the giant French retailer, which also bid for Trust-Mart. Wal-Mart, which has only 66 stores in China compared with Carrefour's more than 200, outbid not only Carrefour, but also Tesco of Britain and one of China's large retailers, Lianhua."

The Financial Times (10/17, Politi, Foster) reports, "People close to the talks said Wal-Mart had edged out France's Carrefour and local competitors but warned that details remained to be finalised and the deal could collapse.. A purchase of Trust-Mart, which is privately owned by Taiwanese entrepreneurs, would represent one of Wal-Mart's largest recent acquisitions. It highlights how China has become an important battleground for international supermarket chains as its rapid urbanisation and rising living standards create a new consumer class."

NYTimes Pans French Attempt To Outlaw Denial Of Armenian Genocide. The New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) editorializes, "We've argued many times that Turkey must come to grips with the crimes of its past and stop prosecuting writers who mention the Armenian genocide of the early 20th century. But we found it as absurd and as cynical when the French National Assembly voted overwhelmingly last week to make it illegal — on pain of a fine and imprisonment — to deny that there was an Armenian genocide." Turkish efforts to accept their history do "not excuse the way French politicians are trying to exploit anti-Turkish feelings while playing up to the large Armenian-French constituency." The legislation "could further fan anti-Muslim feelings in France," and is "a blow to freedom of expression." While European bans on Holocaust denial may also "violate freedom of expression," the "Armenian question poses no dangers in France. Playing politics with it trivializes not only the Holocaust, but also the Armenian genocide."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Teens' Dancing Is Freaking Out The Adults."
"Final Answer: Vietnam."
"The Post-Burning Question: Log It Or Leave It?"
"Victims' Families Sentenced To Silence."
"Gov. Keeps The Spotlight On."

USA Today:

"Relatives Have 'Inside Track' In Lobbying For Tax Dollars."
"Hit-Run Deaths See 20% Increase."
"U.S. Confirms N. Korea Blast Was Nuclear."
"Politicians' Campaigns Invade MySpace."

New York Times:

"Wal-Mart Said To Be Acquiring Chain In China."
"Iraq's Christians Flee As Extremist Threat Worsens."
"Skills Gap Hurts Technology Boom in India."
"Lawyer, Facing 30 Years, Gets 28 Months, To Dismay of U.S."
"Criminal Records Erased By Courts Live To Tell Tales."
"Cheney Hits Heartland, And He Can Feel The Love."

Washington Post:

"Families Flee Iraqi River Towns On 4th Day Of Sectarian Warfare."
"53% Of Voters Say They Back Va. Gay Marriage Ban."
"U.S. Faces Guantanamo Obstacles."
"Homes Raided In Rep. Weldon Influence Probe."
"In-Flight Fires An Unresolved Safety Threat."
"FDA Is Set To Approve Milk, Meat From Clones."

Washington Times:

"U.S. Verifies Korea Test Was Nuclear."
"Allen Touts Conservative record, Ideas."
"haven Fillings Move Up After Fall."
"Reid Used Campaign Funds Too Pay Bonuses To Staff."
"Afghans Need Shovels, Not Guns."
"Senate Hopes To Hinge On Corruption Charges In N.J."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"N. Korea Bomb Used Plutonium."
"Living High In Atlanta."

DOJ_NMG_0082015

"GOP Lawmakers Team Up To Fill Party Checkbook."
"Get Skinny Minnie: Disney To Serve, Endorse Healthier Food."

Houston Chronicle:
"Unrelenting Deluge Turns Deadly For 4."
"'Texas Of Today' Is a Mirror For The U.S. Of Tomorrow."
"Debrillators Ordered Into High Schools After 4 Deaths."
"Builder's $8 Million Tops GOP Donor List."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: : North Korea; China & North Korea-Sanctions; Iraq Sectarian Violence; A Fallen Soldier's Dream; Houston Flooding; Hawaii Earthquake; More American Commuters; Uninsured In America; Madonna's Baby Adoption.
CBS: North Korea; China & North Korea-Sanctions; Hawaii Earthquake; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Crawford Guilty Plea; Gas Prices-Election 2006; Violent Crime; Football Fight; More Time For Commuters; George Washington's Real Face; Bob Dylan Musical.
NBC: North Korea; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Hawaii Earthquake; Houston Flooded; Legislators Under Fire; Stock Market; Population Growth-Nevada; Gas Prices; Lawyer In The Family; School Bands Of New Orleans.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: North Korea-Nuclear Test; Santorum-Casey Debate.
CBS: North Korea-Nuclear Test; Rice-Asia Trip; Iraq-US Troop Levels; Lidle Memorial Service; New Orleans-Ships Collide.
NPR: Rice-Asia Trip; Weldon-DOJ Investigation; Report-US Power Grid; HI-Earthquake; Wall Street; Stewart Sentenced; SCOTUS-Boy Scout Case.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Signs S.3930 - Military Commissions Act of 2006. Rose Garden; participates in ceremonial swearing in for the Secretary of Transportation, FAA offices, 800 Independence Ave. SW.; meets with the Prime Minister of Croatia. Oval Office.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Attends the Teddy Roosevelt and the Treasure of URSA Major, Kennedy Center.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: PRESIDENT ELLEN JOHNSON SIRLEAF OF LIBERIA _ Highlights: 2:30 p.m. Makes a ``major'' foreign policy address. Gaston Hall, 3rd floor, Healy Hall, Georgetown University. Event contact: Andrea Sarubbi, 202-687-4328. Note: Media RSVP requirfed. Preset at 10:30 a.m.

PRIME MINISTER IVO SANADER OF CROATIA _ Highlights: 2:30 p.m. Meets with President Bush. White House.

ACLU MEMBERSHIP CONFERENCE _ The ACLU holds its 2006 Membership Conference. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. Hill visits -- ACLU delegations lobby Congress. 1 p.m. Lunch Plenary: ``Abuse of Power: Law, American Values and National Interest'' featuring: Alberto Mora, former Navy General Counsel; John Dean, former Nixon White House Counsel, Katrina vanden Heuvel, Publisher/Editor of The Nation; ACLU Legal Director Steve Shapiro, and moderated by Jackie Northam. Location: Marriott Wardrman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

NONPROFITS _ The National Council of Nonprofit Associations holds its Non-Profit Summit. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

US-CHINA _ Meeting of the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission. Location: Hall of the States, 444 N. Capitol St.

NUCLEAR FUELS _ The National Academies holds a conference on the internationalization of the civil nuclear fuel cycle. Highlights: 9 a.m. Session on DOE efforts in new nuclear energy and international fuel cycles. 10 a.m. Session on technology for advanced nuclear fuel cycles, with Phillip finck of Argonne National Lab. 4:15 p.m. Session on nonproliferation and institutional considerations, with National Nuclear Security Administration Deputy Administrator Will Tobey. Location: 2100 C St. NW.

US-EUROPE _ 8:30 a.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a day-long conference on challenges for the 21st century in fence mending between the U.S. and its European allies. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Session on security and defense, with Adam Kobieracki of NATO, others. Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW. 10:30 a.m. Keynote address - Leszek Balcderowicz, President, National Bank of Poland. Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW. 1 p.m. Address by Francis Fukuyama, director of the SAIS International Development Program. Washington Club, 15 Dupont Circle.

DOJ_NMG_0082016

COMPUTERS-TELECOM _ 9 a.m. - 6 p.m. The Computer Science and Telecommunications Board of the National Research Council celebrates its 20th anniversary with a symposium that looks at the future of computer science and telecommunications. Speakers include: William A. Wulf, president, National Academy of Engineering, Washington, D.C.; Eric Schmidt, CEO, Google, Mountain View, Calif.; Jon M. Kleinberg, professor of computer science, Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y.; .Rick Rashid, senior vice president for research, Microsoft Corp., Redmond, Wash.; and Prabhakar Raghavan, Yahoo! Research, Berkeley, Calif. Location: Lecture Room, National Academy of Sciences building, 2100 C St. NW.

300 MILLIONTH AMERICAN _ 7:46 a.m. The US Census Bureau's Population Clock ticks off the birth of the 300 millionth American. Location: Census Bureau headquarters, 4700 Silver Hill Road, Suitland, Md.

PAKISTANI MILITARY-POLITICS _ 8 a.m. - 10 a.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace sponsors a discussion," Disengaging Military from Politics," with Pakistani Lt. Gen. Asad Durrani. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

RELIGIOUS-ANTIWAR PROTEST _ 9 a.m. Religious groups protest a White House signing ceremony that they say legalizes torture. Location: Front of White House, Lafayette Park.

LUJAN AWARD _ 10 a.m. Interior Department presents the 2006 Manuel Lujan, Jr. Champions Awards to department employees for their work in carrying out the agency's mission. Location: Yates Auditorium, main Interior.

CONTRIBUTIONS-CONGRESS _ 10:30 a.m. Public Citizen holds a telephone briefing to release a report on how much money members of Congress have received from special interest sources. Contacts: Robert Yule, 202-588-7703. Notes: Callin number: 800-377-8846; passcode: 36707396.

CHINA-SECURITY _ 11 a.m. The Heritage Foundation sponsors a forum, ``Shaping China's Security Environment The Role of the People's Liberation Army." Speakers: Larry M. Wortzel, chairman, U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission; and Andrew Scobell, research professor of National Security Affairs, Strategic Studies Institute, U.S. Army War College. Location: Heritage Foundation's Lehrman Auditorium, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

MILITARY COMMISSIONS _ 12 p.m. The Open Society Institute holds a telephone briefing with former CIA Inspector General Fred Hitz, criminal trial lawyer Neal Sonnett, others, on the new provisions of the Military Commissions Act of 2006. Notes: Callin number: 800-210-9006; passcoce: 7848100.

PENTAGON-AFGHANISTAN _ 12 p.m. UK Army Gen. David Richards, commander of NATO's International Security Assistance Force, will brief live from Afghanistan with an update on stability and security operations in Afghanistan. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

INDIA _ 12:30 p.m. Arun Shourie, member of India's upper house of parliament, discusses choices facing his nation in the 21st century, sponsored by the School of Advanced International Studies. Location: Room 500, 1717 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CHERTOFF _ 1 p.m. Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff speaks to the US Chamber of Commerce and American Chambers of Commerce in Latin America. Location: Hall of Flags, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, 1615 H St. NW.

DEMOCRATS-SENATE RACES _ 2:30 p.m. Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) Chair Chuck Schumer will hold a pen and pad briefing to discuss the latest developments in the Senate races. Location: Mott House, 122 Maryland Ave. NE.

JACOBY-IMMIGRATION _ 3 p.m. - 4 p.m. Tamar Jacoby, senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute and the editor of ``Reinventing the Melting Pot: The New Immigrants and What It Means to Be American," participates in a media conversation on immigration issues. Jacoby says that immigrants have a minimal affect on American wages, and argues that the full impact of immigration on the U.S. economy may be immeasurable and, therefore, is greater than often recognized. Notes: Open to media only. Please RSVP by 5 p.m. Monday, Oct. 16, to NYpressRSVPcfr.org.

BANGLADESH ELECTIONS _ 3 p.m. - 5 p.m. The US Commission on International Religious Freedom holds a public, on-the-record forum on ``The Bangladesh Elections: Promoting Democracy and Protecting Rights in a Muslim-majority Country." The forum will coincide with the release of the Commission's latest publication, ``Policy Focus on Bangladesh," which includes recommendations for US policy to advance respect for human rights in the world's third largest Muslim-majority country. Location: Room 2168, Rayburn House Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0082017

TRADE DEBATE _ 4 p.m. - 5 p.m. The National Press Club hosts a debate, ``The Choice between Free Trade and Fair Trade, between Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., author of Take This Job and Ship It: How Corporate Greed and Brain-Dead Politics Are Selling Out America;" and C. Fred Bergsten, director of the Institute for International Economics, and former assistant secretary of the Treasury for international affairs. Location: National Press Club, Lisagor Room.

SCHWAB _ 6:30 p.m. USTR Susan Schwab attends the Financial Services Forum dinner. Location: Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Maryland Ave. SW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, OCTOBER 17, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Stewart Sentenced To 28 Months In Prison, Much Less Than Prosecutors Wanted ... 3
Jury Seated For Salah Trial ... 4
Allies Blocking Return Of Gitmo Detainees ... 4
Skelton, Hoyer Defend Democrats' Position On Detainee Bill ... 4
Rickard Says Military Commissions Act Should Have Been Rejected ... 4
Kristof Denounces Detention Of Al Jazeera Cameraman ... 4

Homeland Response:

DOD To Require Anthrax Shots For Troops, Contractors ... 5
TWIC Expected To Expose US Ports' Reliance On Undocumented Workers ... 5
Critics Blast Ashcroft Over Criticism Of 9/11 Panel ... 5
Louisiana Man Says FEMA Trailer "Did Its Job" Sheltering Him From Tornado ... 5

War News:

Bush Assures Maliki He Has Full US Support ... 6
Sunni Insurgent Faction Offers To Negotiate With US Forces ... 7
Sectarian Violence Continues In Iraq ... 7

DOJ:

Los Angeles US Attorney To Leave For Gibson Dunn ... 8

Corporate Scandals:

Senior KLA-Tencor Employees Lose Jobs In Options Backdating Scandal ... 8
UnitedHealth Shares Suffer With CEO's Departure ... 8
Comverse CEO Faces Additional Charges ... 9
Labor Department Sues Agway's Retirement Savings Plan ... 9
Hedge Fund Market Has Expanded In Recent Years ... 10
Schnitzer Settles Overseas Corruption Charges With SEC ... 10
Freddie Mac Hires New Finance Chief ... 10

Criminal Law:

Gonzales Pledges To Study Increase In Urban Crime ... 10
FBI Agents Search Homes Of Weldon's Daughter, Friend ... 12
Attorney For Doolittle In Talks With Justice Department ... 14
FBI Seeks Public's Help In Wales Murder Investigation ... 14
Betonsports Strikes Tentative Deal With Federal Prosecutors ... 14
Former FDA Chief To Plead Guilty To Conflict Of Interest Charge ... 14
NYC Assemblyman Expected To Face Corruption Charges Today ... 15
Protesters Urge FBI To Investigate Botched Kentucky Murder Probe ... 15
Pellicano Continues To Oppose Trial Delay ... 15
Ohio Fundraiser Goes On Trial ... 16
Ralph's Grocery Chain Enters Guilty Plea ... 16
War Against Child Porn Intensifies ... 16
Industry Anti-Piracy Coalition Presses For Robust Federal Crackdown ... 16
Families Win Right To Attend Murder Trial ... 16
Completely Expunging Criminal Records Becoming Increasingly Harder ... 16
Maryland Prosecutors Investigate Spending By Suspended Mayor ... 16
Hit And Run Deaths Up 20% Since 2000 ... 17

Civil Law:

Bankruptcy Filings Down Under New Law ... 17
Six States Require Pension Funds To Divest From Darfur ... 17

Civil Rights:

Monitor's Report Finds Detroit Still Lagging In Consent Decree Compliance ... 18
DOJ Sues Philadelphia Over Voting Rights Of Spanish-Speakers ... 18
FBI Says Hate Crimes Dropped By 6 Percent Last Year ... 18
NAACP To Monitor Elections In 10 States ... 18
Former Georgia Governor Sues Successor Over Voter ID Letter 19
Federal Agents Remove Records From Mississippi Jail ... 20
Supreme Court Deals Setback To Boy Scouts ... 20
53 Percent Of Likely Virginia Voters Back Gay Marriage Ban Amendment ... 20

Antitrust:

DOJ Expands SRAM Antitrust Probe To Samsung ... 20
Microsoft Shares Security Data With Software Makers ... 21
HP Again Extends Tender Offer For Mercury ... 21
E.On Sues Saying Acciona Misled SEC ... 21
Silverman Testifies In Forbes Trial ... 21
Oshkosh Truck To Buy JLG Industries ... 21
Macquarie Wins Auction For Thames Water ... 22

WSJournal Says 1993 Steel Anti-Dumping Duties No Longer Justified ... 22

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Judge Considers Setting Deadline For Everglades Restoration . 22
ConocoPhillips To Pay More Than $2.3 Million For Puget Sound Spill ... 22

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Washington State Lawyer Pleads Guilty In Money-Laundering Case ... 22
In Connecticut, Federal Anti-Meth Law May Be Slowing Cold-Medicine Sales ... 23
Walters Praises Montana's Meth Project ... 23
ONDCP Says Government Partnerships Are Needed To Combat Meth ... 23
In Florida, Colombian Gets 15-Year Sentence Following Cocaine Bust ... 23
Report: Border Patrol, Others "Outgunned" By Drug Cartels ... 23
US Claims Head Of Rebel Group Plotted To Keep Hostages ... 24
US General Backs Reducing Aid To Colombia ... 24
Moonshiners Seen As Vanishing Breed In West Virginia ... 24

Immigration:

Chicago Child Abuse Suit Creates Immigration Concerns ... 24
Some Democrats Taking Harder Line Than Party On Immigration ... 25

Congress-Administration:

Kuo Says Faith-Based Initiative Grant Review Was "A Farce." .. 25
Internal Report Found Specter Aide Broke No Rules On Earmarks ... 26
Hastings Says Foley Probe Will Go "Wherever The Evidence Leads." ... 26
Reid To Amend Ethics Report To Account For Land Deal ... 26
Many Relatives Of Members, Aides Lobbied Successfully For Clients ... 27
Bush To Visit North Carolina School To Tout Success Of NCLB 28
Chairman Says TSP Could Grow To $200 Billion By Year's End 28
USA Today Supports Spellings' Proposal For College Student Database ... 28
WPost Decries Brownback's Hold On Neff Nomination ... 28

Other News:

Economists Say Bush Taking Credit On Economy Where Little Is Due ... 28
As Drop In Gas Prices Continues, Analysts Dismiss Talk Of Price Manipulation ... 29
White House Seeking To Solidify Support Among Talk Radio Hosts ... 30
Taxes, Terrorism Are Key Bush Campaign Themes ... 30
Cheney Remains A Big Draw For GOP Faithful In The Heartland30
GOP Maintains Cash Edge, Despite Democratic Fundraising Surge ... 31
Democrats Outraise Opponents In Key Senate Races ... 32
Lieberman Endorses Bolton For Confirmation As UN Ambassador ... 32
Chafee, Whitehouse Revisit Familiar Themes In Second Debate33
Allen Says His Conservative Position On Key Issues Will Win Race ... 33
Don King Campaigns With Steele In Maryland ... 33
Corruption Seen As Key Issue In New Jersey Senate Race ... 33
Brown's Pulitzer Prize-Winning Columnist Wife Aiding His Bid To Unseat DeWine ... 33
Candidates Build Presence On Popular Social Networking Websites ... 34
Hillary Clinton's Avoidance Of Iowa Could Aid Rivals In 2008 ... 34
States Consider Privatizing Major Highways ... 34
US Population To Top 300 Million Today ... 34
Missouri Amendment Said To Be Cloning Trojan Horse ... 34
WPost Says Maryland Gubernatorial Candidates Didn't Keep Promises On Crime ... 35
NYTimes Critical Of Legal Move By Blackwell Supporters ... 35
NYTimes Praises Bloomberg For Family Anti-Poverty Program. 35
North Korea May Be Preparing For Second Nuclear Test ... 35
Bush Says Putin Agrees Iran Cannot Have A Nuclear Weapon . 37
Administration Said To Have Eased Push For Egyptian Democratization ... 37
Olmert Says He's Willing To Meet With Lebanese And PA Leaders ... 38
Six States Require Pension Funds To Divest From Darfur ... 38
Sri Lankan Suicide Bomber Kills 94 Sailors And Civilians ... 38
Venezuela, Guatemala Deadlocked In Bid For Security Council Seat ... 38
Ecuadorian Leftist May Have Been Hurt By Link To Chavez ... 39
Mexico's PRD Loses Key State Election ... 39
Victims Of Colombian Paramilitaries Criticize Decommissioning Process ... 39
China's Extensive Foreign Exchange Reserves Give It Unprecedented Clout ... 39
NYTimes Pans French Attempt To Outlaw Denial Of Armenian Genocide ... 40

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 40

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 41

DOJ_NMG_0082020

TERRORISM NEWS:

Stewart Sentenced To 28 Months In Prison, Much Less Than Prosecutors Wanted. USA Today/AP (10/17, Neumeister) reports, "A firebrand civil rights lawyer who has defended Black Panthers and anti-war radicals was sentenced Monday to nearly 2 1/2 years in prison -- far less than the 30 years prosecutors wanted -- for helping an imprisoned terrorist sheik communicate with his followers on the outside." Lynne Stewart "smiled, cried and hugged supporters after US District Judge John G. Koeltl pronounced the sentence of 28 months." The judge "said Stewart was guilty of smuggling messages between her client and his followers that could have 'potentially lethal consequences.' He called the crimes 'extraordinarily severe criminal conduct.'" But "in departing from federal guidelines that called for 30 years behind bars, he cited Stewart's more than three decades of dedication to poor, disadvantaged and unpopular clients."

Newsday (10/17, DeStefano) notes that Koetl "cited her years of advocacy for the poor and down-trodden as a reason for a more lenient term behind bars. 'Ms. Stewart performed a public service, not only to her clients but to the nation,' said Koeltl, who refused a prosecution request to sentence Stewart, who is battling breast cancer, to a 30-year term." The New York Post (10/17, Cornell, 608K) adds, "A grinning, gloating Lynne Stewart declared 'victory' yesterday after" the sentencing.

The Washington Post (10/17, A3, Powell, 748K) reports, "Koeltl's decision to mete out a comparatively mild sentence amounted to a slap at federal prosecutors in a case that former attorney general John D. Ashcroft repeatedly had hailed as a nationwide model." US Attorney Michael Garcia "released a statement expressing disappointment and held out the possibility of appealing the sentence. It is not unusual for a federal appeals court to reverse a sentence handed out by a lower court." The Post adds, "More than a few legal observers divined a message in the judge's sentences. 'There's no doubt the government has tried to use this case to chill effective advocacy in terror cases,' said Neal R. Sonnett, a former federal prosecutor, past chair of the American Bar Association's criminal justice section and current chair of the association's task force on the treatment of enemy combatants. 'I'm delighted the judge was not swayed by the frenzy over terrorism.'"

The New York Times (10/17, Preston, 1.21M) reports, "Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, attended the sentencing yesterday. He and his prosecutors left the courtroom without comment. 'The government is disappointed in the sentences imposed today,' Mr. Garcia said in a statement later. 'We will be exploring our appellate options.'" The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Barry, 918K) runs a similar report.

AFP (10/17) reports, "Ever since she was charged, Stewart has insisted she was being unfairly targeted for her unorthodox choice of clients over a 30-year career that has seen her represent mobsters and political radicals. … US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at the time the verdict was an 'important step' in the Department of Justice's 'war on terror'."

The New York Law Journal (10/17, Hamblett) reports, "The sentences came 4 1/2 years after Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the indictment of Stewart, Sattar and interpreter Mohamed Yousry in a plot to pass messages to and from the Egyptian-based Islamic Group to imprisoned Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman. Yousry was sentenced Monday to 20 months in prison. … Sheik Abdel-Rahman, considered the spiritual leader of Islamic Group, was serving a life sentence for a terror plot against the United States. He had been placed under Special Administrative Measures (SAMs) by the Bureau of Prisons to prevent him from communicating with his followers in the group." The Journal adds, "Stewart was convicted of defrauding the government by signing attorney affirmations promising to abide by the SAMs and of providing material support along with Yousry by helping the sheik send and receive messages in prison. … Her most 'potentially lethal' action, Judge Koeltl said, was in June 2000, when she read a press release to a reporter indicating that the sheik was withdrawing his support for a 'cease-fire' or cessation of attacks against the Egyptian government."

WSJournal Criticizes Stewart's Sentence. In an editorial on Stewart's sentencing, the Wall Street Journal (10/17, A14, 2.03M) says, "In an age when courts routinely impose five-year prison terms for drug offenders, and life sentences on former CEOs, 28 months may not seem an appropriate sentence for a terrorist accomplice." Stewart "certainly had the sympathy of" US District Judge John Koeltl. While "a case could be made for leniency" given Stewart's age and her breast cancer recovery, "remorse is also a prerequisite for mercy, and Ms. Stewart shows none, either for her crime or for the arc of a career which flows too naturally from championing the 'liberation' movements of the 1960s to the Islamists of the present day. What her clients have in common is that they loathe America." The Journal concludes, "Now she basks in the pity and praise of her fellow radical travelers, who haven't seemed to spare much thought for the victims of" Al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya's 1997 Luxor bombing. "It says everything about her, and about them."

DOJ_NMG_0082021

The New York Daily News (10/17, 729K) also laments the sentence, under the headline "Judge Goes Soft On Terror Lawyer."

Jury Seated For Salah Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/17) reports, "A jury was chosen Monday for the federal trial of two men accused of supplying money and recruits to the Palestinian terrorist organization Hamas. Opening statements were set for 9:30 a.m. Thursday at the trial of suburban Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, and former university professor Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, of Alexandria, Va. U.S." The AP notes, US District Judge Amy J. St. Eve "overruled objections from federal prosecutors that defense attorneys had acted to keep whites from serving on the jury." St. Eve "held that in each case there was a non-racial explanation."

Allies Blocking Return Of Gitmo Detainees. The Washington Post (10/17, A1, Whitlock, 748K) reports in a front page article that Britain and "other European governments, which have been equally vocal in assailing Guantanamo as a human rights liability, have ... balked at accepting prisoner transfers." The US faces a conundrum: "But those whom the Pentagon wants to free often have nowhere to go. In many cases, their native countries don't want them or have challenged their nationalities. Also slowing the process is a U.S. policy stipulating that prisoners cannot be transferred to nations with a record of human rights violations unless there are written assurances that they won't be mistreated."

Skelton, Hoyer Defend Democrats' Position On Detainee Bill. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (10/17, 2.03M), Rep. Ike Skelton (D-MO) and Steny Hoyer (D-MD) write, "Your assertion ('Democrats on al Qaeda,' Review & Outlook, Oct. 2) that Democrats will not be tough on terrorism because many of us opposed the Republicans' Military Commissions Act is offensive and untrue. ... Our national security interests are best served when we interrogate and try terrorist suspects in a manner that comports with our American values; produces convictions that will withstand appeals; and honors our international commitments, thereby protecting our troops who fall into enemy hands."

Legal Challenges Expected. The Christian Science Monitor (10/17, Richey, 58K) reports, "The new law rejects at least five key holdings by the liberal wing of the court and sets the stage for what many analysts believe will be yet another historic showdown between the courts, the president, and Congress. ... The sharp divide at the Supreme Court is driven by a fundamental disagreement over the proper level of judicial oversight of the war on terror."

Military Commissions Act Comes Under Fire. Stephen Rickard, director of the Washington office of the Open Society Institute, writes in the Washington Post (10/17, A21, 748K) that President Bush today will sign the Military Commissions Act, "while claiming 'clear' authorization from Congress for 'enhanced' CIA interrogations. Many critics claim the bill authorizes torture. Fortunately, both sides are wrong. … The bill's language on torture is far from perfect, and it has many other objectionable provisions. It should have been rejected. But on its face it criminalizes cruel treatment. An interrogator can go to prison if a court finds that the techniques used caused 'serious' mental or physical 'suffering,' which need not be 'prolonged.'" Rickard adds, "The administration is trying to convince CIA officers that they won't be indicted -- or at least convicted. But the CIA demanded clarity, not more ambiguity and 'plausible deniability.' At the end of the day all the president can honestly tell CIA interrogators is this: 'The law has some loose language. We'll give you another memo. Don't worry.' Sure."

Rickard Says Military Commissions Act Should Have Been Rejected. Stephen Rickard writes in the Washington Post (10/17, A21) that President Bush today will sign the Military Commissions Act, "while claiming 'clear' authorization from Congress for 'enhanced' CIA interrogations. Many critics claim the bill authorizes torture. Fortunately, both sides are wrong. … The bill's language on torture is far from perfect, and it has many other objectionable provisions. It should have been rejected. But on its face it criminalizes cruel treatment. An interrogator can go to prison if a court finds that the techniques used caused 'serious' mental or physical 'suffering,' which need not be 'prolonged.'" Rickard adds, "The administration is trying to convince CIA officers that they won't be indicted -- or at least convicted. But the CIA demanded clarity, not more ambiguity and 'plausible deniability.' At the end of the day all the president can honestly tell CIA interrogators is this: 'The law has some loose language. We'll give you another memo. Don't worry.' Sure."

Kristof Denounces Detention Of Al Jazeera Cameraman. In his New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) column, Nicholas Kristof writes, "There is no public evidence that Sami al-Hajj committed any crime other than journalism for a television network the Bush administration doesn't like. But the U.S. has been holding Mr. Hajj, a cameraman for Al Jazeera, for nearly five years without trial, mostly at Guantánamo Bay. ... Mr. Hajj is the only journalist known to be there, and, of course, it's possible that he is guilty of terrorist-related crimes. If so, he should be tried, convicted and sentenced. But so far, the evidence turned up by his lawyers and by the Committee to Protect Journalists — which published an excellent report on Mr. Hajj's case this month — suggests that the U.S. military may be keeping him in hopes of forcing him to become a spy."

DOJ_NMG_0082022

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DOD To Require Anthrax Shots For Troops, Contractors. The Washington Post (10/17, Lee, 748K) reports, "The Defense Department will resume mandatory anthrax vaccinations for more than 200,000 troops and defense contractors within 60 days, a Pentagon official said yesterday, rejecting the concerns of some veterans and service members who say that the vaccine has not been proved safe or effective. The vaccinations will be required for most military units and civilian contractors assigned to homeland bioterrorism defense or deployed in Iraq, Afghanistan or South Korea, said William Winkenwerder Jr., a physician and the assistant secretary of defense for health affairs." After a lawsuit by service members, the FDA "granted the vaccine final approval last December, clearing a legal path for the Pentagon to resume the controversial program."

Luck Seen As Primary Factor In Low Death Toll From 2001 Anthrax Attack. Roll Call (10/17, Kane) reports that the "ex-staffers and health experts who dealt with the medical issues involved in the immediate aftermath of the anthrax attacks largely attribute the fact that those exposed to the deadly biological agent avoided long-term health problems to a single factor: luck." Roll Call adds that "a series of actions taken along the way — some well-thought-out, others largely accidental — combined to allow for a relatively happy ending rather than a deadly outcome. … 'The luckiest thing was we saw the powder, unlike the postal workers. That's the critical difference between our people living through it and those two postal workers not living through it,' said Laura Petrou," then chief of staff to former Majority Leader Tom Daschle.

TWIC Expected To Expose US Ports' Reliance On Undocumented Workers. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, A1, Jordan, 2.03M) reports in a front page article that the Transportation Worker Identification Credential program, which will require workers with unescorted access to secure US port areas to prove that they are legal residents and pass a background check, "is expected to leave thousands of undocumented drivers without jobs in ports across the country. That would undermine the flow of goods to US consumers, highlighting the crucial role immigrants…play in the nation's economy." Darrin Kayser, manager of strategic initiatives for the Transportation Security Administration says the agency is aware of the ID program's potential impact on port work forces and "will continue to work with industry, port authorities and workers to address" the issue. Meanwhile, "Immigrant advocates and port experts say truck drivers rank far down the list of potential security threats."

Critics Blast Ashcroft Over Criticism Of 9/11 Panel. The AP (10/17) reports, "Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft has been blasted by fellow Republicans for his new book criticizing the 9/11 Commission's investigation of the 2001 terrorist attacks." The AP continues, "Republicans who served on the commission told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that Ashcroft's behavior as a witness and as an author is 'underhanded' and 'outrageous.'" The AP adds, "In his book, 'Never Again,' Ashcroft accuses the commission of 'assessing blame and grandstanding' instead of finding the truth and protecting Americans. … He alleges that the hearings 'disintegrated into show trials' and that the Republican-chaired panel was 'dangerously out of control' and 'obsessed' with blaming President Bush for not preventing the terrorist attacks while 'absolving' President Clinton's administration. … Ashcroft's spokeswoman said he stands by the accounts in his book." The AP notes, "Former Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., said Ashcroft was the least interested in helping the panel get at the facts of what had happened before Sept. 11, 2001, so another terrorist attack could be averted. … 'John was the least cooperative of all the witnesses we had,' Gorton said. 'He was the only one who refused to submit his written testimony in advance, he probably came with the largest entourage of any of the people we talked to, and he engaged in a disingenuous and partisan attack' on the committee. … Former Illinois Gov. James Thompson said Ashcroft's behavior as a witness was so bad that Bush privately apologized to commission members."

Louisiana Man Says FEMA Trailer "Did Its Job" Sheltering Him From Tornado. The New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) relates the story of Jack Melancon, who, after losing "his shrimp nets and his roof to Hurricane Katrina last year and the rest of his house to flooding from Hurricane Rita," faced "the groan of a tornado advancing on his government-issued trailer" in Leeville, Louisiana Monday. The tornado "hurled debris against Mr. Melancon's trailer, provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Short-lived banshee winds strained to pull the trailer from the soggy earth, but metal straps held it firm. … 'It rocked and it rolled and it shook and it blew,' Mr. Melancon said. 'The trailer did its job. I would recommend one of these to anybody.'"

DOJ_NMG_0082023

WAR NEWS:

Bush Assures Maliki He Has Full US Support.

CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, McIntyre) reported, "The White House says President Bush called Iraq's prime minister, Nouri Al-Maliki, who was troubled by rumors the US might be losing patience with him and could impose a time line for bringing the violence under control. … The White House says President Bush reassured Nouri Al-Maliki that he enjoys the full support of the United States government and that there are no timeliness for the withdrawal of US troops. In return, Al-Maliki is said to have reassured President Bush that he is opposed to the idea of partition. Rumors about that, he said, were also undermining confidence in the government." Fox News' Special Report (10/16, Huntsman) reported, "White House officials say the President initiated the call after reports that Maliki was concerned about US support for him."

CBS Evening News (10/16, story 4, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) mentioned Bush's call to Maliki, "to assure him there is no timetable for pulling out," as part of a short report on violence in Iraq, while NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 2, 3:10, Gregory, 9.87M) showed Tony Snow, the White House Press Secretary, saying about Iraq, "The violence level's absolutely unacceptable." NBC added, "But during his phone call with Maliki today, the President denied there was any deadline for the Iraqi government." Snow: "The President said, the rumors are not true, we support you." Despite "such assurances, even some top Republicans want change. Senator John Warner has said the Administration should wait no longer than two to three months to change direction. Today Nebraska Republican Senator Chuck Hagel insisted during an interview with Tom Brokaw, Americans will not continue to commit US troops to a civil war." Hagel: "I don't want the outcome of Iraq to be a repeat of the outcome of Vietnam and if we're not careful, that is exactly where this is going to go."

The Washington Times (10/17, Curl, 88K) quotes Snow saying that al-Maliki "said that rumors sometimes can undercut confidence in the government and also its ability to work effectively in fighting terror." The White House "did not know where Mr. al-Maliki picked up the rumors, but the prime minister may have been referring to comments by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican."

USA Today (10/17, 2.27M) reports Snow also "challenged a story published Monday by USA TODAY that said al-Maliki will not force militias to disarm immediately. 'There is no mention…that he's not going to force militias to disarm until later this year or early next year. As a matter of fact, he says he's in the process of doing it now.'" USA Today adds, "A transcript of the interview showed Al-Maliki had told USA TODAY, 'The initial date we've set for disbanding the militias is the end of this year or the beginning of next year.' He also said a government committee was formed Oct. 8 'to work on disbanding militias and give them a deadline by which they have to lay down their arms.'"

The AP (10/17, Flaherty) reports Bush "told Nouri al-Maliki that rumors of a withdrawal of troops in two months were untrue," while the New York Times (10/17, Stolberg, 1.21M) says the story "reflects the delicate line the White House is walking as it tries to shore up the Maliki government while reassuring an increasingly skittish American public that it remains flexible in its approach to the war."

Bush Rejects Dividing Iraq Into Three Autonomous Regions. Last night, Bush was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16) about the possibility of dividing Iraq into three regions; a Kurdish autonomous region, a Sunni autonomous region and a Shia autonomous region, and paying them oil revenues to stop killing each other. Bush said, "I don't think that's the right way to go. I think that will increase sectarian violence. I think that will make it more dangerous -- and so does Prime Minister Maliki with whom I spoke today. I had an interesting conversation with him. I said we expect you to make tough political decisions to move forward. And he assured me he would continue to make tough political decisions necessary to move forward. One of those tough decisions is what do you do with the oil revenues. I happen to believe the oil belongs to the people and to the extent that they understand that it will help unify the country. Prime Minister Maliki also debunked this notion that he's not going to go after the criminal elements and or militias that are killing innocent people. He knows he has got to provide the security necessary for this country to move forward."

Bush Concerned About Iranian Involvement In Iraq Insurgency. Also on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16), the President was asked if US forces in Iraq are now fighting an insurgency fueled by Iran. Bush said, "I think the enemy is more complex than that. We are concerned about some Iranian involvement. Particularly in the delivery of certain kind of weapons. But the violence that the American people see on their screens is some sectarianism, some criminal activity and al Qaeda. And we're dealing with all three. And the strategy in Iraq - or the tactics in Iraq is changing constantly. So obviously, if we see more Iranian involvement, we'll adjust our tactics to meet that threat."

CNN Poll Finds 64% Of Americans Oppose Iraq War. CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, Blitzer) reported that the latest CNN poll "shows only a third of Americans now favor the US war in Iraq. Sixty-four percent oppose the war. That's the highest number of opposition in that CNN polling so far, since the war started three and-a-half years ago." The President was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor

DOJ_NMG_0082024

(10/16) about the polling data. Bush said the American people "want us to win. They believe -- they are wondering whether or not we have the plans in place to win. They want to know whether or not we have the flexibility on the ground to constantly meet the enemy. And I can understand why there's frustration, because the enemy knows that killing innocent people will create a sense of frustration and they know that they know America. They know we are a conscience-driven people that value life. And the more people they destroy and the more innocent lives that are destroyed, the more likely it is we will retreat in their way of thinking. This is what Osama bin Laden and Zawahiri had plainly stated, that it is just a matter of time that America loses her nerve and leaves."

Bush Says Extremists Could Gain Control Of Middle East Within Decades. Bush was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16) about the "anti-Bush press" which says he has no strategy in Iraq and he refuses to listen to dissent. Bush said, "I'm disappointed that people would propagandize to that effect because the stakes are too high for that kind of illogical behavior. We have got a plan - first of all a stated goal. And I have said to our commanders on the ground, you achieve that goal and we'll give you the tools necessary to do it." Bush added, "Here's the stakes, as far as I'm concerned. It is conceivable that within decades, the Middle East will be a place where moderate governments have been toppled, extremists and radicals will have gained control of oil resources and then will use to create a blackmail situation against the West and Iran will have a nuclear weapon, to complicate the mix. And 20 or 30 years from now if that is the case, people will say what happened to them, how come you couldn't see the threat as a generation of Americans are dealing with something much more violent than we are seeing today. And so to the critics who say we don't listen, of course we listen. I listen to the most important people of all, the people on the ground who are actually in Baghdad making the difficult decisions necessary to help this government succeed."

Sunni Insurgent Faction Offers To Negotiate With US Forces. CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, Ware) reported, "The Islamic Army of Iraq is…one of the largest and most powerful factions within the Sunni insurgency. These are the people who are responsible for the bulk of the day to day attacks against US forces, from roadside bombs to deadly sniper attacks to all manner of ambush and roadside bombings. These people offered us an opportunity to forward questions to their leadership, which we did in writing. They responded to those questions in videotaped answers, putting forward their official spokesman, Ibrahim al-Shimmari, to answer and respond to CNN. And what he outlines is fascinating. He renews the insurgency's long-running offer to negotiate with US forces."

US Officials Said To Show Ignorance Of Sunni-Shiite Differences. In an op-ed for the New York Times (10/17, 1.21M), CQ national security editor Jeff Stein writes, "For the past several months, I've been wrapping up lengthy interviews with Washington counterterrorism officials with a fundamental question: 'Do you know the difference between a Sunni and a Shiite?'" He concludes, "Most American officials I've interviewed don't have a clue. That includes not just intelligence and law enforcement officials, but also members of Congress who have important roles overseeing our spy agencies. How can they do their jobs without knowing the basics?"

Sectarian Violence Continues In Iraq. ABC World News (10/16, story 3, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In recent weeks, there has been a horrific surge in religious violence, Iraqis killing Iraqis in unprecedented numbers. Today was no exception. And it is happening not just in one area of Baghdad but around the country."

The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "Ministry of Interior spokesman Abdul-Kareem Khalaf blamed the latest outburst of violence on insurgents hitting random targets and 'seeking to incur as much damage and death as possible.'" But "the rhythms of the ongoing violence coincide with the country's political impasse. Once-dominant Sunni Arabs are waging an insurgency against the Shiite and Kurdish-dominated government as well as its US backer. Ascendant Shiites struggle to enforce their will politically as well as through violent death squads that kill dozens of innocent Sunnis every night."

The Washington Post (10/17, A1, Knickmeyer, Aldin, 748K) reports "the escalating violence in the Tigris River towns in many ways serves as a microcosm of the daily violence roiling Iraq. Sectarian attacks have increased more than tenfold since the start of the year and now claim more than 100 victims a day, according to the Iraqi government." The violence in Balad "was unusual because of the sustained deployment of the militias on the streets, and the killing seemed particularly vicious."

Iraqis Ask Why US Did Not Stop Balad Massacres. The New York Times (10/17, Luo, 1.21M) reports, "In the aftermath of the reprisals, some residents of Balad asked why American troops had not intervened when the killings began in earnest on Saturday. One of the largest American military bases in Iraq, Camp Anaconda, which includes a sprawling air base that serves as the logistical hub of the war, is nearby." American commanders "concluded that the situation in Balad was best dealt with by the Iraqi armed forces, a senior American military official said." The bloodshed in Balad illustrates "the dilemma for American military commanders at a time when they are hastening the transfer of wide areas of the country to Iraqi forces. ... It also highlighted yet again the powerlessness of the Iraqi forces to stand in the way of such sectarian violence."

DOJ_NMG_0082025

Christians Fleeing Iraq. The New York Times (10/17, Luo, 1.21M) reports, "Muslim fury over Pope Benedict XVI's public reflections on Islam in Germany a month ago — when he quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as calling Islam 'evil and inhuman' — has subsided elsewhere, but repercussions continue to reverberate in Iraq, bringing a new level of threat to an already shrinking Christian population. ... Over the past three and a half years, Christians have been subjected to a steady stream of church bombings, assassinations, kidnappings and threatening letters slipped under their doors. Estimates of the resulting Christian exodus vary from the tens of thousands to more than 100,000, with most heading for Syria, Jordan and Turkey."

DOJ:

Los Angeles US Attorney To Leave For Gibson Dunn. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, B11, Lattman) reports, "In the latest example of a government prosecutor jumping to a high-paying law firm, Debra Wong Yang, the U.S. Attorney in Los Angeles, has resigned her post and will join Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher as a partner at the beginning of the year." The Journal continues, "During Ms. Yang's tenure, her office has spearheaded several high-profile corporate-crime cases, including the indictment earlier this year of law firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, which is accused of paying individuals to file suits. Milberg Weiss has denied the allegations and vowed to fight the charges. … Ms. Yang, 47 years old, serves on the Justice Department's Corporate Fraud Task Force, an interagency group created in July 2002 amid white-collar scandals."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senior KLA-Tencor Employees Lose Jobs In Options Backdating Scandal. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, A2, Tomsho, Bandler) reports, "Two senior employees at a Silicon Valley company lost their jobs yesterday, and another technology company said that former top executives misled its board as the stock-options scandal continued to gain traction. In the latest personnel shakeups, Stuart J. Nichols, general counsel of KLA-Tencor Corp., and Kenneth L. Schroeder, a former chief executive who had remained with the company in an advisory role, left following an internal probe that found backdating of options at the company." The company "also said it was canceling all outstanding backdated stock options held by Mr. Schroeder and repricing all backdated options held by Mr. Nichols."

Bloomberg (10/17, King) reports, "KLA-Tencor is among more than 140 companies to disclose internal or federal investigations of stock-option practices to determine if grant dates were manipulated to enrich employees. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are looking for evidence that companies broke securities or tax laws by backdating grants to coincide with days when share prices were low."

The AP (10/17, Liedtke) reports, "With Monday's announcement, San Jose-based KLA joins a lengthening list of companies facing up to the consequences of stock option chicanery that went undetected for years. … The repercussions are erasing a substantial chunk of past profits and spurring efforts to clean out executive suites and boardrooms as federal regulators and prosecutors explore possible civil penalties and criminal charges." The AP adds, "In the past week alone, more than a dozen executives and directors at six companies nationwide have either resigned or been fired. Four of those companies are based in Silicon Valley, which has become the focal point of the latest scandal to rock corporate America."

Altera To Restate Earnings After Options Probe. The San Jose Mercury News (10/17, Harris, Blitstein) reports that Altera, "a leading maker of programmable semiconductor chips … would restate its earnings by $47.6 million after an investigation by board members found grants to former executives of back-dated stock options." The News continues, "A special committee of independent board members of Altera found seven instances between 1996 and 2001 where recorded grant dates for stock options were different from the actual grant dates, the company said. … In a separate statement, Altera said Chief Financial Officer Nathan Sarkisian has retired. Previously, the company had said he planned to retire by the end of 2006."

USA Today (10/17, Krantz, Farrell) reports, "Computer-chip maker Altera said Monday that chief financial officer Nathan Sarkisian left the company prematurely after a review of its options-granting practice pinpointed problems. The company said it will need to restate earnings to reflect $47.6 million in costs pertaining to options grants." USA adds, "As of Monday, the number of companies losing an executive or director in the scandal hit 23."

UnitedHealth Shares Suffer With CEO's Departure. The AP (10/17, Freed) reports, "UnitedHealth Group Inc. will lose the CEO that built it into a health insurance powerhouse, but on Monday, Wall Street yawned. UnitedHealth shares traded in a narrow range and analysts said that they had expected the departure of Chairman and CEO William McGuire because of apparent stock options backdating." The AP continues, "With McGuire gone from the boardroom immediately, and set to retire as CEO by Dec. 1, the company's board promoted President Stephen Hemsley to CEO. … UnitedHealth shares slipped $1.21, or about 2.5 percent, to close at $47.54 on the New York Stock Exchange. They're off from a high of $64.61 in December, with much of that loss since questions about the company's stock options timing arose in March." The AP adds, "By making Hemsley CEO, UnitedHealth's directors signaled they would keep the company headed in the same direction, which has boosted UnitedHealth's stock price exponentially over the past 15 years and transformed it into the nation's second-largest health insurer. Hemsley has been at the company since 1997 and has run its day-to-day operations since 1999. … UnitedHealth said on Sunday that McGuire would step down after a company-commissioned report found widespread, systematic backdating was probably the explanation for his extraordinary good fortune in receiving stock options priced at the lowest possible point in eight different quarters."

DOJ_NMG_0082026

UnitedHealth Options Episode Raises Questions About Hemsley. The New York Times (10/17, Dash) reports, "When Stephen J. Hemsley joined UnitedHealth Group after 23 years with the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, he was greeted with a grant of 400,000 stock options dated shortly after he started in June 1997. There was just one thing: the options carried a stock price based on the market price five months earlier, when he did not yet work for UnitedHealth, one of the largest health insurers in the country. The difference in dates effectively created a built-in gain of $7.26 for every share. Mr. Hemsley, who was chief financial officer at Andersen, said that he 'didn't recall focusing at the time' that his options carried a discounted price and that there was not enough evidence to determine if the grant was actually backdated. But the episode, recounted in a 14-page report into UnitedHealth's option practices, does raise some questions about Mr. Hemsley, who has taken the reins at UnitedHealth from Dr. William W. McGuire, who was forced to resign Sunday amid criticisms of how stock options were awarded."

WSJournal Says McGuire's Downfall Could Add Fuel To Options Scandals. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, 2.03M) editorializes, "William McGuire, with his $1 billion-plus portfolio of unexercised stock-options, was a poster-child for the backdating scandal even before his ouster as CEO of UnitedHealth over the weekend. And if history is any guide, the claiming of a scalp this large will only add fuel to a pyre that is already licking at the heels of several even better-known CEOs, notably Apple's Steve Jobs." The Journal adds, "Accounting rules and SEC regulations are not things to be flouted lightly, even when they appear arbitrary or even harmful. In the end, though, it may have been Dr. McGuire's lack of honesty with the board that proved his undoing. … Just as top executives at public companies shouldn't set their own pay, they should not engage in side financial dealings with those who do. More so than the backdating allegations, this undisclosed conflict of interest seems to have been Dr. McGuire's hanging offense. On the other hand, UnitedHealth's stock was down 2.5% yesterday after the story broke, suggesting that Mr. McGuire's ouster was not the benediction shareholders were looking for."

More Fallout From Options Scandal Expected. The AP (10/17, Freed) reports, "The shake-up at UnitedHealth Group Inc. – whose top executive will step down no later than Dec. 1 – adds to the list of corner-office victims of stock option backdating." The AP continues, "Faced with an independent report that found widespread problems with the way UnitedHealth issued stock options, the nation's second-largest health insurer said Sunday that chairman and CEO William McGuire will leave the board immediately and leave the company no later than Dec. 1. .. .In addition, board member William G. Spears will resign, and General Counsel David J. Lubben will retire." The AP adds, "So far, at least 30 senior executives or directors at 16 companies with stock option problems have resigned or been fired. .. .There may be many more to come: At least 135 companies have disclosed Securities and Exchange Commission, Department of Justice or internal investigations according to an Associated Press review."

Comverse CEO Faces Additional Charges. The New York Law Journal (10/17, Bar) reports, "Eastern District of New York prosecutors last week filed a superseding indictment against Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander, accusing the former Comverse Technology chief executive of new charges that include obstructing justice." The Journal continues, "Alexander, who had been accused of creating a secret slush fund for backdated options and evading the requirements of the company's stock option plans, is now charged with offering 'another person' millions of dollars as a bribe to falsely take sole responsibility for the scheme." The Journal adds, "The government said Alexander first offered the unnamed individual $2 million, then $5 million, and then stated, in substance, 'name your price.' … Alexander was a fugitive for more than a month before being discovered in Namibia. He faces extradition back to the United States." The Journal notes, "The additional charges against him came the same week the government filed papers saying it was engaged in plea negotiations with two other former Comverse executives facing criminal charges in connection with the backdating scheme. The Eastern District U.S. Attorney has until Nov. 8 to decide whether to indict David Kreinberg, Comverse's chief financial officer, and William Sorin, its former general counsel."

Labor Department Sues Agway's Retirement Savings Plan. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, D3, Matthews) reports, "The Labor Department has filed suit against trustees of bankrupt agricultural cooperative Agway Inc.'s employee retirement-savings plan, charging the plan's fiduciaries improperly invested $50 million of the assets. According to the lawsuit, 47 members of Agway's investment committee, administration and the company's board allegedly valued the company's stock at prices higher than market value and gave plan participants false information about the investment. The Labor Department said the suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of New York, seeks a court order to require the defendants to restore the $50 million in losses along with interest and to forfeit any benefits if all losses suffered by the plan aren't restored."

DOJ_NMG_0082027

Hedge Fund Market Has Expanded In Recent Years. The New York Times (10/17, Anderson) reports, "The hedge fund business has exploded in recent years, with more than 9,000 funds now managing more than $1.2 trillion for pension funds, endowments and wealthy individuals. Part of the appeal to these sophisticated investors is the funds' greater freedom to bet on different markets, including exotic and risky investments. Many institutional investors use them to diversify their portfolios. These funds are paid enormous fees — typically, 2 percent of the assets they manage and 20 percent of the profits — for the bets they make that pay off." Hedge funds "have come to dominate certain riskier segments of corporate lending, including the second-lien loan market. In this market, if a borrower defaults, the primary lender gets repaid before the secondary lender; in exchange for shouldering this risk, that second-lien lender earns a higher interest rate from the borrower. In the first half of this year, companies borrowed $12.4 billion in second-lien loans, an increase of 195 percent over the same period in 2003, according to Reuters L.P.C."

Schnitzer Settles Overseas Corruption Charges With SEC. Dow Jones (10/17, Hughes) reports, "Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. (SCHN), a provider of scrap metal, will pay $7.7 million to settle allegations that it made improper cash payments or gave gifts to managers of government-owned steel mills in China in order to win business, federal regulators said on Monday." Dow Jones continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission said that the Portland, Ore., company settled without admitting or denying wrongdoing. Schnitzer will give up $6.3 million in alleged profits and pay interest of $1.4 million to resolve the allegations." Dow Jones adds, "Schnitzer was accused of making the payments from at least 1999 through 2004, on its own behalf and on behalf of Japanese steel companies for whom it acted as a broker. The SEC said that Schnitzer's South Korean subsidiary made the payments in violation of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, an antibribery law that has been in place for decades. … The SEC also said that Schnitzer paid bribes to managers of privately owned steel mills in both China and South Korea during the same period. … The SEC said its investigation is continuing, raising the possibility that executives will face SEC civil charges. The SEC also disclosed that it is working with the Justice Department in the case."

Freddie Mac Hires New Finance Chief. The Washington Post (10/17, D1, Hilzenrath, 748K) reports that mortgage finance giant Freddie Mac yesterday announced that it has hired Anthony S. Piszel, chief financial officer of Health Net Inc., as its new finance chief. Piszel will lead Freddie Mac's efforts to fix its financial systems in the wake if disclosures of billions of dollars of accounting errors. Piszel "will replace Martin F. Baumann, who left Freddie Mac in March. Freddie's president and chief operating officer, Eugene M. McQuade, has been doing the finance job since Baumann resigned."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Pledges To Study Increase In Urban Crime. In a widely distributed story, the AP (10/17) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales offered no new crime-fighting initiatives Monday, promising only to study local crime rates in selected cities to see why homicides and other violent criminal activity is on the rise nationally." The AP continues, "In a speech to the International Association of Chiefs of Police, Gonzales said the Justice Departments' role for now is to look for trends in gang violence, drug trafficking, and how inmates released from prison may have contributed to the increase. … Nationally, violent crime rose 2.2 percent last year, the first increase since 2001. … 'We need to figure out the whys behind the numbers -- whether the story is good or bad,' Gonzales said in a 16-minutes speech. He did not specify which cities would be studied." The AP adds, "He acknowledged that local law enforcement agencies have had more crime-fighting problems to juggle since the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks. 'It wasn't like we didn't have a full plate already,' he said. … Gonzales' speech was greeted by a standing ovation from the estimated 3,000 local and state police at the Boston convention."

The Boston Globe (10/17, Cramer) reports, "US Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales told law enforcement officials Monday that his office will study selected cities across the country where violent crime has surged." The Globe continues, "Gonzales Monday addressed the International Association of Chiefs of Police conference at the convention center in South Boston. The gathering, which thousands were expected to attend, ends tomorrow. Gonzales said he wanted to know why violent crime had increased slightly in 2005 compared with 2004. … Nationally, violent crime such as murder, rape, robbery, and aggravated assault rose 2.3 percent in 2005 from 2004, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report. … 'In addition, we have recent anecdotal reports that even in this year there may be a rise in violent crime in some areas,' Gonzales said, according to a copy of his speech. … The cities will be selected in the next few weeks and will include communities of differing sizes and regions of the country. … 'They will also include cities that have experienced significant increases in crime and significant decreases in crime,'said Tasia Scolinos, spokeswoman for the Justice Department. The purpose of picking such cities is to understand why some have managed to keep violent crime down, she said."

DOJ_NMG_0082028

McClatchy Newspapers (10/17, Taylor) reports, "While Gonzales said the review was important to determine the causes of what he described as a 'small uptick' in violent crime, he emphasized that the overall crime rate is the lowest in more than 30 years." McClatchy adds, "Some police organizations expressed disappointment that the initiative didn't include immediate financial help for local police departments struggling to make up for years of reductions in federal funding. … President George W. Bush's administration has cut grants for state and local crime-fighting programs on the grounds that they have outlived their usefulness or have underperformed."

Officer.com (10/17, Slepicka) reports, "The First General Assembly of the International Association of Chiefs of Police at their 113th Annual Conference in Boston featured United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff as keynote speakers." Officer.com continues, "Both had a strong message on what local law enforcement and their respective federal offices could do and should do together to combat terrorism. … 'Our shared responsibilities are vast. None of us can do it alone,' Gonzales said." Officer.com adds, "Both men spoke of improving the federal and local relationship. Since September 11, there is no more us versus them according to the Attorney General. He said it is clear that local law enforcement has many more officers on the street. 'There can be no question that we learn from you, that we support you and that we are a team.' … The terrorist front is fought every day by local state and federal law enforcement. Gonzales said we never know when a gas station holdup is in fact a funding operation for a terrorist group and it will more the likely be the local law enforcement that discovers the initial evidence to prove that. … Gonzales emphasized that massive responsibility to find the terrorists among us was added to the responsibilities to crack down own drugs, gangs, violent crime, and crimes against children. 'We have not had a terrorist attack on American soil in five years and that is a testament to you and the police forces that you lead.'"

CBS Evening News (10/16, story 7, 3:10, Couric) reported, "Violent crime in this country on the rise again, and today Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez says he's sending out investigators to find out why. According to the FBI, violent crime was up 2.3% in 2005. That's the first increase in four years. But by far, the biggest increase came in mid-sized cities with violent crime up four times the national average."

Local Television. At least nine local television newscasts reported that attorney general Alberto Gonzales told a convention of police chiefs in Boston that his department plans to study local crime rates in selected cities. In general, violent and murder crimes were characterized as rapidly growing. KELO-TV Sioux Falls, (10/16, 12:08 p.m.) broadcasted, "At a convention in Boston today, attorney general Alberto Gonzales talked about the commitment to fighting homicides and other violent crimes across the U.S. Nationally, violent crime rose more than two percent last year. This is the first increase in four years. The Justice Department plans to study local crime rates in selected cities to find out why violent crime is on the rise."

WFMZ-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 6:07 p.m.) broadcasted, "The Justice Department plans to study local crime rates, by looking for trends in selected cities. Attorney general Alberto Gonzales says the survey will look at a number of factors from trafficking to former prisoners returning to society."

WWLP-TV Springfield, MA, (10/16, 11:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzalez addressed a convention of police chiefs in Boston today. He said the justice department will study at least five U.S. cities to determine what's behind the recent spike in murder and other violent crime."

WBBH-TV Ft. Myers, (10/16, 5:27 p.m.) broadcasted, "They'll look at a number of factors including gang violence, drug trafficking, and former prisoners returning to society."

WJZ-TV Baltimore, (10/16, 6:43 p.m.) broadcasted, "Violent crime in this country on the rise again, and today attorney general Alberto Gonzalez says he's sending out investigators to find out why. According to the FBI, violent crime was up 2.3% in 2005."

WTVD-TV Raleigh, (10/16, 5:33 p.m.) broadcasted, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales made no promises to the nation's police chiefs who are looking for help to combat a spike in crime. The nation's top cop spoke to the International Association of Chiefs of Police in Boston this morning."

KTBC-TV Austin, (10/16, 9:01 p.m.) broadcasted, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales said the Department of Justice will study rising crime rates nationally, but will not increase funding for cities to hire more police officers."

DOJ_NMG_0082029

FBI Agents Search Homes Of Weldon's Daughter, Friend. In the ongoing investigation of Rep. Curt Weldon, FBI agents yesterday searched four locations in Philadelphia and two in Jacksonville, Fla., including the homes of Weldon's daughter, Karen, and Charles Sexton, who is his longtime friend and her business partner. The searches are being portrayed as a severe blow to GOP chances to retain control of Congress. NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 5, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Three weeks to go now to the mid-term elections, and tonight the FBI has raided the homes of a Pennsylvania Congressman's daughter and those of a close friend, in the midst of a close fight for re-election." NBC (Reid) added, "FBI and federal law enforcement sources say that they're looking into whether…Weldon used his position as a congressman to help obtain lucrative lobbying contracts for an old friend and for his daughter. … He denies any wrongdoing, but this could not possibly have come at a worse time for him because he is in the toughest fight for re-election he has ever had."

USA Today (10/17, 8A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports that a "federal law enforcement official said the probe focused on whether the congressman used improper influence to steer business to his daughter and…Sexton. … The congressman's properties were not among the locations searched, the official said." USA notes, "In 2004, a liberal watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, called on the Justice Department to examine whether Weldon violated federal law by assisting companies that hired his daughter as a lobbyist." The AP (10/17, Dale) reports, "Earlier Monday, Weldon called the investigation politically motivated and the timing suspect. … 'What I find ironic, if there is an investigation, is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election,' Weldon said at an appearance in Media. … Weldon said his daughter received no special consideration because of him." The AP notes, "Weldon, regarded by some as a foreign policy expert, has clashed at times with the Bush administration. In the last year, he has repeatedly said a secret military unit called 'Able Danger' used data mining to link four Sept. 11 hijackers to al-Qaida more than a year before the attacks. A Pentagon report rejected the idea."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, Blitzer, 7:07 p.m.) called the FBI searches "a new October surprise in the battle for Congress" and noted that Weldon is "blaming Democrats for the probe, three weeks before the American public votes." CNN (Bash) noted, "For all of his lashing at Democrats," Weldon acknowledged "that the Justice Department is run by a Republican administration. Weldon said, 'I'm not stupid. I may have offended people – I have been known to do that.'" The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Schmitt, Neubauer, 918K) also notes, "The raids are another political setback for the Republican Party as it struggles to maintain control of Congress." Under the headline "FBI Raid Deals New Blow To Republicans," the Financial Times (10/17, Sevastopulo) reports, "Republican control of Congress was further endangered on Monday after the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided" Karen Weldon's home. "Already reeling from increasing voter concerns about the Iraq war – which has claimed the lives of 2,749 soldiers and seen almost 21,000 US military casualties – Republicans have more recently been dogged by the revelation that Mark Foley…sent overly friendly e-mails to page boys in the House."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/17, Shiffman, Lipka, Kerkstra, 399K) reports, "In Center City, agents searched the law office of John Gallagher, a Weldon friend who has conducted extensive business in Russia and former Soviet Republics. … Sexton and Karen Weldon formed Solutions North America in 2002, and won $1 million in contracts from two Russian energy firms and a Serbian family with ties to Slobodan Milosevic. FBI agents in Jacksonville, Fla., raided the office of one of the Russian energy firms, Itera, and a private residence whose connection to the investigation was not disclosed."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (10/17, Leonnig, Smith, 748K) reports "sources familiar with the investigation" said that "a grand jury, impaneled in Washington in May, has obtained evidence gathered over at least four months through wiretaps of Washington area cellphone numbers and has scrutinized whether Weldon received anything of value." The Post notes, "Prosecutors are usually loath to conduct raids against a public official so close to an election. But some involved in the investigation debated whether holding off could also appear to have been influenced by the election, sources said."

The New York Times (10/17, Johnston, 1.21M) reports, "Law enforcement officials said the investigation into Mr. Weldon had been under way for several months. They said the government had not confirmed the existence of the investigation or conducted the searches until after news organizations learned of them. McClatchy Newspapers first reported the inquiry on Saturday, and it is not known how it got the information."

Under the headline "FBI Ups Ante On Weldon," Roll Call (10/17, Bresnahan) reports, "Karen Weldon's firm, Solutions North America, received a $500,000 public relations contract to represent Itera in September 2002, including $170,000 in up-front money. The contract was inked just days before the elder Weldon rounded up 30 Members to attend a dinner at the Library of Congress" to honor Itera CEO Igor Makarov. "And despite the fact that the U.S. Trade and Development Agency had withdrawn an $868,000 grant to Itera several months earlier, Weldon praised Makarov and Itera in a…speech on the House floor." The Washington

DOJ_NMG_0082030

Times (10/17, Seper, 88K) also reports the story, under the headline "FBI Targets Weldon In Influence-Peddling Probe."

The Norristown (PA) Times-Herald (10/17, Bender) reports, "The congressman's staff had insisted Friday evening that 'there is no investigation' because they had not been contacted by the Justice Department or the FBI. Weldon spokesman Michael Puppio said Saturday that their attorneys were considering filing a defamation lawsuit against McClatchy Newspapers, which broke the story Friday night." The Times-Herald adds, "Weldon said Monday he believed the FBI raids were linked to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) and the left-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW). … Days before the story broke, a DCCC-funded mailer began circulating the district, accusing Weldon, vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, of using his position to 'help his lobbyist daughter win defense contracts potentially worth millions for her clients.'"

Local Television. At least five local television networks reported that the FBI raided the house of Congressman Curt Weldon's daughter, Karen, and a business partner as it is probes whether the Pennsylvania lawmaker used influence to help his daughter's company win lobbying contracts.

KYW-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 6:02 p.m.) broadcasted, "Authorities are trying to determine if Weldon improperly use his position to help his daughter and friend profit from lobbying and consulting contracts. Congressmen Curt Weldon says he does not know why the FBI searched the Queen Village home of his daughter, Karen, and Springfield home of her business partner Charles Sexton, a prominent republican leader. He only knows no one did anything wrong. 'My daughter has never done anything wrong and never would. She's an honest person.' FBI is trying to determine if Weldon pressured government officials to sign contracts with a Russian natural gas company that had hired Weldon's daughter as its lobbyist and consultant."

WCAU-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 5:28 p.m.) broadcasted, "The FBI raids the homes and company office of Congressman Curt Weldon's daughter and her business partner. They are investigating whether Weldon used influence to help his daughter and her partner get lucrative contracts for their business."

.WBRE-TV Wilkes Barre, (10/16, 11:20 p.m.) broadcasted, "There is political trouble for Pennsylvania Congressman Curt Weldon. Federal agents raided the homes of Weldon's daughter and a close friend. Sources say investigators are looking into whether Weldon used his influence to help his daughter's company win lobbying contracts."

WPVI-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 5:34 p.m.) broadcasted, "A powerful local Congressman is under fire tonight. The FBI is investigating how Republican Curt Weldon used his influence."

WFMZ-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 6:15 p.m.) broadcasted, "Another Republican Congressman is under investigation with only three weeks left until Election Day. The FBI is looking into whether Pennsylvania congressman Curt Weldon improperly helped his daughter and a close friend win lobbying and consulting contracts. Today the bureau raided the homes of Weldon's daughter and friend. Six locations in all were searched. Weldon describes the investigation as politically motivated and he questions the timing."

WCAU-TV Philadelphia, (10/16, 6:01 p.m.) broadcasted, "Congressman Weldon calls the investigation politically motivated. He says he was totally shocked by the probe and the Justice Department has yet to contact him."

More Commentary. The Delaware County (PA) Daily News (10/17) editorializes, "Is U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon a crook? That was the question on everyone's lips Monday as word spread that the FBI had raided the homes of his daughter, Karen; a key political confidante, Springfield GOP leader Charles Sexton; a Philadelphia attorney and a Florida business. … The feds are investigating the role of the 10-term incumbent 7th District Republican from Thornbury in the creation of an international consulting firm run by Karen Weldon and Sexton - and how it quickly won some $1 million in contracts from foreign entities tied to the congressman." The Daily News continues, "The story was embraced by a left-leaning government watchdog group called Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), which called Weldon's actions 'possibly criminal' and asked the U.S. Justice Department two years ago to investigate. Until this weekend, there was no indication that the feds were complying with that request. … That hasn't stopped Weldon from claiming that politics is behind the investigation - and the fact that it became public three weeks before the toughest election day in his career. Still, there is no indication that his Democrat opponent, retired Navy Adm. Joe Sestak, or his allies have anything to do with the probe, or the leak about its existence." The Daily News concludes, "In all likelihood, Monday's search warrants were executed because word of the probe had leaked over the weekend. Agents usually act in cases like this to preserve evidence that could potentially be destroyed. Cartons of documents were removed from the target sites Monday, and no one who knows what the FBI has is talking. … In all, the situation is eerily reminiscent of developments during the 2003 re-election campaign of Philadelphia Mayor John Street. An FBI bug was found in the ceiling of his office weeks before the mayor faced a strong challenge from Republican Sam Katz. Street and his allies - citing the Republicans in charge of the Justice Department - cried politics and won re-election handily. It probably helped that Street was a Democrat. … So, the question remains: Is Curt Weldon a crook? The bottom line is, nobody knows. And, unfortunately, voters will have to make their decision on Nov. 7 before any firm determination can be made."

DOJ_NMG_0082031

Attorney For Doolittle In Talks With Justice Department. The Sacramento Bee (10/17, Whitney) reports, "Rep. John Doolittle acknowledged Monday that his lawyer, whom he has paid more than $38,000 in the last two months, is talking with the Justice Department about the congressman's relationship with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The Bee continues, "The Washington Post and other papers, citing unnamed sources, have said the Roseville Republican and Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., are under investigation in the Abramoff matter." The Bee adds, "Doolittle's office in a statement late Monday, again insisted that the congressman is not under investigation. … Instead, it characterized the meetings as an effort to clear the congressman's name. … 'The congressman's attorney has had several conversations with the Justice Department which we believe have been helpful toward clearing the congressman's name,' said Laura Blackann. … 'The congressman's attorney has committed to the Justice Department that in order to preserve the integrity of the ongoing investigation, details of their interactions will remain private,' she said. 'To date, the congressman has not been contacted or questioned by the Justice Department and has no reason to believe that he is the target of an investigation.' … Blackann said Doolittle 'instructed his attorney to establish contact with the Justice Department to further express the congressman's willingness to be helpful and satisfy the Justice Department that the congressman has done nothing wrong.'"

The AP (10/17, Werner) reports, "Doolittle, a conservative eight-term incumbent and member of the House GOP leadership, has numerous ties to Abramoff, whom he has described as a good friend. Doolittle accepted campaign cash from Abramoff, helped his tribal clients in dealings with the Interior Department, and helped the lobbyist win a contract from the Northern Mariana Islands by endorsing a sympathetic island politician. … Doolittle's wife, Julie Doolittle, was paid a retainer by Abramoff for event planning work from 2002 to 2004. … The ties between Doolittle and Abramoff have caught the interest of government prosecutors, The Associated Press has reported. More than two years ago Julie Doolittle was subpoenaed for documents in connection with the probe."

FBI Seeks Public's Help In Wales Murder Investigation. Under the headline "Five Years After Killing Of Prosecutor, A Stumped FBI Asks The Public for Help," the Washington Post (10/17, A3, Harden, 748K) reports, "Alone in the basement of his house and sitting in front his computer monitor, Thomas C. Wales was shot to death…five years ago. … But after interviewing more than 4,000 people in all 50 states and half a dozen countries, after chasing down about 1,800 silver gun barrels of a kind that ballistics experts say was affixed to the shooter's pistol and after abruptly transferring control of the investigation out of the Seattle office of the FBI, law enforcement officials still cannot say for certain whether Wales was killed because he was a prosecutor. Instead…an FBI task force leader insisted last week that the case has not gone cold, and authorities released for the first time a composite sketch of a 'person of some interest' who was seen wandering around Wales's neighborhood…before the killing." Portland SAC Robert Jordan "stressed, using the same words twice, that the Wales case 'remains a very significant investigation.' That emphasis comes on the heels of what appears to have been a manpower dispute in the inquiry. In May, an FBI supervisor in Seattle reduced by two the number of agents assigned to the case. In June, after reports of squabbling inside the bureau, the case was shifted to the FBI's Portland office and beefed up with more investigators."

Betonsports Strikes Tentative Deal With Federal Prosecutors. Bloomberg (10/17, Harris, Israel) reports, "Betonsports Plc., the British Internet bookmaker indicted in the U.S. for illegal gambling, has reached a preliminary deal with prosecutors to end a civil suit seeking to ban the company from doing business in the U.S." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. District Judge Carol Jackson in St. Louis granted the parties one week to complete what Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Fagan said was a 21-page accord resolving a civil suit filed against the company in July by the Justice Department. … 'My impression is there are no substantive disagreements,' Fagan told Jackson today. A temporary order barring Betonsports from doing business in the U.S. has been in place since July 17. Neither side disclosed terms of the preliminary agreement in court." Bloomberg adds, "On July 17, prosecutors also unsealed a 22-count indictment charging Betonsports founder Gary Kaplan, former Chief Executive Officer David Carruthers and nine others with racketeering and violating federal interstate gambling laws. In 2003, the company's Web site, Betonsports.com, had 100,000 active players who placed 33 million wagers worth more than $1.6 billion, the U.S. has said. … Carruthers, 48, was arrested in July as he changed planes at a Texas airport. He pleaded not guilty and is currently under house arrest in St. Louis. Kaplan is still at large. Six other defendants have pleaded innocent."

Former FDA Chief To Plead Guilty To Conflict Of Interest Charge. CBS Evening News (10/16, story 5, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "An old lie is back to haunt the former head of the Food and Drug Administration. His lawyer says Lester Crawford will plead guilty tomorrow to failing to disclose that he continued to hold stock in companies that are regulated by the FDA. He could face a year in prison on each of the two counts." The Wall Street Journal (10/17, A3, Mathews, 2.03M) says Crawford "will plead guilty to two misdemeanors for failing to properly disclose stock ownership and violating conflict-of-interest rules while he was at the agency." The Journal adds, "The companies named in the charges -- shares of which were owned by Dr. Crawford and/or his wife during years when he served at a high level in the FDA -- include soft-drink and snacks company PepsiCo Inc.; Kimberly-Clark Corp., which sells some medical devices; Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and food distributor Sysco Corp. Dr. Crawford also held stock options in Embrex Inc., an agricultural biotechnology company on whose board he once served." He "exercised some of the options while at the FDA, the Justice Department said."

DOJ_NMG_0082032

The New York Times (10/17, Saul, 1.21M) reports Crawford, "now a senior staff member at the Washington lobbying and communications firm Policy Directions, could not be reached for comment." But "his lawyer, Ms. Van Gelder, said the fact that the charges were misdemeanors reflected Dr. Crawford's having amended his financial forms after his departure, making a full disclosure."

The Washington Post (10/17, A19, Kaufman, 748K) reports, "Crawford's short tenure as commissioner was best known for his August 2005 decision to postpone action on the "morning after" contraceptive Plan B. He had earlier told the Senate that the agency would act on the application, and Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) allowed a vote on his nomination as a result." Democratic Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey, "who helped initiate an investigation into Crawford's departure by the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services, said that further digging into Crawford's finances should and will continue. 'By blatantly ignoring the law on financial holdings and conflicts of interest, Lester Crawford used his position as the head of the FDA to send all the wrong signals to other FDA employees and the American public,' Hinchey said in a statement."

NYC Assemblyman Expected To Face Corruption Charges Today. WNBC-TV New York (10/16, Dienst) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Queens assemblyman Brian McLaughlin is expected in federal court on Tuesday. The expected corruption charges relate to McLaughlin's work as one of the city's power brokers -- his years as an elected leader and also as one of the city's top union leaders. The charges could cap a multi-year corruption investigation by the city's Department of Investigation, the FBI and Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office. Sources said McLaughlin is expected to surrender in the morning, and federal prosecutors are expected to announce corruption charges against him." WNBC noted, "Investigators had been focusing as to whether McLaughlin was helping certain street lighting companies in a possible bid-rigging scheme."

The New York Times (10/17, Newman, Rashbaum, 1.21M) notes that McLaughlin is "the head of the country's largest municipal labor council and a powerful force in New York City politics for more than a decade," and reports, "Details of the charges were unavailable last night, but an official, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing, said that they would be announced at a news conference today. … The official said that Mr. McLaughlin would probably be the only person charged today but that the investigation, by the F.B.I., the federal Labor Department, the city's Department of Investigation and the United States attorney's office in Manhattan, was continuing."

Protesters Urge FBI To Investigate Botched Kentucky Murder Probe. The Louisville Courier-Journal (10/17, Adams) reports, "The father of Jessica Melissa Currin, an 18-year-old Mayfield woman murdered in the Western Kentucky town in 2000, rallied with about 15 supporters at noon Monday in downtown Louisville to call for the FBI to investigate her unsolved killing. The group, joined by the Rev. Louis Coleman, stood in a cold rain for more than an hour…carrying signs demanding 'Justice for Jessica.'" The Courier-Journal notes, "The investigation for its first three years was headed by the Mayfield Police Department, but the Mayfield department's mishandling of evidence caused the dismissal of criminal charges against three people in 2003."

Pellicano Continues To Oppose Trial Delay. The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Philips, Krikorian, 918K) reports, "The long-awaited racketeering and wiretapping trial of indicted Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano and six others is likely to be postponed again for months if federal prosecutors and defense attorneys can scale one significant hurdle: Pellicano. Though attorneys for the government and five of Pellicano's co-defendants have agreed to delay the trial date until September 2007, Pellicano has so far resisted." The Times adds, "If U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer agrees with Pellicano…the trial would continue as scheduled in February or perhaps on a date far short of the one-year delay now agreed to by the government and all but one other defendant. The proposed delay was outlined in a stipulation jointly filed by prosecutors and defense attorneys Monday." The Times notes, "Pellicano has been particularly dismissive of the government's allegations, repeatedly denying that the FBI and U.S. attorney's office have any real evidence that he broke the law."

DOJ_NMG_0082033

Ohio Fundraiser Goes On Trial. The AP (10/17, Seewer) reports from Toledo, OH, "Less than a month before Election Day, a politically connected coin dealer accused of embezzling from a state investment in rare coins went on trial Monday in a scandal that has rocked Ohio's Republican Party." The AP continues, "Tom Noe, 52, is accused of stealing more than $2 million from a fund for injured workers and spending it on his business and renovating his home in the Florida Keys. … 'He needed money. He needed it desperately,' prosecutor John Weglian said in opening statements." The AP adds, "Noe, once a member of state boards that oversee the Ohio Turnpike and Ohio's public universities, was a top GOP fundraiser who gave more than $105,000 to Republicans, including President Bush and Gov. Bob Taft during the 2004 campaign. … He is charged with corrupt activity, theft, money laundering and forgery. If convicted, he could get up to 10 years in prison on the corrupt activity charge alone. … Defense attorney William Wilkinson said Noe's contract with the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation allowed him to borrow money from the investment fund or loan it to others." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors have not said whether any of the coin money was used for political contributions. If the state money had been funneled to campaigns, authorities could have sought a stiffer penalty."

Ralph's Grocery Chain Enters Guilty Plea. The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Zimmerman) reports, "A federal judge today approved the Ralphs grocery chain's guilty plea to criminal charges that it illegally rehired locked-out workers during the Southern California supermarket labor dispute almost three years ago. Under the agreement, Ralphs will pay $20 million in fines and $50 million into a fund to reimburse workers and their union. Ralphs also agreed to cooperate with the government in its ongoing investigation of the role corporate executives played in the scheme, which involved using fake names and Social Security numbers to hide the identities of workers illegally rehired during the dispute."

War Against Child Porn Intensifies. USA Today (10/17) reports that "an unprecedented war against child pornography is intensifying. Internet service providers such as AOL are using sophisticated technology to identify porn sites. Credit card companies are tracking purchases. More police detectives are posing as minors online."

Industry Anti-Piracy Coalition Presses For Robust Federal Crackdown. CongressDaily (10/16, Swindell) reported, "A business coalition is aiming to secure during the lame-duck session more federal funding to crack down on piracy of U.S. products and counterfeit goods. The Coalition Against Counterfeiting and Piracy, which represents moviemakers, auto parts manufacturers and pharmaceutical companies, has waged a campaign to lobby for more funding to stem the flow of fake goods into the United States." CongressDaily noted, "Appropriators this year have responded to such pleas. The House fiscal 2007 Science-State-Justice Appropriations bill would provide for at least $13 million for intellectual property rights enforcement, with directions that the FBI increase the number of prosecutors and agents working such cases. The Senate version of the bill would provide $6 million for such efforts. The Senate bill also would create a unit at FBI headquarters that would house at least five full-time agents to work those cases and two additional agents for each of the agency's 18 computer hacking and intellectual property units scattered across the country."

Families Win Right To Attend Murder Trial. The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Mozingo) reports, "Day after day, the aging Ukrainian couple has stepped into a federal courtroom in downtown Los Angeles to endure a severe test of wills: listening to the details of their son Alexander's killing while containing their emotions. … The couple and five other relatives of the victims had to fight to win the right to attend the trial of the two men accused of kidnapping and murdering their son and four other Los Angeles business people. Iouri Mikhel and Jurijus Kadamovas are accused of luring the five victims to their upscale San Fernando Valley homes in 2001 and 2002, holding them for ransom, killing them and dumping their bodies in a reservoir in the Sierra foothills. Prosecutors say the conspiracy was, in part, directed by organized crime figures in Russia. The defendants face the death penalty."

Completely Expunging Criminal Records Becoming Increasingly Harder. The New York Times (10/17, Liptak) reports, "In 41 states, people accused or convicted of crimes" can have "their criminal records expunged, and in theory that means that all traces of their encounters with the justice system will disappear. But enormous commercial databases are fast undoing the societal bargain of expungement, one that used to give people who had committed minor crimes a clean slate and a fresh start. … But real expungement is becoming significantly harder to accomplish in the electronic age. Records once held only in paper form by law enforcement agencies, courts and corrections departments are now routinely digitized and sold in bulk to the private sector. Some commercial databases now contain more than 100 million criminal records. They are updated only fitfully, and expunged records now often turn up in criminal background checks ordered by employers and landlords."

Maryland Prosecutors Investigate Spending By Suspended Mayor. The Washington Post (10/17, B5, Rich) reports, "Investigators from the Maryland State Prosecutor's office searched the home of the suspended mayor of Forest Heights yesterday, adding a criminal probe to the catalogue of palace intrigues that have roiled the tiny Prince George's County town for more than a year. The investigation centers on spending by Mayor Myles Spires Jr., town officials familiar with the investigation said. Among the specific areas of interest, they said, are two disbursements of about $3,333 in public funds -- one to Spires and one to the nondenominational Internet church Abundant Life Ministries, of which he is bishop."

DOJ_NMG_0082034

Hit And Run Deaths Up 20% Since 2000. USA Today (10/17, Heath) reports, "The number of pedestrians killed by hit-and-run drivers has jumped 20% since 2000 and is at its highest level in a decade, a USA TODAY analysis shows. The increase compounds the problems of investigating hit-and-run cases, which investigators say are among the most difficult crimes to solve because they often happen at night with no witnesses." USA adds, "Of the 4,881 pedestrians killed last year, 974 died in hit-and-runs, National Highway Traffic Safety Administration records show. The total number of pedestrians killed nationwide increased by about 2% since 2000, but hit-and-run deaths increased at almost 10 times that pace, the USA TODAY analysis found."

CIVIL LAW:

Bankruptcy Filings Down Under New Law. The Miami Herald (10/17, Danner) reports, "A year after sweeping reforms to U.S. bankruptcy law took effect, the number of people seeking protection from their creditors is down. Way down." The Herald continues, "Fewer than 5,200 South Floridians filed for bankruptcy in the past year -- less than half the number who filed in just the two weeks before the law took effect Oct. 17. The question is why." The Herald adds, "Banks and credit card companies say the law has succeeded in making it harder for people to seek bankruptcy protection. But bankruptcy lawyers and trustees say the numbers are down now because some people rushed to court before the reforms, and because others believe -- wrongly -- that they can no longer file for bankruptcy. … The laws were changed after an eight-year campaign by financial-service companies to cut down on credit card users who piled up debt and then wiggled out of repaying by filing for bankruptcy."

The Washington Post (10/17, D1, Day) reports, "Lawmakers, consumer advocates and industry executives say that much of the sudden drop in filings after Oct. 17, 2005, can be explained by the fact that 600,000 people filed in the two weeks before the law took effect, a scramble that was 10 times the normal level of filing over 10 business days in recent years. … But the filing rate for the first half of 2006, about 10,000 a week, is well below what could be attributed to last year's mad dash, surprising the lawmakers who wrote the legislation and the industry executives who lobbied for it." The Post adds, "The legislation, the most significant change to the nation's bankruptcy laws since 1978, was the culmination of a decade-long push by the credit card and auto-financing industries to make it harder for consumers to wipe out debts through bankruptcy. The new law toughened the rules with the intent of steering more debtors into a form of bankruptcy that requires people to repay more of their debts. … Industry executives had argued that about 10 percent of debtors filing each year for Chapter 7 under the old law, or about 100,000 people, abused the system because they could repay a large portion of their obligations and therefore should be required to do so under Chapter 13. Consumer groups and several lawmakers, mostly Democrats, argued that the number of Chapter 7 filers who misused the system is closer to 3 percent but that, in any case, the new legislation does little to weed them out. … The new law requires people seeking bankruptcy protection to pay higher filing fees and attend mandatory credit-counseling sessions with an accredited firm before and after they file. The goal is to discourage people from filing if they don't have to, and if they do, to pay off as much of their debt as possible."

Katrina Victims Forced To File Under Chapter 13. USA Today (10/17, Chu, Hansen, 2.27M) reports, "A year after a stricter federal bankruptcy law took effect, a growing number of filers in states hit by Hurricane Katrina are having to repay their debts rather than being able to eliminate them. A big reason is that lenders are increasingly cracking down on past-due mortgage payments in the storm-ravaged Gulf region, consumer bankruptcy attorneys say. The tougher bankruptcy law, which took effect a year ago today, made it harder for people to file for Chapter 7, which erases most debts. Instead, some debtors have been forced to file under Chapter 13, which usually requires a debt-repayment plan."

Six States Require Pension Funds To Divest From Darfur. USA Today (10/17, Lynch) reports, "A courtroom battle over an Illinois law requiring state pension funds to sell any investments linked to Sudan is shaping up later this month as a critical test for a grass-roots movement seeking to pressure the regime behind the Darfur genocide. Illinois is one of six states that over the past year have passed laws requiring their pension funds to divest themselves of stakes in companies that do business in Sudan, a central African nation that has been consumed by warfare almost continuously since it became independent in 1956." USA adds, "Other human rights activists want to use divestment to discourage corporate activity in Sudan and ultimately cause Sudanese leaders to halt their support for the militias that are killing and raping in Darfur."

DOJ_NMG_0082035

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Monitor's Report Finds Detroit Still Lagging In Consent Decree Compliance. The Detroit News (10/17, Egan) reports, "More than three years after the Justice Department and the city of Detroit signed consent decrees to improve the Detroit Police Department, only 15 percent of the patrol cars inspected have working video cameras required by the court orders, a federal monitor reported Monday." The News continues, "The Police Department continued to get poor marks in the monitor's latest quarterly report. The monitor examined 89 paragraphs and subparagraphs in the two consent decrees related to use of force and conditions of confinement and reported the department was in compliance with only four of them. … By signing the consent decrees in 2003, the city settled two federal lawsuits that accused the police of repeatedly violating the rights of suspects, prisoners and witnesses." The News adds, "The longer it takes the department to comply, the longer it will be under the scrutiny and multimillion-dollar expense of a federal monitor. The Justice Department could also ask a federal judge to find the department in contempt and impose sanctions, though that is considered unlikely at this point. … The report also said supervisors are not randomly reviewing the videos recorded by the patrol car cameras as required. The report is by Kroll Inc., a New York City-based risk consulting company that was hired to monitor the Police Department's compliance with the court orders. … The report, filed Monday in U.S. District Court in Detroit, also hammers the department for failing to fill out required reports or filling them out incorrectly."

DOJ Sues Philadelphia Over Voting Rights Of Spanish-Speakers. The Philadelphia Daily News (10/17, Davies) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has accused Philadelphia of violating the voting rights of Spanish-speaking citizens, and is asking for federal election observers in the city through the end of 2009." The Daily News continues, "A federal lawsuit filed Friday charges that the city has failed to provide enough bilingual poll workers in Hispanic areas and adequately translate election materials into Spanish. … As a result, the suit alleges, 'limited English-proficient Hispanic voters have had difficulty understanding the election process and have been prevented from voting.'" The Daily News adds, "Mayor Street's spokesman, Joe Grace, said the city already provides translators and voting materials in Spanish, and will 'vigorously contest' the suit. … 'The timing of this is a little questionable, coming three weeks before an election,' Grace said. Asked if he thought the Republican White House was seeking to suppress Democratic votes in a key U.S. Senate race, Grace said, 'The timing is suspect, and we'll leave it at that.'" The Daily News notes, "Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said she couldn't be more specific, but officials of the watchdog group Committee of Seventy said they'd provided some of the information that led to the suit."

FBI Says Hate Crimes Dropped By 6 Percent Last Year. The AP (10/17, Jordan) reports, "Hate crimes in the United States dropped last year by 6 percent, the FBI reported Monday, although violence against people based on their race accounted more than half of the reported incidents. Police nationwide reported 7,163 hate crime incidents in 2005, targeting victims based on their race, ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation and disabilities. That was down from 2004, when the FBI reported 7,649 incidents."

The Washington Times (10/17, Seper) reports, "The report, by the FBI's Uniform Crime Reporting Program, said that 55 percent of the 7,163 reported single-bias incidents last year were motivated by racial bias -- an increase of one percentage point. The overall number represents a 6 percent drop from 7,649 in 2004. Religious bias triggered 17 percent of incidents cited in the report, followed by 14 percent for sexual-orientation bias and 13.2 percent by an ethnicity or national-origin bias. Less than 1 percent involved bias against a disability. The report also noted that of 5,190 hate-crime offenses classified as crimes against people in 2005, intimidation accounted for 48.9 percent of them, followed by simple assaults at 30.2 percent and aggravated assaults at 20.5 percent."

NAACP To Monitor Elections In 10 States. The AP (10/17, Dominguez) reports, "The NAACP will monitor voting in Ohio and nine other states next month, sending observers to polling places, taking citizen complaints and notifying the Justice Department of any serious problems, the civil rights organization announced Monday." The AP continues, "The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People planned to have hundreds of volunteers monitoring the election in Ohio, Maryland, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Pennsylvania and Texas, said Bruce Gordon, president of the Baltimore-based organization. .. The NAACP said the states were chosen because of pivotal elections, concentrations of black voters, or a history of polling problems." The AP adds, "Gordon said the organization intends to be proactive 'to ensure that Nov. 7 comes and goes smoothly and that every citizen across this country, and particularly in the state of Maryland, who has an interest in voting, in fact is able to vote.' .. .Maryland's primary election last month was riddled with problems that caused precincts to open late or other delays, prompting court action in some areas to extend voting hours."

DOJ_NMG_0082036

The Detroit News (10/17, Martino) reports, "The NAACP announced Monday that Michigan is among 10 states that will have observers at polling places during next month's election to take citizen complaints and let the Justice Department know about any serious problems." The News continues, "The effort comes after numerous reports of problems with the Maryland voting system during the primary last month. … Participating states were chosen using three factors: a high concentration of black voters, a history of polling problems or pivotal elections. … 'While the NAACP will take steps to counter obstacles to voter participation, we are encouraging our communities to cast their votes, even if it requires extra effort,' NAACP President Bruce Gordon said in a statement Monday." The News adds, "Locally, in past election years the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People filed injunctions in federal court against individuals harassing people at the polls and challenging their right to vote by questioning their identification, criminal record or whether they paid child support. … 'We're very pleased that NAACP national will be monitoring the elections. We in Detroit have been monitoring elections for the last several years,' the Rev. Wendell Anthony, president of the Detroit branch of the NAACP, said Monday."

The Baltimore Sun (10/17, Brewington) reports, "With problems from Maryland's chaotic primary elections still being sorted out, NAACP President and CEO Bruce S. Gordon said yesterday that the civil rights organization will monitor polls in Maryland and nine other states on Election Day and report any voting irregularities to the U.S. Justice Department. … But Gordon also called on Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. to take steps before Nov. 7 to ensure a smooth and fair election by fixing the shortage of poll workers and the malfunctioning electronic voter check-in system. … 'With all the concerns that were raised, we intend to be proactive and put necessary safeguards in place so that every citizen who wishes to vote has that right,' Gordon said at the headquarters of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Baltimore." The Sun adds, "The plan announced yesterday would continue recent election-monitoring efforts by the NAACP, in which volunteers have looked for irregularities. … During the 2004 presidential elections, the civil rights organization and its partners enlisted 25,000 volunteers to monitor precincts nationwide and to answer a toll-free voter assistance hot line. Nearly 5,000 of those volunteers were attorneys, prepared to challenge voting irregularities with lawsuits. … Last month, the NAACP's national office and some local branches received complaints from frustrated voters in Maryland's primary, prompting the group and the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights to seek a court order extending poll hours in some jurisdictions by an hour."

The Washington Times (10/17, DeBose) reports, "In the letter, Mr. Gordon commended Mr. Ehrlich for ordering that backup paper ballots be used to avoid any problems with the touch-screen voting machines. … He also requested the governor order the Board of Elections to hold statewide demonstrations of the new machines, ensure that the electronic registration rolls are updated, and make certain there are adequate numbers of trained election judges at the polls on time and for the entire day. … In addition, he asked that each precinct have a sufficient number of provisional ballots -- many ran out during the primaries -- and maintain privacy for voters, whether they vote using touch-screen or paper ballots." The Times adds, "The NAACP will run an Election Day voter command center at the Baltimore headquarters. Volunteers will observe targeted precincts in the Baltimore area and Prince Georges and Montgomery counties, where the majority of the irregularities occurred. … The voter command center will also be staffed with lawyers from the group's partnering organizations, including the liberal Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and People for the American Way, to monitor complaints of voter irregularities and to advise voters experiencing problems at the polls."

The Washington Post (10/17, Helderman) reports, "The group said that poll watchers will observe precincts in Prince George's and Montgomery counties and in Baltimore and that lawyers will be available to document complaints from voters and, if necessary, forward reports of irregularities to the U.S. Justice Department. Maryland is one of 10 states the civil rights organization plans to monitor that day. … During September's primary, some polls in Maryland opened late because election judges or technicians did not show up. Also, an electronic registration system regularly crashed, and many poll workers had trouble submitting results electronically at the end of the day."

Former Georgia Governor Sues Successor Over Voter ID Letter. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/17, Suggs) reports, "Former Gov. Roy Barnes has filed a lawsuit against his successor, Gov. Sonny Perdue, and the State Election Board for the mailing of 200,000 letters to registered Georgia voters that suggested a photo ID was needed to vote in the Nov. 7 general election." The AJC continues, "The problem? The letters were sent out days after a judge ruled the law requiring a photo ID to be unconstitutional." The AJC adds, "Barnes filed the civil suit Monday in Fulton Superior Court on behalf of a 60-year old disabled Atlanta woman, Rosalind Lake, who does not have a state-issued photo ID. … In the complaint, the governor and election board are charged with contempt for violating a court order that struck down the photo ID law. Barnes is asking the court to force the state to send out another letter informing registered voters that they do not need a photo ID to vote. … 'The delivery of approximately 200,000 "Dear Georgia Voter" letters was a blatant action in which seriously incorrect information on voting was disseminated to a substantial number of Georgia voters,' Barnes wrote in the motion filed Monday. 'The events after this Court's order make clear that the violation was deliberate.'"

DOJ_NMG_0082037

Missouri High Court Strikes Voter ID Law. The AP (10/17, Wiese) reports, "The Missouri Supreme Court on Monday struck down a new law requiring voters to show a photo identification at the polls, upholding a lower judge's decision." The AP continues, "Supporters of the ID requirement, mostly Republicans, said it was necessary to prevent voter fraud and increase confidence in the election process. … Opponents, primarily Democrats, argued people impersonating others when voting is rare, and that the ID requirement would especially harm the poor, elderly and disabled who may be less likely to have a driver's license." The AP adds, "A lower judge ruled last month that the ID requirement was an unconstitutional infringement on the fundamental right to vote. The Supreme Court agreed in a 6-1 unsigned opinion. … The law required voters to present a photo identification card issued by Missouri or the federal government to cast a ballot starting with the November election."

Federal Agents Remove Records From Mississippi Jail. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (10/17, Fitzgerald) reports, "The federal government removed boxes of jail records last week from the Harrison County Sheriff's Office for its investigation of an inmate's death and related allegations, U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said on Monday." The Herald continues, "Lampton told the Sun Herald that the FBI and prosecutors from the Justice Department's civil rights criminal division took records last week from the sheriff's Gulfport offices at the Harrison County Courthouse and the Harrison County Adult Detention Center. … Lampton said there was no need to use search warrants because Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. and his new warden, Don Cabana, have been '100 percent cooperative.' But, he said, 'they can't be a part of the investigation.' … 'When we get to the bottom of everything, people can be secure or satisfied to know everything at that jail has been looked at, and anything that might have been done improperly has been corrected.'" The Herald adds, "Removal of the records is the latest in a series of new developments in criminal matters surrounding the death of Jessie Lee Williams Jr. Williams, 40, died after a beating on Feb. 4 in the jail booking room. He was taken off life-support at a hospital within two days, and his death was later ruled a homicide. … Former corrections officer Regina Rhodes, 29, was to be sentenced Monday on guilty pleas to criminal accusations that she assaulted Williams and lied to cover it up. She accepted a plea agreement and became a government witness."

Supreme Court Deals Setback To Boy Scouts. In what the Los Angeles Times (10/17, Savage, 918K) calls a "setback" for the Boy Scouts, the Supreme Court has rejected "a free-speech challenge to a Berkeley policy that denies city-subsidized dock space to a Scouting group because it excludes gays and atheists. The court's action lets stand rulings in California and elsewhere that have said cities, schools and colleges may deny public benefits to groups that refuse to comply with broad nondiscrimination rules involving religion and sex orientation. Some conservative groups had joined the challenge to the Berkeley policy, saying that advocates of 'traditional moral values' are being subjected to discrimination across the country by 'politically correct' government officials." The Times notes that High Court's action "no legal precedent," and "the justices could well take up the issue in the future."

53 Percent Of Likely Virginia Voters Back Gay Marriage Ban Amendment. The Washington Post (10/17, A1, Jenkins, 748K) reports a majority of Virginians "support a proposed constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage and civil unions, although voters split on the measure when presented with interpretations of its potential impact, according to a new Washington Post poll." Fifty-three percent of likely voters "said they would vote for the amendment, and 43 percent would oppose it, the poll found, indicating that three weeks before Election Day opponents still have a long way to go to make Virginia the first state in the country to defeat a same-sex marriage amendment." But when respondents "were read the arguments on both sides of the question, enough voters showed a willingness to reconsider that the gap narrowed to a virtual tie -- 48 percent said they supported the measure and 47 percent opposed it, within the poll's margin of error of three percentage points."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Expands SRAM Antitrust Probe To Samsung. IDG News Service (10/17, Ben Ames) reports, "Antitrust investigators with the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) have issued a subpoena to Samsung Semiconductor Inc., just hours after asking its competitors Mitsubishi Electric Corp. and Cypress Semiconductor Corp. for information about their sales practices in the SRAM (static RAM) chip market." IDG continues, "Toshiba, another major SRAM chip producer, declined to comment on whether it had also been subpoenaed. A spokeswoman referred questions to the company's Tokyo headquarters." IDG adds, 'Samsung plans to comply with the request for information about sales and marketing practices throughout the industry, spokeswoman Chris Goodhart said in a statement. … 'Samsung will cooperate fully with the Department of Justice on this matter,' she said. 'Samsung is committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior.' … Samsung has already been charged with antitrust violations in a DOJ investigation of the DRAM (dynamic RAM) market. Justice Department lawyers found evidence that several DRAM chip makers manipulated prices while bidding for business with the U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Apple Computer Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co. and IBM Corp. Several DRAM makers have been ordered to pay fines as high as US$300 million and three Samsung executives were sentenced to time in prison."

DOJ_NMG_0082038

Microsoft Shares Security Data With Software Makers. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (10/17, Richman) reports, "Striving to satisfy European antitrust officials, Microsoft Corp. said Monday that it has given security-software makers some of the data they want to make their products work with Microsoft's forthcoming operating system, Windows Vista. … But one of those companies, Cupertino, Calif.-based Symantec Corp., on Monday reacted to the release by repeating complaints it made at the end of last week: that it's not getting enough information fast enough. … 'The operative question remains "When?"' Symantec spokesman Cris Payden said. 'When are we going to get what we need?'" The P-I continues, "Microsoft Director Adrien Robinson said the means of connecting outside software to Vista's Windows Security Center were uploaded Monday morning to a Web site accessible only by security-software developers. … The Security Center is a set of on-screen controls -- nicknamed the 'digital dashboard' -- that customers will use to adjust and monitor their computer's security features." The P-I adds, "Symantec's Paden said the company is inspecting the new Web site 'to be sure it has everything we need to let our customers see our digital dashboard instead of Microsoft's.' … Microsoft also said Monday that it plans to discuss with Symantec and McAfee Inc. changes they want made to Patch Guard, part of the 64-bit version of Vista that restricts who can alter the operating system's core, or kernel. … But Paden said Microsoft has yet to explain how Symantec's technology can access 64-bit Vista's kernel, or even to say when it will provide that explanation. The 64-bit version of Vista is expected to be popular among businesses, he said."

HP Again Extends Tender Offer For Mercury. The Financial Times (10/17, Allison) reports, "Hewlett-Packard, the world's second-biggest computer maker, on Monday announced a further extension of its tender offer for Mercury Interactive, a business software group that was forced to de-list its shares earlier this year because of stock options backdating." The Times continues, "The move marked the third time HP has extended its tender offer, which values the software maker at $4.5bn. It came in spite of news that HP had locked up more than 90 per cent of Mercury's oustanding shares - far more than the amount needed to complete the company's biggest acquisition since its $19bn takeover of Compaq, a rival computer maker, in 2002." The Times adds, 'One person familiar with the matter said Mercury's de-lisitng had complicated efforts to receive anti-trust approvals from regulators. The person said the delays were procedural and nature and were not expected to infuence the outcome of the tender offer. … HP's tender offer values Mercury at $4.5bn, or $52 a share - a 33 per cent premium over the comapny's share price the day before the deal was announced in July."

E.On Sues Saying Acciona Misled SEC. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, B10) reports, "E.On AG said it filed a lawsuit in New York to clarify a situation about Endesa SA shares held by Spanish energy-and-construction company Acciona SA." E.On "has accused Acciona of making misleading statements to the Securities and Exchange Commission about its strategic targets in buying a 10% stake in Endesa. Acciona denied the charges. … E.On's lawsuit says information Acciona filed to the SEC was 'false, inexact and incomplete' among other things, because 'Acciona has contracts with third parties who intend to block E.On's bid.' An E.On spokeswoman said it is unclear how many Endesa shares Acciona controls and whether Acciona has agreements with third parties on further share purchases."

Silverman Testifies In Forbes Trial. USA Today (10/17, Farrell) reports, "The retrial of former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes took a new twist Monday when Henry Silverman, the hard-driving founder of HFS, testified about his decision to merge HFS in 1997 with Forbes' firm, CUC International, to form Cendant. Following the merger, in April 1998, Cendant disclosed that CUC executives had overstated their company's revenue by hundreds of millions of dollars. The disclosure shocked investors, who went on a selling spree, wiping out $14 billion, or half the company's market capitalization, in one day."

Oshkosh Truck To Buy JLG Industries. The New York Times/AP (10/17) reports, "Military and commercial vehicle maker Oshkosh Truck Corp. on Monday said it is buying JLG Industries Inc., a maker of aerial work platforms and booms, for about $3 billion in cash. … The deal, which has been approved by the boards of both companies and still requires the approval from JLG shareholders and antitrust regulators, is expected to close in early December. The company agreed to pay $28 per share for JLG, which represents a 35 percent premium over the stock's Friday closing price of $20.75. According to the New York Stock Exchange, JLG has 106.7 million shares outstanding. Oshkosh will also assume more than $200 million in JLG debt as part of the deal."

DOJ_NMG_0082039

Macquarie Wins Auction For Thames Water. The Financial Times (10/17, Saigol, Bream) reports, "Macquarie, the Australian bank, on Monday night won the hotly contested auction for Thames Water, the UK's biggest water company, which is being sold by RWE, the German utility group, in a deal valued at £8bn. … It beat three other serious bidders in the auction, including Qatar Investment Authority, which had teamed up with UBS's global infrastructure fund. The Thames deal, which includes £3.2bn of debt, is subject to approval by RWE's supervisory board at a weekend meeting. If approved, the sale is due to close by early December. The deal marks the biggest buy-out in the UK this year."

WSJournal Says 1993 Steel Anti-Dumping Duties No Longer Justified. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, A14, 2.03M) says in an editorial that "on the table before" the International Trade Commission today is "whether the anti-dumping duties imposed in 1993 on 'corrosion-resistant steel' should be lifted. This steel is crucial to making cars. Pushing back against the automakers, steelmakers are expected to argue, as they did 13 years ago, that they need the duties to repel unfair foreign competition and avoid harm. Well, times change, and it's time to lift these duties on steel. This isn't 1993." From "corporate America to Mom and Pop operations, the U.S. needs this steel to stay in business. The automakers will testify on the side of the foreign companies accused of dumping, but in fact they're testifying for the U.S. economy." Pricing power "and profitability are a direct consequence of the supply restraints caused by anti-dumping duties. Those duties, which can range from 2% to 40%, are also assigned retroactively; so foreign sellers of steel to the U.S. -- which have to collect the duty as part of their price -- never know what their final financial exposure will be."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Judge Considers Setting Deadline For Everglades Restoration. The AP (10/17, Anderson) reports, "Lawyers for the (Florida) state Department of Environmental Protection and South Florida water managers urged a federal judge Monday not to issue an order imposing deadlines for Everglades restoration work, contending it is both illegal and unnecessary." The AP continues, 'Charles Demonaco, attorney for the state agency, told U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno that a federal court has no business imposing its will on how a state follows its own laws. Demonaco said a cleanup plan meeting court approval for the Everglades is already enshrined in state law, making a court order unneeded. … 'There is a long-term plan that is in effect,' Demonaco said at a hearing. 'A federal court would be intruding in the daily activities of a state. That would be an unlawful order.'" The AP adds, "But Dexter Lehtinen, attorney for the Miccosukee Tribe of Indians of Florida, said court orders are the only way to ensure that Florida agencies continue to meet the terms of a settlement reached over a decade ago to restore the Everglades and reduce phosphorus-laden runoff from continuing to damage the ecosystem. … Lehtinen, a former U.S. attorney, said without such court supervision Florida officials could modify their restoration plan unilaterally. The Miscosukees consider the Everglades their ancestral home and have joined the case to ensure enforcement of water quality goals."

ConocoPhillips To Pay More Than $2.3 Million For Puget Sound Spill. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (10/17) reports, "In a settlement reached Monday with the U.S. Justice Department, ConocoPhillips will pay more than $2.3 million in costs and penalties for a 2004 incident that spilled more than 1,000 gallons of crude oil in Puget Sound's Dalco Passage." The P-I continues, "The agreement with the company, and its wholly owned subsidiary, Polar Tankers, was reached following an extensive investigation by the U.S Coast Guard and the state Ecology Department following the Oct. 13, 2004 spill. The investigation found that the tanker Polar Texas released the oil as it took on ballast while departing Commencement Bay." The P-I adds, "The spill went unnoticed until the following morning when the captain of a tug boat reported oil in the water south of Vashon and Maury islands. Although state law requires the offending vessel to report and participate in the cleanup, the Polar Texas did neither, the Coast Guard said yesterday in a press release. … The $2,233,293.94 in pollution removal costs under the federal Oil Pollution Act of 1990 represents 100 percent of all costs the federal government incurred during cleanup operations in Dalco Passage. The federal and state government's claims against ConocoPhillips for injuries to natural resources, however, have not been resolved and are not included in the total. … ConocoPhillips, however, also will pay an $80,000 civil penalty under the federal Clean Water Act. Last Friday, the state Ecology Department settled a $540,000 claim against the oil corporation under state law."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Washington State Lawyer Pleads Guilty In Money-Laundering Case. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (10/16) reports the purchase of a Laundromat "didn't wash with federal drug investigators. Medina lawyer Stephen Plowman, who represented a cocaine trafficker, pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court to a financial reporting crime after helping his client buy the Queen Anne Maytag Laundry." Prosecutors said Plowman "admitted he received more than $100,000 in cash from his client to buy the Laundromat for him in June 2005 and failed to file a currency transaction report." Prosecutors accused his client, Carlos Ford, of wanting the Laundromat to launder drug proceeds. "The guilty plea by the lawyer 'sends a strong message that no one is above the law,' said Rodney Benson, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in Seattle."

DOJ_NMG_0082040

In Connecticut, Federal Anti-Meth Law May Be Slowing Cold-Medicine Sales. The Hartford (CT) Courant (10/16, Waldman) reports that in the two weeks since a federal law "put more than a dozen popular cold and sinus pills behind the drugstore counter, the Arrow Pharmacy in Hartford has not sold a single box of Sudafed. It may be that it's not really cold season yet, pharmacist Eddie Martucci speculated. Or it may be that customers are put off by a new law that requires them to show a photo ID and sign a logbook before purchasing products that contain pseudoephedrine. It's a 'pain,' said Angelo DeFazio," the pharmacy owner. "On the upside, DeFazio said, the law allows pharmacists to monitor pseudoephedrine sales and to warn people with problems such as heart conditions that they probably should not be taking the drug." The Courant notes that the logbooks must be made available to DEA agents.

Walters Praises Montana's Meth Project. The AP (10/16) reports the Montana Meth Project, "a campaign with graphic messages about the perils of methamphetamine use, received White House recognition Monday. John Walters…appeared in Great Falls and cited the project as one of the nation's most powerful anti-drug efforts. … The project is Montana's largest advertiser, and its messages reach 70-90 percent of the state's teens at least three times a week, according to the White House. … 'The Montana Meth Project is a key component of a balanced strategy against meth and is an extraordinary example of the results we can achieve when we combine the power of advertising with the dedication and expertise of the leaders of this community,' Walters said." The AP story was used by Montana's Great Falls Tribune and Billings Gazette.

ONDCP Says Government Partnerships Are Needed To Combat Meth. The Fort Collins Coloradoan (10/16) reports that about 100 community leaders "looking for solutions to the growing use of methamphetamine in Larimer and Weld counties gathered [yesterday] for a day-long summit. … About 80 percent of the meth found in the United States comes from Mexico or large 'super labs,' said John Horton, associate deputy director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy. The number of small labs in the country is down 29 percent in recent years, he said." Horton "said partnerships between governments at home and abroad are needed to curtail the production and use of the drug."

The Greeley (CO) Tribune (10/17) reports Horton "spoke early in the meeting about the national [meth] problem. He said local governments need to lead the way in tackling the problem and he applauded Colorado's laws that make it more difficult to purchase ingredients used for the drug."

Horton Speaks Out Against Amendment 44. The Denver Post (10/17) reports Horton said a proposal on the state ballot to "loosen marijuana laws in Colorado would make it harder to fight the war on methamphetamine abuse." Horton "said Amendment 44 - which would allow people 21 and older to legally possess an ounce or less of pot - would make marijuana accessible to more people and allow them to fall victim to the highly-addictive and destructive properties of methamphetamines." Horton noted that there "have been strides in cutting meth traffic, including reducing the number of small labs in the country by 29 percent. He said efforts like Amendment 44 would only hurt the fight, however, because marijuana is a 'gateway drug.'" Mason Tvert, campaign director for Amendment 44, "said Horton and other officials are using scare tactics to sink the proposal." Tvert said studies "have shown marijuana's status as a gateway drug is overblown."

In Florida, Colombian Gets 15-Year Sentence Following Cocaine Bust. The Naples Daily News (10/16) reports a Colombian man "caught with nearly two tons of cocaine in international waters was sentenced…in Fort Myers to 15 years in prison. Leopoldo Caiceda Caiceda…pleaded guilty in June to possession of cocaine and conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute cocaine. He was found last December along with three other men in a fishing boat off the coast of Costa Rica. In their wooden fishing boat U.S. Coast Guard officials found 3,500 pounds of cocaine," according to Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Doug Molloy.

Report: Border Patrol, Others "Outgunned" By Drug Cartels. The Houston Chronicle (10/17, Mittelstadt) reports the U.S. Border Patrol and other law enforcement agencies at the U.S.-Mexico border "are outgunned by increasingly ruthless and well-armed Mexican drug cartels," according to a new congressional report. The House Homeland Security oversight subcommittee report "said drug cartels are able to break the encryptions on Border Patrol and sheriffs' deputies' radios. Lookouts for the cartels, using military grade equipment, are positioned at strategic points on the U.S. side of the border to monitor movements of U.S. law enforcement,' it continued." The Chronicle notes that while federal law enforcement "seized 1.1 million pounds of cocaine and 6.8 million pounds of marijuana, [it's] estimated the total cocaine flow may have topped 11 million pounds."

DOJ_NMG_0082041

Cable TV Coverage. Fox Special Report (10/16, story 6, 3:15, Hume) reported, "It appears tonight that a forthcoming government report will describe a dire situation along the southern US border with enforcement authorities catching only a small percentage of illegal immigrants and the wars on drugs and terrorism being fought on the nation's doorstep. … The U.S. already provides Mexico-with tens of millions to help secure its side of the border. But that's a drop in the bucket to the cartels, who continue to smuggle drugs and people with little interference from the Mexican authorities. … The authors call this report a 30-page wake up call. It was compiled with extensive cooperation from the FBI, DEA, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and counter-terrorism officials. Now it is up to Congress, they say, to provide the political will and resources to answer this growing threat."

US Claims Head Of Rebel Group Plotted To Keep Hostages. The AP (10/17, Yen) reports, "The government said Monday that a top Latin American rebel leader plotted to keep three Americans hostage and use them as political bargaining chips after their plane crashed in Colombia. … But the defense portrayed Ricardo Palmera as a tangential sympathizer of the leftist FARC group who unfairly got caught in the middle after trying to negotiate a deal between guerrilla fighters and the U.S.-backed Colombian government. … 'This man had nothing to do with the capture of the three Americans,' said Palmera attorney Robert Tucker. 'He became the pawn in the power play.'" The AP continues, "Justice Department attorney John Crabb opened his case by arguing that Palmera — better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad — was guilty on charges of hostage-taking, conspiracy and providing material support to terrorists. … 'We'll trade you hostages — including three Americans — for all FARC prisoners in jail. That was Simon Trinidad's offer,' Crabb said. … 'He admitted he was a member of FARC, he admitted FARC takes hostages,' he said. 'That man, Simon Trinidad, tried to use them as get out of jail cards for FARC.' .. Tucker countered that there was little evidence tying Palmera directly to the hostage-taking after the plane carrying the U.S. military contractors encountered engine trouble and crashed in February 2003."

US General Backs Reducing Aid To Colombia. The AP (10/16) reports the U.S. military's commander for Latin America "says Washington should gradually reduce its roughly $600 million in annual military and anti-drug aid to Colombia, support that has been crucial to putting the region's most potent rebel force on the defensive. 'I'm not concerned there's going to be a loss of funding,' Gen. John Craddock said Monday when asked about reports that the State Department wants to phase out Plan Colombia, which has provided the country with some $4 billion in total aid since 2000. 'First of all, there should be (decreased funding), over time. It makes sense. The Colombians are winning,' said Craddock." The AP adds, "And though it is questionable whether Plan Colombia has put a serious dent in drug trafficking from the world's leading cocaine producing nation…the Colombian military's gains are measurable."

McClatchy Newspapers (10/16) also reports Craddock is not concerned about the U.S. possibly reducing funding for Plan Colombia and notes, "There is no certainty that the United States will have to abandon its down-range air operations at Manta, Ecuador, used by U.S. surveillance aircraft and other forces for anti-drug operations" due to presidential elections in Ecuador. A runoff election is scheduled for Nov. 26.

Moonshiners Seen As Vanishing Breed In West Virginia. The Charleston Daily Mail (10/17, Anderson) reports, "The West Virginia moonshiner is a vanishing breed made all but extinct by economics and modern law enforcement techniques, experts say." The Daily Mail continues, "Moonshine is not profitable to make for widespread sale anymore. … And in the modern era of ATVs and helicopter aerial searches, it's harder for a moonshiner to hide. … But moonshine hasn't gone away entirely." The Daily Mail adds, "An elderly Roane County man was recently arrested for allegedly shooting his nephew after a night of drinking moonshine. When police found Wayne Howard Mallory passed out in his trailer, they roused him and asked him about the shooting. Mallory couldn't remember anything about it. … In August, authorities seized $1 million worth of marijuana and a moonshine still at a Greenbrier County couple's 29-acre property. … 'There's probably a bit of it going on, but I don't think it's a problem,' said Paul Cross, agent in charge of the Charleston office of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … Cross said his agency hasn't come across a real case of moonshine-making in about seven years. 'People get into that stuff to make money,' he said. 'It doesn't seem to be economically viable to do it at this time.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Chicago Child Abuse Suit Creates Immigration Concerns. CBS 2 Chicago (10/17, Johnson) reports, "A child abuse lawsuit aimed at helping illegal immigrants stay in the country is creating some waves. … Some people believe the lawsuit in support a Chicago mother and her son misses a critical point, and CBS 2's Rob Johnson reports that others believe it's right on target." CBS2 continues, "The immigration debate has become one of America's most pressing issues. The latest salvo fired came last week with the filing of a class action lawsuit on behalf of children like 7-year-old Saul Arellano, whose mother Elvira is hunkered down in a Humboldt Park church fighting deportation. … The suit names President Bush and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, among others, and claims that such deportations are a form of child abuse. … 'They should be able to live in this country with their parents and that is not happening,' said Emma Lozano with the Center Without Borders." CBS2 adds, "That strategy, says CBS 2 legal analyst Irv Miller, is a long shot. … 'It's probably not going to be a class action, which is what the mom and the child want it to be to gain the notoriety,' Miller said."

DOJ_NMG_0082042

Some Democrats Taking Harder Line Than Party On Immigration. The New York Times (10/17, Swarns, 1.21M) reports Democratic congressional leaders have "maintained a united front on immigration, demanding legislation that would legalize illegal immigrants and create a guest worker program to ensure a reliable legal flow of foreign workers." But in Tennessee, "and in at least a dozen other fiercely contested Congressional races, Democratic candidates are publicly breaking with that message." In North Carolina, House candidate Heath Shuler "ran a television advertisement declaring he would never 'give amnesty' to illegal immigrants." Georgia Rep. John Barrow "has played up his vote to build a fence on the southwest border," while in Ohio, Democratic challenger John Cranley "has accused" Republican Rep. Steve Chabot of "voting to legalize hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants." In Tennessee, Rep. Harold Ford "reminds voters repeatedly that federal agents raided his Republican opponent's business and found four illegal immigrants working there. Mr. Ford also proudly describes his vote for the border security legislation passed by the House last year, a measure condemned as anti-immigrant by many Democrats in Congress." The Times adds, "The appearance of some candidates vying to be tougher than Republicans on border security, particularly in tight races in conservative states, shows how divisive the immigration issue remains. The tough border security message is carried mostly by Democrats in the South and the Midwest, where a surge of Hispanic immigration is transforming small towns and cities."

Mail Order Bride Law Seeks To Reduce Incidents Of Domestic Violence. The New York Times (10/17, Porter, 1.21M) reports on the impact of a "Congressional effort intended to protect women from potential abuse by American men who seek brides from other countries on the Internet. In June, the federal immigration service froze 10,000 visa applications for foreign fiancées because they did not conform with a law that went into effect in March." The International Marriage Broker Regulation Act, "or Imbra, is intended to give foreign women and the American government more information about the men who seek so-called mail-order brides." Sen. Sam Brownback, "a leading sponsor of the law," said, "This is an unequal partnership where you have somebody dependent on somebody else in a profound way. It puts women at a significant disadvantage, in a potentially violent situation." The Times adds, "Reports of violence in international marriages, some of them Internet matches, have increased in recent years." But the "new law has angered many men, who argue that there is no definitive evidence that violence is more likely to take place in an international marriage arranged over the Internet than in a domestic one."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Kuo Says Faith-Based Initiative Grant Review Was "A Farce." The Washington Post (10/17, A19, Cooperman, 748K) reports White House officials "realized they had a problem, former staffer David Kuo writes in his new book, 'Tempting Faith,' when they saw how a panel rated the first applications for grants under the 'faith-based initiative,' President Bush's vaunted effort to help religious charities." On a scale "of 1 to 100, respected national organizations such as Big Brothers Big Sisters of America scored in the mid-70s to mid-80s, 'while something called Jesus and Friends Ministry from California, a group with little more than a post office box,' scored 89 and Pat Robertson's overseas aid organization, Operation Blessing, scored 95, according to Kuo." Kuo wrote, "It was obvious that the ratings were a farce." He and "other White House aides feared that if the list became public, 'it would show once and for all that the initiative was purely about paying off political friends for their support.'" The Post adds the excerpts from Kuo's "explosive book" brought "heated denials from White House press secretary Tony Snow and other current and former Bush administration officials." In addition to "being a memoir of his three years in the White House, where Kuo was deputy director of the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives until December 2003, the book is a saga of falling in, and out of, love with conservative Christian politics."

In his Washington Post column (10/17, A21), E.J. Dionne says, "The headlines that have come Kuo's way have focused on the author's claims that White House staffers ridiculed some of their evangelical supporters as 'nuts' and 'goofy' and that public events surrounding Bush's faith-based initiative were geared toward Republican electoral fortunes. As a former deputy director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, Kuo has a fair claim to knowing what he's talking about." But the "most useful thing that could flow from Kuo's revelations would not be a splashy exchange of charges and countercharges but rather a quiet reappraisal by rank-and-file evangelicals of their approach to politics. I hope Kuo's book promotes serious discussions in religious study groups around the country about whether the evangelicals' alliance with political conservatism has actually made the world, well, more godly from their own point of view."

DOJ_NMG_0082043

2001 Concert Organizers Say Kuo Left Them On Hook For $25,000. The Washington Post (10/17, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 748K) reports Kuo "has plenty of GOP loyalists furious with him right now. They can line up behind organizers of the October 2001 'United We Stand' concert, who say Kuo stiffed them to the tune of $25,000." Kuo was "the administration's point man for the star-studded concert at RFK Stadium (featuring Michael Jackson, Aerosmith, James Brown, Janet Jackson, Mariah Carey, P. Diddy, Rod Stewart, Destiny's Child), which was thrown together in the weeks following the 9/11 attacks to benefit the American Red Cross and other relief funds." Republican fundraiser Rob Jennings "told us Kuo seized on an idea to hand out 50,000 American flags to the audience and repeatedly assured organizers he could find an underwriter for the $25K cost -- and so the flags were ordered and paid for by the promoter." But the "money never arrived, despite Kuo's continued promises. Kuo eventually stopped returning calls, and organizers were quietly asked by the White House to back off, said Jennings."

Internal Report Found Specter Aide Broke No Rules On Earmarks. Roll Call (10/17, Stanton) reports, "An internal investigation of a senior aide to Sen. Arlen Specter…and spousal connections to Congressional earmarks found that no illegal or unethical activity occurred, according to a copy of the report reviewed by Roll Call. However, the report found that Senate ethics rules do not adequately address the large number of spouses, children and other immediate family members who also work as lobbyists, prompting Specter to institute a series of changes to his internal rules of conduct. The investigation was conducted following news reports that questioned the role that Specter aide Vicki Siegel may have played in securing earmarks sought by clients of a lobbying firm founded by her husband."

Hastings Says Foley Probe Will Go "Wherever The Evidence Leads." House ethics committee chairman Rep. Doc Hastings finds himself in the spotlight as his panel looks into sexually explicit messages sent by former Rep. Mark Foley to teenage male House pages. The AP (10/16, Daly) reported that Hastings "pledges that the Foley investigation will go wherever the evidence leads. 'I take that responsibility that I have as the chairman of the ethics committee very seriously,' he told The Associated Press. 'Life gives you all sorts of responsibilities, and sometimes you just have to deal with them. I feel very confident in the direction we are moving.'" The AP added, "Asked whether he personally supports [House Speaker Dennis] Hastert, who named Hastings to lead the ethics committee, Hastings said, 'I think the speaker has done an excellent job.' Hastings later clarified that his remarks were 'not related to the matter at hand here.'"

Kildee Says Page Board Discussed Allegations Of Improper Conduct Toward Pages. Rep. Dale Kildee, the only Democratic member of the House Page board, said the board on Monday discussed allegations of improper conduct toward House pages which do not involve former Rep. Mark Foley. The AP (10/16, Margasak) reported that Kildee "would not elaborate on whether the discussion involved lawmakers. He said, however, that none of the allegations discussed have been proven." Kildee "commented after he testified before the House ethics committee on the Foley matter. … Kildee has said previously, and repeated again after his testimony, that he was not informed about Foley's e-mails and instant messages to former male pages until the scandal became public in late September."

Foley Scandal Said To Show GOP Hypocrisy. In his Washington Post column (10/17, A21), Richard Cohen) says the Mark Foley congressional page scandal is "so far…the ultimate Washington sex scandal: There is no sex. Maybe there will be sex. Maybe some underage page or former page will be discovered to have had sex with Foley, but so far this has not happened. This lack of a physical victim -- with the arguable exception of Foley and the entire Republican Party, that is -- may explain why certain GOP congressional bulls, from committee chairmen to the speaker of the House himself, did not bolt from the joint, pulling every alarm on the way out." Cohen concludes, "A sex scandal-turned-political panic involving just one person lacks a certain something. That it has attained such critical mass, that it threatens the speaker of the House and the GOP majority, says little about the repellent Foley but a lot about how the GOP has been hoisted by its own petard."

Reid To Amend Ethics Report To Account For Land Deal. NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 5, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported on "Harry Reid of Nevada, the top Democrat" in the Senate, and "a story that continues to follow him." NBC (Reid) added "Harry Reid had this real estate deal. Eight years ago he bought land for $400,000 and sold it six years later. Made a $700,000 profit. His critics say he violated Senate rules because he did not report it on his Senate financial forms. He said he'll fix the forms if he has to. Today he decided to jump ahead and to amend those forms and give the full story. He still insists that the deal itself is perfectly legal."

DOJ_NMG_0082044

CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, Blitzer) reported Reid is "amending his report to the ethics committee on a controversial land deal that earned him more than a million dollars. Reid did initially report it, but he's now facing new questions. He says he wants to account for the deal more fully. He also now says he failed to report two smaller land deals because of what he calls clerical errors."

The Washington Post (10/17, A4, Weisman, 748K) reports Reid "will amend four years of ethics reports to Congress to more fully explain a real estate transaction that allowed him to collect $1.1 million in 2004. At the same time, he said he will personally reimburse his political campaign $3,300 that his campaign fund contributed for the Christmas bonuses of support staff at the Ritz-Carlton in Washington, where he lives." The "actions, prompted by reports by the Associated Press, are proving to be a headache for Democrats as they press their case that Republicans have succumbed to a 'culture of corruption.' The land deal, in particular, has brought comparisons to a real estate transaction last year that netted House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) $2 million."

Roll Call (10/17, Billings, Ackley) reports while "admitting no wrongdoing, the top Senate Democrat said he has directed his staff to revise his ethics reports to make clear that he didn't sell the property in question in 2001, but merely transferred the title to the land to a limited liability corporation. Reid also said he would address 'two minor matters' left off his original disclosure forms relating to two smaller land transactions."

Reid Used Campaign Donations To Pay Condominium Tips. The New York Times/AP (10/17) reports Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "has been using campaign donations instead of his personal money to pay Christmas bonuses for the support staff at the Ritz-Carlton hotel here, where he lives in a condominium. Federal election law bars candidates from converting political donations for personal use." When "questioned about the campaign expenditures, Mr. Reid's office said Monday that his lawyers had approved them but that he nonetheless was personally reimbursing his campaign for the $3,300 he had directed to the staff holiday fund at his residence." The bonuses — "$600 in 2002, $1,200 in 2004 and $1,500 in 2005 — went from Mr. Reid's re-election campaign to an entity listed as the REC Employee Holiday Fund. His campaign listed the expenses as campaign 'salary' for two years, which Mr. Reid said was a clerical error, and as a 'contribution' one year."

The AP (10/17, Solomon) reports, "Back in 2000, Congress rebuked powerful House Transportation Committee Chairman Bud Shuster, R-Pa., for among other things creating the appearance, through poor record-keeping, that campaign committee expenditures were for personal rather than bona fide campaign uses." The Washington Times (10/17, 88K) also runs the AP story.

Many Relatives Of Members, Aides Lobbied Successfully For Clients. USA Today (10/17, Kelley, Eisler, 2.27M) reports, "No laws prevent family members from trying to influence lawmakers or top congressional staffers. Many have succeeded in getting millions for their clients, a USA TODAY investigation shows." While members of Congress "and their staffs are barred from using their positions for personal profit," their "spouses and other relatives can — and often do — cash in when lawmakers spend taxpayer dollars." USA found lobbying groups "employed 30 family members last year to influence spending bills that their relatives with ties to the House and Senate appropriations committees oversaw or helped write." They "connections are so pervasive that, in 2005 alone, appropriations bills contained about $750 million for projects championed by lobbyists whose relatives were involved in writing the spending bills." USA "found 53 cases in which relatives of lawmakers or their top aides worked at lobbying firms last year. In 30 instances, those relatives, or firms in which they are principals, sought money in the appropriations bills their family members or their family members' bosses helped write. Of those 30 relatives, 22 succeeded in getting specific language inserted in the bills that guaranteed money for their clients, USA TODAY found."

USA Today (10/17, Kelley, Eisler, 2.27M) also reports, "Family ties give lobbyists insight into how legislation is written — and access to those who are in positions to secure millions for specific projects" through earmarks.

Abramoff Scandal Said To Highlight Need For Charity Reform. In a New York Times op-ed (10/17), Frances R. Hill, a professor of law at the University of Miami and director of the tax program at the Campaign Legal Center, says, "A report issued last week by the minority staff of the Senate Finance Committee details how the fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff exploited tax-exempt organizations — both sham nonprofits and otherwise legitimate charities — to move money from clients he disdained to congressmen he hoped to influence." The "primary attraction" of the groups to Abramoff "was their opacity: Their ability to raise money in any amount, without limit, from any individual or entity anywhere in the world without disclosing the contributors to anyone." This "grim report from the Senate Finance Committee's Democratic investigators should remind Congress and tax-exempt organizations that reform is overdue." The "guiding principle should be simple and direct: a politician's only relationship with a charity should be as a contributor. Elected officials should not accept travel or meals or golf course fees, even if they claim that participating in charity events will induce others to write checks for a good cause." Congress should "begin by eliminating exceptions in ethics rules, campaign finance laws or lobbyist registration laws for benefits channeled to politicians through nonprofit, tax-exempt entities."

DOJ_NMG_0082045

Bush To Visit North Carolina School To Tout Success Of NCLB. In its broadcast last night, News 14 Carolina (10/16, 9:01 PM, Mathis) reported, "One Greensboro elementary school will be welcoming a very exciting visitor this week. President Bush is scheduled to visit Falkener Elementary School on Wednesday, and that means Greensboro has plenty of preparing to do in time for the president's big visit." Principal Amy Holcombe said, "I thought it was one of my brothers playing a joke on me at first." The school was selected as "a successful example of the No Child Left Behind legislation." Students "made a sign to welcome the president" and "the first dog, Barney." The school "will put all of its effort into making the school look great for President Bush's visit."

WGHP-TV High Point, North Carolina (10/16, 4:40 PM) reported, "The national recognition will spotlight the success Falkener has made in raising test scores. The majority of the school's students come from economically depressed backgrounds." Principal Holcombe said the school's success "comes after hard work and good student-teacher relationships."

Chairman Says TSP Could Grow To $200 Billion By Year's End. The Washington Post (10/17, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Account balances in the Thrift Savings Plan could grow to $200 billion by year's end, the chairman of the board that oversees the 401(k)-type plan for government employees said yesterday. Hitting $200 billion would make the TSP twice as large as four years ago, Andrew M. Saul , the head of the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, said at the board's monthly meeting."

USA Today Supports Spellings' Proposal For College Student Database. USA Today (10/17, 2.27M) writes in an editorial favoring a recent proposal by U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings to establish "a privacy-protected database that would collect information on all students attending college." The database "would open the way to comparative data and greater accountability." Claims by "private schools" that it would "compromise student privacy" are described as "dubious" and "hypothetical" while, "the need for a new system is real" because it would offer parents the answers to "many pressing questions" such as "what students actually pay, after financial aid," "why students drop out and where they go" and "what impact college has on their future success." American taxpayers and parents and students "deserve a more accurate picture of what they're getting for all that money."

Meanwhile, David Shi, president of Furman University and chairman of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, replies to the editorial in USA Today (10/17, 2.27M) arguing that, "the proposed database would put at risk fundamental privacy rights, especially the right of students to control their academic records -- a federally protected right since 1972." Supporters of the plan are said to "ignore the wealth of data already available online" including "graduation and retention rates, financial aid data, estimated student expenses, degrees awarded and much more." Instead of a database, Shi favors a plan for the USED to "make this data user-friendly."

WPost Decries Brownback's Hold On Neff Nomination. The Washington Post (10/17, A20, 748K) editorializes, "If you thought that fights over judicial nominations couldn't get any worse, consider the case of Janet T. Neff, whom President Bush has nominated to a federal district judgeship in Michigan." Neff "once attended a commitment ceremony for a lesbian couple -- and that has Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R) reaching for the smelling salts and blocking the nomination. Mr. Brownback has said he wants to satisfy himself that the judge was not presiding over an 'illegal marriage ceremony' in Pittsfield, Mass., in 2002 -- before the state legalized same-sex marriage. He has written to Judge Neff asking for an explanation, his spokesman says, and will hold up her nomination until he learns the nature of the ceremony and its legality." Bush "has finally reached a compromise with Michigan senators to ease one of the more intractable irritants in the wars over lower court nominations. Judge Neff is a piece of that deal, all of which could get derailed if Mr. Brownback does not back off."

OTHER NEWS:

Economists Say Bush Taking Credit On Economy Where Little Is Due. The Washington Post (10/17, D1, Montgomery, 748K) reports that President Bush last week took credit for figures showing the federal budget deficit shrinking by 40 percent over the past two years, which he hopes will strengthen his push for additional tax cuts. Bush "hailed the dwindling deficit as a direct result of 'pro-growth economic policies,' particularly huge tax cuts enacted during his first term. … Economists said Bush was claiming credit where little is due. The economy has grown and tax receipts have risen at historic rates over the past two years, but the Bush tax cuts played a small role in that process, they said, and cost the Treasury more in lost taxes than it gained from the resulting economic stimulus." The Post adds,

DOJ_NMG_0082046

"Democrats criticized the president for celebrating a deficit that still ranks among 'the largest in our nation's history,' as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California put it. And they pointed to CBO projections that the deficit will rise again next year and balloon in coming decades as 78 million retiring baby boomers make claims on Social Security and Medicare."

Economist Says US Economy Doing Well. Brian S. Wesbury, chief economist at First Trust Advisors L.P., writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/17, 2.03M) that "it is getting harder for cynics and pessimists to argue that the US economy is doing poorly. But this does not stop them from trying. Lately, the old class-warrior standby, that 'Wall Street may be doing fine, but Main Street suffers,' is echoing down the alleyways. Fortunately, no matter how many times this theory bounces off the walls, there is little in the way of facts to back it up." Wesbury adds, "Massive positive revisions to employment and incomes, rising stock prices and a flood of new tax revenues paint a much different picture than conventional wisdom had expected. But history is clear. As long as government policies do not hinder entrepreneurship, the US economy can overcome even the most daunting of challenges. Have faith."

Dow Jones Edges Closer To 12,000 Mark. NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 6, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York today, so close but still no 12,000-mark for the Dow -- though the numbers were up. The Dow was up 20 points [to close at 11,980.60]. NASDAQ also up for the day about 6 and a half points [to close at 2,363.84]." The Wall Street Journal (10/17, C1, McKay, 2.03M) says "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock Index rose 0.3%, or 3.43 points, to 1369.05, up 9.7% on the year and at a new 5½-year high."

USA Today (10/17, Block, 2.27M), in a story about the stock market, says that if it "sustains its strong performance through the rest of the year, investors won't be the only winners. Charities will likely benefit, too. Historically, stock market performance has been closely correlated with charitable giving, research by the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University shows."

As Drop In Gas Prices Continues, Analysts Dismiss Talk Of Price Manipulation. CBS Evening News (10/16, story 6, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The way things are going at the gas pump, there's no point in topping off your tank today. Chances are, the price will be even lower tomorrow. As of tonight, gas is the lowest it's been all year. A nationwide average of $2.23 a gallon. It hasn't been that low since last Christmas. But is this an election year present from President Bush to fellow Republicans?" CBS (Mason) reported, "Gas started going down just as the fall campaign started heating up. Coincidence? Some drivers don't think so." Unidentified male: "I think it's basically a ploy to sort of get the American people to think, well, the economy is going good, let's vote Republican." Mason: "Call the conspiracy theory crazy, but it's spreading through Internet blogs. And over the airwaves. A recent poll found 42% of people believe the Bush Administration has deliberately manipulated the price of gas to affect the election." Mason: "But analysts say there's no conspiracy." Andy Lapemiere, analyst, ISI Group: "It's preposterous." Mason: "Supply and demand determine gas prices, he says, and apart from controlling the relatively small Strategic Petroleum Reserve," Lapemiere: "There's virtually nothing the President can do to impact oil prices and gas prices." Mason: "In any case, Iraq is now weighing down President Bush's poll numbers. Lower gas prices have made Americans feel better about the economy, but they're not making them feel better about the President."

NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 8, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "As you no doubt recall, it was something of a crisis when [gas] prices hit their high at the peak of the summer driving season. Average price for a regular gallon back then hit $3.04. Now it's fallen to $2.23. We sent Kerry Sanders to a colorful part of the country this time of year, New England, to see if the lower prices are having an impact." NBC (Sanders) reported, "Everybody is affected by the price of gas." Sanders said, "The Pulaski family also thankful for lower prices but suspicious." Unidentified female: "I think it's pretty convenient given the elections are coming up." Sanders reported that lower gas prices "encouraged people to hit the back roads of new England this autumn."

Columnist Says Low Gas Prices Will Test Commitment To Alternative Fuels. In his "Eyes on the Road" column, the Wall Street Journal's (10/17, D7) Joseph B. White says October is "turning into a big month for alternatives to century old gasoline car technology" as various automakers have announced plans to increase production of gas-electric hybrids, so-called "plug-in" hybrids, and vehicles capable of running on ultra-low sulfur diesels. "To top it off," White notes that President Bush on Thursday "used the podium of a Renewable Energy Conference in St. Louis to express his enthusiasm for a wide range of oil-conserving technologies, including corn and cellulosic ethanol, fuel cells, and plug-in hybrids, as well as nuclear power, natural gas and coal." However, White says, "There's just one problem: Gasoline is once again getting cheap, or at least, cheapish." Bush said Thursday that the low gasoline prices are "not going to dim my enthusiasm for making sure we diversify away from oil," but White says the next several months "will be a test" of how committed Americans are to reducing their gas consumption. Toyota has "publicly defined success as selling 60,000 Camry hybrids a year," and White warns, "If the Camry misses that target, it could be a sign that President Bush is right to be worried about the resolve of Americans to end oil addiction, just because they should."

DOJ_NMG_0082047

NYTimes Criticizes Bush's DOE On Appliance Standards. The New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "President Bush touched a lot of the right bases in a speech in St. Louis that focused on the urgent need for increased efficiency and alternative fuels to address the country's energy problems, including its dependence on imported oil. It would be helpful, though, if he could get his Department of Energy on the same page." Under Bush, the Department "has been more passive than ever, failing to issue a single strengthened efficiency standard" for appliances "since he took office."

White House Seeking To Solidify Support Among Talk Radio Hosts. The New York Times (10/17, Rutenberg, 1.21M) reports that last month, White House aides "ushered an influential group of conservative radio hosts into the Oval Office for a private audience with the president. For an hour and a half, Mr. Bush discussed his case for the war in Iraq, his immigration proposals and even the personality of his Scottish terrier Barney, who scratched on the door during the session until the president relented and let him into the office, according to several hosts who attended." The meeting, "which was not announced on the president's public schedule, was part of an intensive Republican Party campaign to reclaim and re-energize a crucial army of supporters that is not as likely to walk in lockstep with the White House as it has in the past." Conservative radio hosts "are breaking with the Republican leadership in ways not seen in at least a decade, and certainly not since Rush Limbaugh's forceful advocacy of the party in 1994 spawned a new generation of stars, said Michael Harrison, publisher of the industry's lead trade publication, Talkers." The "disgruntlement can now be found not only among the more flamboyant radio voices, like Michael Savage, who raged against Mr. Bush's proposals on immigration and other issues, but also among more mainstream hosts, like Laura Ingraham," who criticized the Republican leadership after the Foley page scandal. The "challenge now falls to party strategists to persuade the hosts to overcome the frustrations of many hard-core listeners over issues like spending and border security without alienating them." The effort will peak on Oct. 24, when the administration will hold something of a talk-radio summit meeting, inviting dozens of hosts to set up booths on the White House grounds, where top cabinet officials are expected to sit for interviews." Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman "has already been working overtime on the talk radio circuit. From Wednesday to Friday of last week, he was interviewed a total of 20 times in Missouri, Tennessee and Ohio, promoting party stances on tax cuts and terrorism."

Taxes, Terrorism Are Key Bush Campaign Themes. USA Today (10/17, Jackson, 2.27M) reports President Bush's "political pitch boils down to two words and one argument. The words are taxes and terrorism. The argument: Democrats are wrong on both." The themes "dominate the half-hour stump speech Bush gives on behalf of Republican candidates across the country. Seeking to preserve precarious GOP majorities in Congress, he has delivered nine campaign speeches in October and could give as many as 20 more before the elections Nov. 7." This week, Bush "will speak at a Republican National Committee dinner in Greensboro, N.C., and on behalf of two embattled GOP incumbents, Rep. Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania and Sen. George Allen of Virginia." Like an "old song with new verses, Bush's basic text is constantly updated. White House communications director Kevin Sullivan said most of Bush's speech comes from the president's handwritten notes, from an outline he developed." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said the president's stump speech also carries a 'subtext. He's got a plan, and it's not clear the other guys do.'" USA Today (10/17, 2.27M) also includes a chart outlining the standard Bush stump speech.

Cheney Remains A Big Draw For GOP Faithful In The Heartland. The New York Times (10/17, A1, Liebovich, 1.21M) reports "the heart of Cheney Country" consists of "hotel ballrooms, military bases and private homes deep in the reddest of red states like Kansas (where President Bush and Mr. Cheney won by 25 percentage points in 2004). As a rule, people still love Mr. Bush in Cheney Country, at least relative to some locales. But the president cannot be everywhere, so Mr. Cheney comes instead, exposing as he goes the durability and devotion of his party's base." Cheney is "dispatched around the country — to Topeka last week, to Casper, Wyo., the week before, and to Wyoming, Mich., the week before that — to preside over events largely ignored by the national news media but covered big-time by the local press." He "raises a lot of cash for the Republican Party and its candidates — more than $40 million at 114 events since January 2005, many of them in off-Broadway political settings like Topeka. And he reaps a full helping of love."

The Christian Science Monitor (10/17, Feldmann, 58K) reports on a trip as the pool reporter covering Vice President Cheney's visit to Topeka, Kansas, and New Orleans. On the flight, Lea Anne McBride, "Cheney's communications director, came back to talk to the reporters about the speech the vice president would be delivering in Topeka at a fundraiser for Rep. Jim Ryun (R). Cheney was still putting finishing touches on his remarks, but he would focus on the economy and security, with an emphasis on 'consequence,' she said. The meaning of that last part soon became clear when we received an advance copy of the text: what to expect if the Democrats take control of Congress." The speech was "classic Cheney - red meat for core Republican voters at a time when anxiety is high over the GOP-led Congress's poor public image, the Iraq war, and scandals. Congressman Ryun appears in no danger of losing his seat, but no one's taking any chances." It was Cheney's "113th campaign appearance in the current two-year election cycle. The event raised $215,000 for Ryun, boosting Cheney's total fundraising for Republican candidates and committees since March 2005 to $40 million."

DOJ_NMG_0082048

GOP Maintains Cash Edge, Despite Democratic Fundraising Surge. USA Today (10/17, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Democratic candidates "out-raised their Republican opponents in nearly half of 27 tossup races for the House from July through September, new campaign finance reports show." Most of "the GOP candidates — 19 — had more cash on hand as of Sept. 30. And as of last week, the Republican Party and its allies were spending more heavily in the 27 districts." But independent analysts "called the Democratic surge unusual and said it suggests momentum for Democrats going into the final weeks of the campaign." Stuart Rothenberg said, "Most of the time the late money follows the winner, and the winner is mostly the incumbent." He added that this year, "the smell of Democratic victory is in the air." USA adds that six Democrats 'seeking open seats now held by Republicans in Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota and New York raised more money in the third quarter than their opponents. Another six challengers -- four in Pennsylvania and one each in North Carolina and Indiana — also pulled in more than their opponents."

The Washington Post (10/17, A5, Birnbaum, Goldfarb, 748K) reports that nonetheless, "Republican incumbents in highly competitive races in the House have a substantial cash advantage going into the final weeks before the midterm elections." Democrats "spent more heavily over the summer and early autumn than their Republican rivals in pivotal House districts, leaving themselves at a disadvantage of more than 2 to 1 in money on hand, according to a Washington Post analysis of the latest campaign disclosures." At the same time, Democrats "are on a better financial footing in open seats -- those in which an incumbent is not running. Of the 12 open House races considered tight, Republicans have more cash on hand in seven of them and Democrats are ahead in five, the Post analysis shows."

Roll Call (10/17, Whittington) reports House Republicans "are largely continuing to spend resources to boost the more than two dozen incumbents who appear more vulnerable by the day instead of diverting funds to second- and third-tier races that now look more promising for Democrats." The National Republican Congressional Committee "spent $9 million in independent expenditures on Friday — the largest one-day total for the committee this cycle — bringing the total number of races where the committee has invested at least $1 million for the general election to 18." The NRCC has "spent close to $1 million in at least two other contests, and all but one of these 20 seats are currently held by the GOP." House Democrats, "meanwhile, had spent more than $1 million in just three races as of Friday." House Republicans' "biggest investment so far — not counting the special election earlier this year in California's 50th district — has been in Ohio's open 18th district seat, where the NRCC had spent $2.35 million as of Friday to defend the district being vacated by Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), an admitted felon. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had spent almost $900,000 on the race by that same point." The NRCC "had spent $2.24 million on the effort to re-elect Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) as of Friday, making his 6th district race the second-most expensive for the committee."

Consensus Three Weeks Out Has Republicans Losing Only The House. The White House Bulletin/US News (10/16) reported, "Republicans are heading to defeat in the House and a close victory in the Senate, according to several political operatives and pollsters interviewed this morning." There is general agreement that Democrats "will pick up the needed 15 seats to claim the majority and will probably add another 10. But in the Senate, it appears that the Republicans will hang on to a one or two seat majority, according to the political insiders from both sides of the aisle." A GOP strategist said, "I have heard no political operative from our side saying we keep the House. In the Senate, though, the Democrats will pick up some but only gain to 49." The Bulletin adds a Republican pollster "speaking on background said the seat to watch in the Senate race is in Missouri, where Sen. Jim Talent is battling state auditor Claire McCaskill. 'Where Missouri goes, so goes the Senate,' he said." The pollster "also said that Pombo and Doolittle race in California are the ones to watch, suggesting if Republican Reps. Richard Pombo and John Doolittle lose, it's a signal the Democrats could pick up 25 or more seats." Pollster John Zogby in an email seemed to agree, saying, "Barring an October surprise or that vaunted Republican turnout machine versus ho-hum Democratic turnout, Democrats win the House and probably big."

White House "Insiders" Ponder Rove's Fate If Democrats Take The House. The White House Bulletin/US News (10/16) reported, "A big topic among White House insiders as the mid-term elections approach is the fate of Karl Rove if the Republicans lose control of the House or Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0082049

The consensus is that Rove's image will suffer, big time." "He will be taken a lot less seriously," a senior Republican strategist and informal White House adviser says. The Bulletin adds Rove's "luster has been diminishing in the GOP as the party's prospects for the mid-term elections look more and more bleak and as many Republicans blame the Bush administration for being too arrogant, inflexible, and isolated from its GOP allies on Capitol Hill and around the country." Rove's plan, "worked out in concert with Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman and White House political director Sara Taylor, is to make the November election a choice between individual Democratic candidates and individual Republicans, rather than a nationalized election based on Bush's record and the Iraq war. But, says the senior GOP strategist, 'it's increasingly clear that this is not a 'choice' election -- it's a referendum on Bush.' And whether or not this is fair to Rove, he will be blamed if the GOP suffers big reverses on November 7, GOP insiders say."

Gerrymandering Seen As Limiting Voters' Influence. In a USA Today op-ed (10/17), Ross K. Baker of Rutgers University says, "House incumbents have always held an advantage when Election Day arrived. But the system is now virtually rigged to keep lawmakers entrenched in Washington. The danger: Power has shifted to lawmakers and away from the people." The practice of gerrymandering House districts "will bolster incumbents of both parties and probably limit Democratic gains in the upcoming midterm elections that have historically favored the party out of power. Worse, it places in the hands of a tiny minority of voters in a handful of congressional districts the responsibility for indicating, with their ballots, the direction of the nation over the next two years." Scientific gerrymandering, "and the astute use of other advantages that accrue to incumbents, have resulted in an electoral sea wall around the House of Representatives that can withstand all but the most powerful political tsunamis. This year, it appears that only the gentlest tides will be lapping against this redoubt, and even though Democrats need only a 15-seat gain to recapture the House, such a narrow majority would carry no mandate."

Rothenberg Not Ready To Add Democratic Long Shots To House Watch List. In his Roll Call column (10/17), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says he is "tempted to add anyone who could possibly ride a wave to victory" in House races, because it is "the easy way out, and I've always taken that route in the past. But I've decided that I won't do it this year — at least not yet. I won't add Reps. Scott Garrett (R) in New Jersey's 5th district, Mark Souder (R) in Indiana's 3rd, Jim Ryun (R) in Kansas' 2nd, Cathy McMorris (R) in Washington's 5th or other potentially threatened Republicans just because their Democratic opponents have an allegedly encouraging poll or are up with TV ads. While I can't completely rule out the possibility that some or all of them could drown in a Democratic tsunami, I believe the chances are so small that I can't bring myself to put them on a list of endangered incumbents. As I said, at least not yet." In Garrett's district, Democrat Paul Aronsohn "distributed a polling memo, based on an initial March survey and a late-September poll, that alleged his race against Garrett was 'tightening up' and that a Democratic victory was 'very possible.'" But "even though the Republican 'generic' number has slipped, and even though the 'wrong track' number and President Bush's job approval rating have eroded, Garrett's trial heat number has remained the same, just a whisker under the 50 percent mark." The situation "is a bit different, but only a bit, in Colorado's 5th district, where a media poll shows a dead heat between Democrat Jay Fawcett and Republican Doug Lamborn for the open seat of retiring GOP Rep. Joel Hefley." But the "fundamentals of Colorado's 5th are so terrible for Democrats that it's hard to believe Fawcett will win." For Democrats, "the more interesting long shots may include Rep. Melissa Hart (R-Pa.), whose 4th district gave Bush 54 percent of the vote in 2004 and 52 percent four years earlier. Or Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R), who represents a competitive district in southeastern Minnesota. A true national wave could hit hard in districts like those, creating opportunities that Democrats ought not have in a normal year. That's why both of these races now are on my list of Democratic challenges to watch."

Democrats Outraise Opponents In Key Senate Races. The Wall Street Journal/AP (10/17, A6) reports Senate Republicans "were outraised by Democratic opponents in key races in third-quarter fund-raising, setting the stage for a competitive campaign stretch." In Virginia, Sen. George Allen "reported raising $1.94 million in the quarter ended Sept. 30 compared with $3.3 million raised by his Democratic challenger Jim Webb." In Missouri, Democrat Claire McCaskill "outraised Republican Sen. Jim Talent by about $1 million. Mr. Talent reported $4.2 million still in the bank, while Ms. McCaskill reported $246,000 in cash on hand after a major final television ad buy." Democrat Bob Casey "reported raising $3.94 million in his campaign to unseat Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Rick Santorum. The Santorum camp reported having $3.6 million in the bank at the end of September; Mr. Casey reported $3.7 million."

Lieberman Endorses Bolton For Confirmation As UN Ambassador. Sen. Joe Lieberman yesterday endorsed John Bolton for a permanent slot as UN Ambassador. The New York Daily News (10/17, Kennedy, 729K) reports that Lieberman's statement put him "at odds once again with Democrats, including his Senate colleague Chris Dodd. … 'I see no reason not to be for Bolton,' Lieberman told a meeting of the Daily News Editorial Board.

DOJ_NMG_0082050

'Based on his capabilities -- and now based on his performance -- I believe Bolton is well-qualified,' he said."

Chafee, Whitehouse Revisit Familiar Themes In Second Debate. The Boston Globe/AP (10/17, Smith) reports Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee and Democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse "tangled over corruption, independence and the Republican Senate on Monday in their second radio debate." Whitehouse said, "The Bush administration has been a disaster for America and a disaster for Rhode Island." Chafee said Whitehouse's "record as a former state attorney general and U.S. attorney was one of 'incompetence and willful blindness.'" The Globe adds the "conversation continued the themes the candidates have focused on in recent days, with Chafee assailing Whitehouse's record as a prosecutor and saying he ignored corruption by friends of powerful Democrats, and Whitehouse tying Chafee to President Bush and the 'Republican agenda.'"

The Providence Journal (10/17, Peoples, 168K) reports the debate "was largely civil -- and largely repetitive." Chafee did "his best to turn the debate to local issues and Whitehouse's actions as a former U.S. attorney in Rhode Island, compared to Whitehouse's repeated efforts to focus on the direction of the country and other national issues such as health care and Iraq."

Allen Says His Conservative Position On Key Issues Will Win Race. The Washington Times (10/17, Bellantoni, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Sen. Allen "said that he will be re-elected by sticking to conservative issues, even as national liberals are funneling cash to his Democratic opponent and linking the senator to an unpopular president.." On Thursday, Allen will "appear with President Bush to refuel his campaign coffers in an effort to counter Democrat James H. Webb Jr.'s robust fundraising and to rally his anti-tax and socially conservative base." Allen said, "If it's based on issues, stands on issues, solutions, ideas and a proven record of performance, I think we're going to win. The people of Virginia know me as a senator and as a governor."

Mark Warner Campaigns With Webb. The Washington Times/AP (10/17, Barakat) reports, "Virginia's two most popular politicians jumped full-bore into the state's Senate campaign yesterday, with former Gov. Mark Warner promising to do all he can to get Democrat James H. Webb Jr. elected and U.S. Sen. John W. Warner making a joint televised appearance with Republican Sen. George Allen." Mark Warner, who "surprised political observers Friday by forgoing an anticipated run for the presidency, campaigned yesterday with Mr. Webb at a Fairfax County retirement community and said many more joint appearances are forthcoming." Meanwhile, Allen "for the second time in his campaign purchased a two-minute block at 7:58 p.m. yesterday in all of Virginia's broadcast markets -- this time for a taped joint appearance with Sen. Warner."

Don King Campaigns With Steele In Maryland. The Washington Times (10/17, Ward, 88K) reports, "Boxing promoter Don King yesterday campaigned with Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in Prince George's County and Baltimore, telling black voters to support Mr. Steele's U.S. Senate candidacy even though he is a Republican." King said, "For black people, there can't be a fealty to party. That's not fidelity to truth." The Times adds, "With his trademark hair standing straight up, Mr. King appeared with Mr. Steele at a cafe in Largo Town Center and then on a street corner in West Baltimore. The two then visited a youth boxing center." King "criticized the state Democratic Party for not promoting black leaders."

Corruption Seen As Key Issue In New Jersey Senate Race. The Washington Times (10/17, Fagan, 88K) reports profiles the New Jersey Senate race, noting the same "Democratic leaders who have long hoped to regain control of Congress by blasting a Republican 'culture of corruption' are in danger of losing their shot at the Senate because of accusations of corruption against Sen. Robert Menendez." Menendez "has been plagued by news reports that he's under federal investigation for a long-standing rental deal with a nonprofit group that received millions in federal funding while he was a House member." Republican Tom Kean Jr. has "hammered the Democratic incumbent in negative ads. And the criticism increased last month after the Philadelphia Inquirer reported a taped conversation in which a Menendez ally told a government contractor that he would have 'protection' if he hired a doctor with ties to Mr. Menendez." Democrats say "they're not surprised by the Republican focus on accusations of corruption but say Mr. Menendez will win anyway by linking Mr. Kean to President Bush."

Brown's Pulitzer Prize-Winning Columnist Wife Aiding His Bid To Unseat DeWine. The Washington Post (10/17, C1, Slevin, 748K) runs a lengthy profile of OH13 Rep. Sherrod Brown's (D) wife, Connie Schultz, a Pulitzer Prize-winning columnist for the Cleveland Plain Dealer, who left the newspaper in February after her husband decided to run against Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine (R). The Post reports, "The campaign role is new to her. So, for practical purposes, is the marriage. Schultz and Brown met in 2003 when each was long divorced. … Brown, 53, is a doctor's son schooled at Yale. Schultz, 49, is a maintenance man's daughter who became her family's first college graduate. Yet with their progressive philosophy, their passion for the underdog and their gregarious flesh-pressing, there is no mistaking that they are a matched set." The Post adds, "Their collective decision to challenge DeWine, a family values conservative with an agreeable public persona in a state long dominated by Republicans, is the biggest political risk of their professional lives."

DOJ_NMG_0082051

Candidates Build Presence On Popular Social Networking Websites. USA Today (10/17, Keen, 2.27M) reports candidates are "using popular websites Facebook, MySpace and YouTube for the first time to give their campaigns free publicity, reach young voters and bypass traditional media. Once they're online, though, they risk being mocked and losing control of their messages." Facebook.com "created 1,400 candidate profiles that listed names, states, parties and offices. Of those, about 300 are updated by candidates or their staffs, marketing director Melanie Deitch says." But what's "online can be embarrassing: ·Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's Facebook profile has many posts from her Green Party rival, Howie Hawkins, who lists reasons he thinks the New York Democrat should be defeated." A Facebook search "for 'Mike DeWine' turns up the Ohio Republican senator's profile as well as links to several self-organized political groups of Facebook members. One group calls itself 'Mike Dewine and (Ohio Rep.) Deborah Pryce are tools,' a derisive slang for dupes."

Hillary Clinton's Avoidance Of Iowa Could Aid Rivals In 2008. The New York Times (10/17, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has zigzagged through much of the country" over the last three years, "bouncing among Ohio and California, New Jersey and Colorado, Pennsylvania and Michigan, raising tens of millions of dollars and meeting with legions of Democrats. But she has conspicuously bypassed Iowa, whose caucuses will be the first presidential nominating contest, and New Hampshire, the state with the earliest primary, where her last visit was even longer ago." Clinton's strategy is "a tacit recognition that crossing the border into a state that will matter early in 2008 would set off a cascade of attention and be tantamount to an official announcement that she is running for president." But "depending on how long she waits, her absence from Iowa also risks giving her Democratic rivals an opening to curry favor with voters here. Other candidates are already in a nearly constant march through the state, hiring operatives and seeking commitments from grass-roots organizers." Former Democratic National Committee Chairman Terry McAuliffe "acknowledges that 'the other candidates are there rounding up donors.'" McAuliffe added, "But beyond that, it doesn't matter at this point. She's in a unique position." The Times adds McAuliffe was quick to add Clinton "was engaged 'in a deliberative process,' deciding whether to run. 'Anybody who tells you she's running today is crazy,' he said." The Times adds, "Other strategists agree that if Mrs. Clinton does run, then the moment she begins to devote her attention to a presidential campaign her financial and name-recognition advantages will wash away any memory of the years she declined to visit Iowa and New Hampshire."

States Consider Privatizing Major Highways. USA Today (10/17, Kim, 2.27M) reports, "A number of states have looked at privatizing major highways to fill budget holes and cover the expense of fixing other crumbling roads. Gov. Jon Corzine of New Jersey is considering leasing the New Jersey Turnpike and other toll roads, while road privatization has emerged as an election topic in Illinois and Ohio. … Northern Virginia lawmakers have resisted toll hikes on the Dulles Greenway, which is privately run. Leaders in Harris County, Texas, defeated a proposal this year to privatize toll roads in the Houston area, deciding to run the road themselves." Indiana's East-West Toll Road "is in its fourth month of private operation. In July, a private Australian-Spanish consortium took over the 157-mile highway, which runs east from Chicago to the Ohio border. The consortium will operate, maintain and collect tolls on the road for 75 years. In return, it gave Indiana a one-time, lump-sum payment of $3.8 billion. … State Treasurer Tim Berry said Indiana has reaped more than $55 million in interest from the consortium's payment."

US Population To Top 300 Million Today. NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 7, 3:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It will take place across this country tomorrow morning and if you didn't know it was coming, there's no way you would know." Today, "at 7:46 AM Eastern time and don't ask us how they estimate it, the US population will click over to 300 million. That's a lot more people in the same amount of space. Americans are on the move and they are heading in one basic direction it appears to be Southwest. That makes Nevada the fastest-growing state in the United States."

Missouri Amendment Said To Be Cloning Trojan Horse. In his syndicated column, running in the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (10/17) among other papers, Robert Novak says a new video "available on YouTube marks a late attempt by pro-life forces to avert serious defeat in Missouri Nov. 7, with national implications. Cathy Ruse, speaking for Missourians Against Human Cloning, declares: 'Amendment 2 is a fraud. It is an attempt to trick Missourians into approving -- in their Constitution -- human cloning, the right of biotech firms to do human cloning in Missouri -- something Missourians oppose by an overwhelming majority.'" Novak adds, "But Amendment 2 is identified for many Missouri voters by the language at the beginning of the five-page ballot initiative: 'No person may clone or attempt to clone a human being.' That explains why polls have shown a substantial margin of support for the constitutional amendment, which is also backed by key Republican politicians and business interests. It seems to offer the best of all worlds: government support of stem cell research without fear of cloning." But the initiative "so narrowly defines cloning as to open the door to any cloning procedure that takes place outside the womb. If this is approved by a state that historically is a barometer of national trends and is considered a pro-life stronghold, it will be a national model for breaking popular resistance to what the scientists and biotech companies want."

DOJ_NMG_0082052

WPost Says Maryland Gubernatorial Candidates Didn't Keep Promises On Crime. An editorial in the Washington Post (10/17, A20, 748K) says, "As the Democratic candidate for mayor of Baltimore in 1999, Martin O'Malley set a goal of cutting the city's annual number of murders to 175; they were then running at more than 300 a year. He failed. … As the Republican candidate for governor of Maryland in 2002, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. also set a goal: to reform the state's decrepit, Dickensian system of juvenile jails. He also appears to have fallen short, though that record is not as easily quantified. … Messrs. O'Malley and Ehrlich, in the heat of the campaign homestretch, are busy bashing each other over issues of crime and punishment. They are key questions for voters throughout the state, particularly in the high-crime areas of Baltimore and Prince George's County, and they played a prominent role in the candidates' back-to-back debates this past weekend. … The hard problems of drugs and gangs are impediments to denting the problems that both men inherited. But the disappointing results in Maryland's juvenile jails and on Baltimore's rough streets raise questions about the managerial abilities of both candidates."

NYTimes Critical Of Legal Move By Blackwell Supporters. The New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) says in an editorial that Ohio Republican gubernatorial nominee Kenneth Blackwell, "who is also the Ohio secretary of state, could rule that his opponent is ineligible to run because of a technicality. We'd like to think that his office would not ultimately do that, or that if it did, such a ruling would not be allowed to stand. But the mere fact that an elected official and political candidate has the authority to toss his opponent out of a race is further evidence of a serious flaw in our democracy." Democrat Ted Strickland is leading Blackwell in the polls, and one Blackwell supporter has filed a residency challenge to Strickland's candidacy. The Times adds, "The complaint itself is without merit. No one disputes that Mr. Strickland lives in Ohio, or that he is registered." The case shows "election administration should be removed from partisan politics, in Ohio and everywhere else."

NYTimes Praises Bloomberg For Family Anti-Poverty Program. The New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) says in an editorial that New York is "searching for new ways to fight persistent poverty, and Mayor Michael Bloomberg's Commission for Economic Opportunity has recommended useful reforms. To encourage families to participate in these programs, the mayor hopes to recruit private donors to provide parents with a cash incentive to make the right choices for their children — like taking them in for regular checkups and making sure they stay in school." The idea is "based on a highly successful Mexican antipoverty program, known as Oportunidades, that is now being tried by at least 25 other countries." To "get payments for food, mothers must bring their children in for regular health checkups and attend informative talks at health centers."

North Korea May Be Preparing For Second Nuclear Test. NBC Nightly News (10/16, lead story, 3:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported North Korea is now "a full-scale crisis." US intelligence "has picked up fresh evidence they might be planning yet another test on the very same day when we were able to confirm the first test was indeed the real thing." ABC World News (10/16, lead story, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) noted that "confirmation that the North Korean's did indeed set off a nuclear device last week, a small one. Air samples prove it, showing radioactive particles in air above the site of the blast and anticipation that North Korea may be on the brink of set off a second device." The New York Times (10/17, Shanker, Sanger, 1.21M) says that "confirmation of a plutonium-based weapon "strongly suggested that [Pyongyang's] second path to a nuclear bomb — one using uranium — was not yet ready."

An AP (10/17, Chang) report this morning focuses on a possible second test, saying Seoul and Tokyo "warily monitored unconfirmed reports Tuesday of possible preparations by North Korea for a second nuclear test. Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said his government has 'information' concerning media reports that North Korea could be laying the groundwork for another blast," while Seoul said it "also was aware of signs related to possible preparations." The CBS Evening News (10/16, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) showed Secretary Rice saying of the unconfirmed reports, "We're watching it, obviously, and discussing it with other parties as well. I think it goes to say that that would further deepen the isolation of North Korea and I hope they would not take such a provocative act."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, Malveaux) reported, "With confirmation that North Korea did, indeed, conduct a nuclear test and is possibly ready to carry out another, a measured warning from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." Rice: "It goes to say that that would further deepen the isolation of North Korea and I hope they would not take such a provocative act." The AP (10/17, Raum) reports Rice's tone yesterday "at times was conciliatory." She said, "Let's give some time to these sanctions to work. Let's give some time to the diplomacy to work. Let's see if North Korea can be pushed in a different direction. But we've got a much stronger set of tools with which to do that."

DOJ_NMG_0082053

ABC World News (10/16, lead story, 2:20, Karl, 8.78M) said that in South Korea, "they were preparing for war. Wailing sirens sent people scurrying to underground bomb shelters. Just a drill, but considering the latest developments, a drill with added urgency."

Bush Says One-On-One Talks Would Not Work. President George W. Bush was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16) why the US will not talk to North Korea one on one. Bush said, "We tried that and didn't work," adding, "What I'm saying is there was kind of a good faith effort made to engage North Korea and try to convince them in a bilateral way to give up their weapons programs. There was an agreement made and they didn't honor the agreement. And so I decided since that didn't work, we ought to try another way forward in order to solve this problem peacefully and this is to have China at the table and South Korea at the table and Japan at the table and Russia at the table. My attitude is real simple on this. More voices saying the same thing to North Korea makes it more likely that we will be able to solve this issue peacefully."

In Asia, Rice Will Seek To Lock-Up Support For UN Resolution. Under the headline, "Rice Trip To Push Full Sanctions For North Korea," the Washington Post (10/17, A12, Kessler, Linzer, 748K) reports Secretary Rice "said yesterday that she will push for full implementation of U.N. sanctions against North Korea as punishment for its recent nuclear test when she makes a critical visit to Asia and Russia this week." She is quoted saying, "Every country in the region must share the burdens as well as the benefits of our common security." She "called on nations to 'collectively isolate' North Korea, adding that it 'cannot destabilize the international system and then expect to exploit elaborate financial networks built for peaceful commerce.' Rice also warned Iran…that the Security Council will begin work on a resolution condemning Tehran for not suspending" its uranium enrichment program. At a press conference, Rice "told reporters that on her trip she will reassure Japan and South Korea that 'the United States has both the will and capability to meet the full range of our security and deterrent commitments.' That is a diplomatic way of saying that the U.S. nuclear umbrella will make it unnecessary for those nations to consider developing their own nuclear weapons."

The AP (10/17, Shrader) reports Rice "declared that UN sanctions prove the world is united in opposing Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions. Such strong opposition should be a warning to Iran, too, said Rice, who is leaving Tuesday morning for an Asian trip that is expected to be dominated by the nuclear issue." She "acknowledged international concerns of escalating the crisis and said she would address that on her trip." The AP adds that Pyongyang's "unpredictable behavior and its history of trading weapons and components makes its nuclear advancements particularly worrisome to its neighbors and the international community."

AFP (10/17) reports Rice "announced she would visit Russia later this week as part of a foreign tour focused on enacting tough UN sanctions against North Korea over its nuclear test. Rice said she would travel to Moscow following visits to Japan, South Korea and China in the wake of" the approval of UNSCR 1718. "'The purpose of my trip is to rally the support of our friends and allies in Northeast Asia for a comprehensive strategy,' she said."

The Financial Times (10/17, Dinmore, Sevastopulo) reports Washington "insisted on Monday on the right to intercept suspicious North Korean cargo under the authority of [UNSCR 1718], setting the stage for a difficult trip to Asia for" Secretary Rice. "Describing resolution 1718 passed unanimously as 'a very powerful tool,' Ms. Rice said it made possible the 'interdiction of dangerous and suspicious cargo. We expect every member of the international community to fully implement all aspects of this resolution and we expect the Security Council to aggressively monitor the process,' she said." The Times says, however, that Chinese PermRep Wang Guangya "disagreed, telling reporters: 'Inspections yes, but inspections are different from interception and interdiction.' He said the resolution did not make it mandatory for all nations to inspect cargo going to and from North Korea. States could carry out such an operation as necessary 'in accordance with their national legal authorities,' he said."

The AP (10/17, Guan, Ang) focuses its reporting on active Chinese enforcement of UNSCR 1718 along its 880-mile land border with North Korea. "At a border-crossing post in the Chinese city of Dandong, about 30 Chinese trucks were seen being checked on Monday morning while 50 empty North Korean trucks waited in line to enter China to pick up cargo. Customs officers opened the back of each truck and looked at its cargo as it rolled up, though they didn't open individual boxes or bags. By contrast, reporters who visited the border post last week didn't see inspectors open any trucks." Furthermore, "in a sign of Beijing's wariness about refugees, construction of a massive concrete and barbed wire fence along parts of [the border] has picked up in recent days. Scores of soldiers have arrived in communities along the banks of the Yalu River, up from Dandong, over the past week to erect the barrier, farmers and visitors to the area said."

USA Today (10/17, Nichols, Slavin, 2.27M) reports that China, "which had expressed concerns about inspecting cargo bound for North Korea, on Monday checked trucks going to North Korea from the city of Dandong." China's UN ambassador "said Beijing would not stop and board ships, however."

DOJ_NMG_0082054

The AP (10/17, Klug) quotes R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, saying, "We have indications this morning the Chinese are beginning to apply this to their very long land border" with North Korea, and "we also have announcements from Japan and Australia. I spoke to both governments this morning. They are both implementing this." He added "there will be 'enormous pressure on China to live up to their responsibility' in enforcing United Nations punishment of its ally, North Korea. 'We are all banking on that.'" White House press secretary Tony Snow "said President Bush had not personally been making any calls Monday on the matter. Snow urged patience before judging China's commitment to the inspections."

The CBS Evening News (10/16, story 2, 2:30, Pizzey, 7.66M) reported, "To be effective, the new UN sanctions must isolate North Korea even more than it already is and the China/North Korea border crossing may be the most crucial. Controls along that 880-mile long frontier appear to be more stringent today, even after China said it was lukewarm to the idea of inspecting North Korean cargo." Christopher Hill, Assistant Secretary of State: "I think this nuclear test has really brought us all much closer to China and brought China closer to us."

ABC World News (10/16, story 2, 2:30, Litke, 8.78M) said "the Chinese government opposes tougher sanctions that could lead to the sudden collapse of North Korea and a flood of desperate Korean refugees. So, while China is still furious with the North for carrying out its nuclear test, it was clear from the traffic jam across the Yalu River today, the Chinese are not ready to abandon their troublesome neighbor -- not yet."

Abe Said To Seek More "Active Role" For Japan. An analysis piece in the Wall Street Journal (10/17, A6, Hayashi, 2.03M) reports UNSCR 1718 "provides a new test for Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe: how to play an assertive role without straying from the nation's nonmilitaristic constitution." Tokyo "is trying to figure out how to participate in a provision of the resolution…that allows nations to board North Korean ships suspected of carrying banned items and inspect their cargo." The Journal adds, "Japan's pacifist constitution would make it difficult for it to inspect any ships," however, "officials are considering invoking for the first time a clause in a 1999 law that allows its self-defense forces to provide support functions to the U.S. military under a special situation: if Japan faces an emergency situation in the Asian region in which a direct military attack on the country seems imminent." Tokyo's "attempt to play an active role in condemning North Korea reflects an attempt by [Abe] to give Japan greater influence in East Asia. … It also is the latest example of Japan's effort to have its military, known as Self-Defense Forces, take on greater responsibility outside its borders."

Bush Says Putin Agrees Iran Cannot Have A Nuclear Weapon. President George W. Bush said on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16), "I had a good talk with Vladimir Putin the other day about the Iranian issue and he knows full well that Iran cannot have a nuclear weapon. Those weapons can fly west or they can fly north." Asked why Russia is selling Iran all kinds of weaponry, Bush said, "I don't think he is arming Iran to the point where they are using a lot of Russian weapons in the theater. There were a lot of Russian weapons in Iraq before we even got there. And of course that would concern me if there is a lot of evidence that he's doing that. I'm concerned -- I do believe, however, that he understands the strategic importance of making sure Iran doesn't have a nuclear weapon. Let me say this. To the extent that we find anybody helping the enemy inside of Iraq we bring our concerns forward."

Moscow May Link Iran UN Vote To Russian Firms' Sanctions. The AP (10/17, Lederer) reports Moscow "demanded Monday that the United States lift sanctions against two Russian companies accused of making deals with Iran involving sensitive technology and hinted that a U.S. refusal could affect negotiations on a U.N. sanctions resolution against Tehran." PermRep Vitaly Churkin "said the sanctions against state arms exporter Rosoboronexport and top aircraft maker Sukhoi for allegedly violating a U.S. law known as the Iran Nonproliferation Act of 2000, create a 'predicament' for Moscow." He "said Russia wants the sanctions lifted off the two companies, whether or not U.N. sanctions are leveled against Iran." Washington "alleges the Russian companies have made deals with Iran involving sensitive technology. Russia has objected to the U.S. law, and both Russian companies deny any violation."

Administration Said To Have Eased Push For Egyptian Democratization. Under the headline, "US Eases Push For Egypt Reforms," USA Today (10/17, Slavin, 2.27M) reports, "Last year, [Secretary Rice] canceled a visit to Cairo to protest the arrest of an Egyptian opposition leader, Ayman Nour. … When Rice visited here earlier this month during a tour of the Middle East, not much had changed: Nour was back in jail, along with thousands of other political prisoners; and political reforms seemed to be on hold." The Administration, "like its predecessors — Republican and Democratic — has supported Egypt with an annual $2 billion in aid since Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel. In the aftermath of 9/11, however, President Bush began calling for democratic reforms in Egypt and the wider Middle East," and now "Rice says that there has been no change in policy."

DOJ_NMG_0082055

USA Today adds that "recent events in the Middle East have complicated U.S. efforts to push democracy" in Egypt, and Rice "said the Bush administration has not given up on democratic reforms but that each country has to move at its own pace."

Olmert Says He's Willing To Meet With Lebanese And PA Leaders. The New York Times (10/17, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told the Israeli Parliament on Monday that he was willing to meet the leaders of Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority in an effort to ease regional tensions, though no such meetings appear imminent." It was "the first day of Parliament's winter session." Olmert said, "I want to take this opportunity to call on Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora to meet with me face to face." In Beirut, "Siniora's office issued a statement saying that he had 'announced more than once that Lebanon will be the last Arab country to sign a peace deal with Israel.'"

Meanwhile, McClatchy (10/17, Nissenbaum) reports, "In the wake of this summer's war in Lebanon, the Golan Heights have re-emerged at the center of the latest land-for-peace proposal that some see as a chance to reshape regional dynamics. In an unexpected move, Syrian President Bashar Assad has offered to end his conflict with Israel if it gives back the disputed territory it's held for nearly 40 years." Olmert "and influential US diplomats have rejected the proposal as a meaningless feint from a weak authoritarian ruler." But "others, including a growing number of influential Israelis, see the offer as an opportunity to jump-start dormant negotiations at a time when the Middle East is drifting towards further instability."

Six States Require Pension Funds To Divest From Darfur. USA Today (10/17, Lynch, 2.27M) reports, "A courtroom battle over an Illinois law requiring state pension funds to sell any investments linked to Sudan is shaping up later this month as a critical test for a grass-roots movement seeking to pressure the regime behind the Darfur genocide. Illinois is one of six states that over the past year have passed laws requiring their pension funds to divest themselves of stakes in companies that do business in Sudan, a central African nation that has been consumed by warfare almost continuously since it became independent in 1956." USA adds, "Other human rights activists want to use divestment to discourage corporate activity in Sudan and ultimately cause Sudanese leaders to halt their support for the militias that are killing and raping in Darfur."

Sri Lankan Suicide Bomber Kills 94 Sailors And Civilians. The New York Times (10/17, Senanayake, 1.21M) reports, "A suicide bomber rammed a truck packed with explosives into a military convoy on Monday, killing at least 94 people and wounding 150. The explosion, about 100 miles northeast of the capital, was one of the deadliest attacks since a 2002 cease-fire between the government and separatist Tamils." Sri Lankan officials "blamed" the Tamil Tigers "for the attack, a charge the group neither acknowledged nor denied. The vast majority of those killed and wounded were sailors, but a military spokesman said some civilians were caught in the explosion." However, Colombo said it "still planned to attend peace talks with the rebels, which are being brokered by Norway and are to resume Oct. 28 in Geneva after an eight-month hiatus. The separatists have said they may back out of the talks." The Times calls the bombing "yet another sign that the four-year-old cease-fire was no longer being observed, even though neither the government nor the rebels have publicly disavowed it." The Washington Post/AP (10/17, A16, Francis) also reports the story.

Venezuela, Guatemala Deadlocked In Bid For Security Council Seat. The Washington Post (10/17, A13, Lynch, Forero, 748K) reports Caracas "was stymied Monday in its bid to win a seat on the UN Security Council, a result that shocked diplomats who had expected President Hugo Chavez's leftist, oil-rich government to gain a platform on the international stage. Guatemala finished ahead of Venezuela in nine of the first 10 rounds of secret" UNGA balloting, "but neither secured the required two-thirds vote to succeed Argentina" in the rotating Latin American seat. Caracas "never did better than a 93 to 93 tie with Guatemala. Afterward, several envoys expressed surprise that Venezuela had fared so poorly." The Post says the outcome "came as a relief to the United States, which had lobbied actively on behalf of Guatemala," and is "a personal blow to Chavez, who had run a costly political campaign that involved millions of dollars in aid to poor countries as well as state visits to Russia, China and the Middle East." Also, "South Africa, Indonesia, Italy and Belgium were easily elected Monday for their regions."

In more positive tones, the New York Times (10/17, Hoge, 1.21M) reports Caracas' "campaign…suffered a setback on Monday when Guatemala, backed by the United States, established a wide lead and maintained it after 10 ballots." Guatemala City "ended the day with a lead of 110 to 77," and the voting continues today "and could last days, until one prevails or the Latin American group decides to bring forth a compromise candidate." The Times calls the vote "a distinct blow to the ambitions of Hugo Chávez," who seeks "a global platform to vent his grievances against Washington." Ambassador Bolton is quoted saying, "In the year 2000, I was in Florida for 31 days. This has just begun."

The AP (10/17, Wadhams) adds, "Neither Venezuela nor Guatemala appeared willing to drop out of the election."

DOJ_NMG_0082056

Yesterday's voting "reflected the ambivalence toward Guatemala, the preferred American candidate. Even Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal had earlier expressed discomfort about the highly public American campaign against Venezuela and in support of Guatemala."

Ecuadorian Leftist May Have Been Hurt By Link To Chavez. The New York Times (10/17, Romero, 1.21M) reports, "Rafael Correa, the charismatic economist who garnered a surprisingly weak showing Sunday in the first round of voting for president, finds himself in a situation that has plagued leftists in other Latin American elections this year: defending his ties to President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela." Álvaro Noboa, "a conservative banking and banana magnate, surged ahead by attacking Mr. Correa's admiration for Mr. Chávez and his advocacy of nationalistic economic proposals that seemed inspired by Mr. Chávez's policies. The two candidates are expected to compete in a runoff election on Nov. 26. Noboa "called Mr. Correa a 'friend of terrorists, a friend of Chávez, a friend of Cuba.'"

Mexico's PRD Loses Key State Election. The New York Times (10/17, McKinley, 1.21M) reports, "The leader of the Mexican left, who has refused to accept his defeat in the summer's presidential race, saw his party take a beating over the weekend in a governor's race widely viewed as a referendum on his charisma and power as a populist. Though aides to the leftist leader, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, dismissed the loss as a minor setback, his detractors noted that it was the latest in a string of signs that he is losing public support, even in his home state, Tabasco." Sunday's election for governor in Tabasco, "in the south, suggested that Mr. López Obrador's ability to sway voters has waned since the presidential race. Returning to his home state, Mr. López Obrador, the former mayor of Mexico City, campaigned hard for weeks on behalf of his party's candidate, César Raúl Ojeda. He often upstaged the candidate during the final days of the campaign."

The Christian Science Monitor (10/17, Llana, 58K) notes Tabasco "voted heavily for Mr. Obrador" in the presidential race. Sunday's defeat of the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD) candidate, "is being viewed as a referendum on the future of Obrador's national protest movement." The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Enriquez, 918K), among other newspapers, also reports the story.

Victims Of Colombian Paramilitaries Criticize Decommissioning Process. The Washington Post (10/17, A14, Forero, 748K) reports, "In the midst of a relentless conflict, Colombia's government and its ally, the Bush administration, are hailing the demobilization of 32,000 fighters from right-wing paramilitary groups -- a disarmament that authorities here say is larger than any of those that closed out Central America's civil wars in the 1990s." However, the Post says, a "far more critical picture of the disarmament has emerged" from reports that "paramilitary commanders have killed hundreds of people in violation of a cease-fire, trafficked cocaine and stolen millions of dollars from state institutions they had infiltrated." Sen. Patrick Leahy is one of the "lawmakers on Capitol Hill have also voiced concerns about the disarmament," and he is quoted saying, "The demobilization process has been as much about avoiding justice and consolidating ill-gotten gains as it has been about disarming the paramilitaries. The government needs to stop appeasing the leaders of these outlaw militias and listen more to their victims." Even "critics acknowledge that the disarmament has yielded benefits," and "Colombian officials are pledging to conduct exhaustive investigations of paramilitary atrocities and launch trials of the militias' most bloodthirsty commanders." However, "in communities hit hard by paramilitary violence, …victims are incredulous about the government's lofty claims. Once fearful that speaking out could get them killed, they are increasingly organized and assertive. And they are sharply criticizing a process that they say is tilted more toward whitewashing crimes than punishing perpetrators."

China's Extensive Foreign Exchange Reserves Give It Unprecedented Clout. On its front page today, the Wall Street Journal (10/17, A1, Browne, 2.03M) reports China's approach of the $1 trillion mark in foreign-exchange reserves "has made Beijing a colossus in the financial world, cushioned against shocks at home, but potentially able to trigger them abroad." Chinese actions have "major repercussions for the global economy," and, "for the U.S., how China deploys its reserves is a question of some consequence." Some US experts "fear that China might one day dump its holdings of dollar-based assets, setting off a tidal wave of sales that might swamp the U.S. economy. Despite such fears, there's no sign that China is making a major move out of dollars and into euros or other foreign currencies, even though Chinese economists have occasionally warned that the weak dollar holds down the value of China's holdings." It's "enormous nest egg adds to its ability to project its influence around the world." The Journal says this wealth is "a direct result of China's effort to manage the exchange rate of its currency," however, "Chinese central bankers also worry that the plentiful supply of yuan is overheating China's economy and causing unwelcome inflation."

Wal-Mart Close To Purchasing Chinese Retailer For $1 Billion. The New York Times (10/17, A1, Barboza, Barbaro, 1.21M) reports that Wal-Mart is "laying the groundwork to become the biggest foreign chain in China with the $1 billion purchase of" Taiwanese-owned Trust-Mart, a major retailer in China. This "represents a large step for Wal-Mart's strategy in China, allowing the American retailer to more than double its presence in a country that, despite its size and growing middle class, remains largely untapped by foreign retailers." The Times adds, "Wal-Mart expects to close the deal for Trust-Mart by the end of the year, but it still needs approval by Chinese authorities, according to a person briefed on the transaction. … The deal puts Wal-Mart neck-and-neck in China with Carrefour, the giant French retailer, which also bid for Trust-Mart. Wal-Mart, which has only 66 stores in China compared with Carrefour's more than 200, outbid not only Carrefour, but also Tesco of Britain and one of China's large retailers, Lianhua."

DOJ_NMG_0082057

The Financial Times (10/17, Politi, Foster) reports, "People close to the talks said Wal-Mart had edged out France's Carrefour and local competitors but warned that details remained to be finalised and the deal could collapse.. A purchase of Trust-Mart, which is privately owned by Taiwanese entrepreneurs, would represent one of Wal-Mart's largest recent acquisitions. It highlights how China has become an important battleground for international supermarket chains as its rapid urbanisation and rising living standards create a new consumer class."

NYTimes Pans French Attempt To Outlaw Denial Of Armenian Genocide. The New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) editorializes, "We've argued many times that Turkey must come to grips with the crimes of its past and stop prosecuting writers who mention the Armenian genocide of the early 20th century. But we found it as absurd and as cynical when the French National Assembly voted overwhelmingly last week to make it illegal — on pain of a fine and imprisonment — to deny that there was an Armenian genocide." Turkish efforts to accept their history do "not excuse the way French politicians are trying to exploit anti-Turkish feelings while playing up to the large Armenian-French constituency." The legislation "could further fan anti-Muslim feelings in France," and is "a blow to freedom of expression." While European bans on Holocaust denial may also "violate freedom of expression," the "Armenian question poses no dangers in France. Playing politics with it trivializes not only the Holocaust, but also the Armenian genocide."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Teens' Dancing Is Freaking Out The Adults."
"Final Answer: Vietnam."
"The Post-Burning Question: Log It Or Leave It?"
"Victims' Families Sentenced To Silence."
"Gov. Keeps The Spotlight On."

USA Today:
"Relatives Have 'Inside Track' In Lobbying For Tax Dollars."
"Hit-Run Deaths See 20% Increase."
"U.S. Confirms N. Korea Blast Was Nuclear."
"Politicians' Campaigns Invade MySpace."

New York Times:
"Wal-Mart Said To Be Acquiring Chain In China."
"Iraq's Christians Flee As Extremist Threat Worsens."
"Skills Gap Hurts Technology Boom in India."
"Lawyer, Facing 30 Years, Gets 28 Months, To Dismay of U.S."
"Criminal Records Erased By Courts Live To Tell Tales."
"Cheney Hits Heartland, And He Can Feel The Love."

Washington Post:
"Families Flee Iraqi River Towns On 4th Day Of Sectarian Warfare."
"53% Of Voters Say They Back Va. Gay Marriage Ban."
"U.S. Faces Guantanamo Obstacles."
"Homes Raided In Rep. Weldon Influence Probe."
"In-Flight Fires An Unresolved Safety Threat."
"FDA Is Set To Approve Milk, Meat From Clones."

Washington Times:
"U.S. Verifies Korea Test Was Nuclear."
"Allen Touts Conservative record, Ideas."
"haven Fillings Move Up After Fall."
"Reid Used Campaign Funds Too Pay Bonuses To Staff."
"Afghans Need Shovels, Not Guns."
"Senate Hopes To Hinge On Corruption Charges In N.J."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"N. Korea Bomb Used Plutonium."
"Living High In Atlanta."
"GOP Lawmakers Team Up To Fill Party Checkbook."
"Get Skinny Minnie: Disney To Serve, Endorse Healthier Food."

Houston Chronicle:
"Unrelenting Deluge Turns Deadly For 4."
"'Texas Of Today' Is a Mirror For The U.S. Of Tomorrow."
"Debrillators Ordered Into High Schools After 4 Deaths."
"Builder's $8 Million Tops GOP Donor List."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: : North Korea; China & North Korea-Sanctions; Iraq Sectarian Violence; A Fallen Soldier's Dream; Houston Flooding; Hawaii Earthquake; More American Commuters; Uninsured In America; Madonna's Baby Adoption.
CBS: North Korea; China & North Korea-Sanctions; Hawaii Earthquake; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Crawford Guilty Plea; Gas Prices-Election 2006; Violent Crime; Football Fight; More

DOJ_NMG_0082058

Time For Commuters; George Washington's Real Face; Bob Dylan Musical.
NBC: North Korea; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Hawaii Earthquake; Houston Flooded; Legislators Under Fire; Stock Market; Population Growth-Nevada; Gas Prices; Lawyer In The Family; School Bands Of New Orleans.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: North Korea-Nuclear Test; Santorum-Casey Debate.
CBS: North Korea-Nuclear Test; Rice-Asia Trip; Iraq-US Troop Levels; Lidle Memorial Service; New Orleans-Ships Collide.
NPR: Rice-Asia Trip; Weldon-DOJ Investigation; Report-US Power Grid; HI-Earthquake; Wall Street; Stewart Sentenced; SCOTUS-Boy Scout Case.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Signs S.3930 - Military Commissions Act of 2006. Rose Garden; participates in ceremonial swearing in for the Secretary of Transportation, FAA offices, 800 Independence Ave. SW.; meets with the Prime Minister of Croatia. Oval Office.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Attends the Teddy Roosevelt and the Treasure of URSA Major, Kennedy Center.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: PRESIDENT ELLEN JOHNSON SIRLEAF OF LIBERIA _ Highlights: 2:30 p.m. Makes a ``major'' foreign policy address. Gaston Hall, 3rd floor, Healy Hall, Georgetown University. Event contact: Andrea Sarubbi, 202-687-4328. Note: Media RSVP requirfed. Preset at 10:30 a.m.

PRIME MINISTER IVO SANADER OF CROATIA _ Highlights: 2:30 p.m. Meets with President Bush. White House.

ACLU MEMBERSHIP CONFERENCE _ The ACLU holds its 2006 Membership Conference. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. Hill visits -- ACLU delegations lobby Congress. 1 p.m. Lunch Plenary: ``Abuse of Power: Law, American Values and National Interest'' featuring: Alberto Mora, former Navy General Counsel; John Dean, former Nixon White House Counsel, Katrina vanden Heuvel, Publisher/Editor of The Nation; ACLU Legal Director Steve Shapiro, and moderated by Jackie Northam. Location: Marriott Wardrman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

NONPROFITS _ The National Council of Nonprofit Associations holds its Non-Profit Summit. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

US-CHINA _ Meeting of the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission. Location: Hall of the States, 444 N. Capitol St.

NUCLEAR FUELS _ The National Academies holds a conference on the internationalization of the civil nuclear fuel cycle. Highlights: 9 a.m. Session on DOE efforts in new nuclear energy and international fuel cycles. 10 a.m. Session on technology for advanced nuclear fuel cycles, with Phillip finck of Argonne National Lab. 4:15 p.m. Session on nonproliferation and institutional considerations, with National Nuclear Security Administration Deputy Administrator Will Tobey. Location: 2100 C St. NW.

US-EUROPE _ 8:30 a.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a day-long conference on challenges for the 21st century in fence mending between the U.S. and its European allies. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Session on security and defense, with Adam Kobieracki of NATO, others. Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW. 10:30 a.m. Keynote address - Leszek Balcderowicz, President, National Bank of Poland. Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW. 1 p.m. Address by Francis Fukuyama, director of the SAIS International Development Program. Washington Club, 15 Dupont Circle.

COMPUTERS-TELECOM _ 9 a.m. - 6 p.m. The Computer Science and Telecommunications Board of the National Research Council celebrates its 20th anniversary with a symposium that looks at the future of computer science and telecommunications. Speakers include: William A. Wulf, president, National Academy of Engineering, Washington, D.C.; Eric Schmidt, CEO, Google, Mountain View, Calif.; Jon M. Kleinberg, professor of computer science, Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y.; .Rick Rashid, senior vice president for research, Microsoft Corp., Redmond, Wash.; and Prabhakar Raghavan, Yahoo! Research, Berkeley, Calif. Location: Lecture Room, National Academy of Sciences building, 2100 C St. NW.

300 MILLIONTH AMERICAN _ 7:46 a.m. The US Census Bureau's Population Clock ticks off the birth of the 300 millionth American. Location: Census Bureau headquarters, 4700 Silver Hill Road, Suitland, Md.

PAKISTANI MILITARY-POLITICS _ 8 a.m. - 10 a.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace sponsors a discussion," Disengaging Military from Politics," with Pakistani Lt. Gen. Asad Durrani. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

RELIGIOUS-ANTIWAR PROTEST _ 9 a.m. Religious groups protest a White House signing ceremony that they say legalizes torture. Location: Front of White House, Lafayette Park.

LUJAN AWARD _ 10 a.m. Interior Department presents the 2006 Manuel Lujan, Jr. Champions Awards to department employees for their work in carrying out the agency's mission. Location: Yates Auditorium, main Interior.

DOJ_NMG_0082059

CONTRIBUTIONS-CONGRESS _ 10:30 a.m. Public Citizen holds a telephone briefing to release a report on how much money members of Congress have received from special interest sources. Contacts: Robert Yule, 202-588-7703. Notes: Callin number: 800-377-8846; passcode: 36707396.

CHINA-SECURITY _ 11 a.m. The Heritage Foundation sponsors a forum, ``Shaping China's Security Environment The Role of the People's Liberation Army." Speakers: Larry M. Wortzel, chairman, U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission; and Andrew Scobell, research professor of National Security Affairs, Strategic Studies Institute, U.S. Army War College. Location: Heritage Foundation's Lehrman Auditorium, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

MILITARY COMMISSIONS _ 12 p.m. The Open Society Institute holds a telephone briefing with former CIA Inspector General Fred Hitz, criminal trial lawyer Neal Sonnett, others, on the new provisions of the Military Commissions Act of 2006. Notes: Callin number: 800-210-9006; passcoce: 7848100.

PENTAGON-AFGHANISTAN _ 12 p.m. UK Army Gen. David Richards, commander of NATO's International Security Assistance Force, will brief live from Afghanistan with an update on stability and security operations in Afghanistan. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

INDIA _ 12:30 p.m. Arun Shourie, member of India's upper house of parliament, discusses choices facing his nation in the 21st century, sponsored by the School of Advanced International Studies. Location: Room 500, 1717 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CHERTOFF _ 1 p.m. Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff speaks to the US Chamber of Commerce and American Chambers of Commerce in Latin America. Location: Hall of Flags, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, 1615 H St. NW.

DEMOCRATS-SENATE RACES _ 2:30 p.m. Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) Chair Chuck Schumer will hold a pen and pad briefing to discuss the latest developments in the Senate races. Location: Mott House, 122 Maryland Ave. NE.

JACOBY-IMMIGRATION _ 3 p.m. - 4 p.m. Tamar Jacoby, senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute and the editor of ``Reinventing the Melting Pot: The New Immigrants and What It Means to Be American," participates in a media conversation on immigration issues. Jacoby says that immigrants have a minimal affect on American wages, and argues that the full impact of immigration on the U.S. economy may be immeasurable and, therefore, is greater than often recognized. Notes: Open to media only. Please RSVP by 5 p.m. Monday, Oct. 16, to NYpressRSVPcfr.org.

BANGLADESH ELECTIONS _ 3 p.m. - 5 p.m. The US Commission on International Religious Freedom holds a public, on-the-record forum on ``The Bangladesh Elections: Promoting Democracy and Protecting Rights in a Muslim-majority Country." The forum will coincide with the release of the Commission's latest publication, ``Policy Focus on Bangladesh," which includes recommendations for US policy to advance respect for human rights in the world's third largest Muslim-majority country. Location: Room 2168, Rayburn House Office Building.

TRADE DEBATE _ 4 p.m. - 5 p.m. The National Press Club hosts a debate, ``The Choice between Free Trade and Fair Trade, between Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., author of Take This Job and Ship It: How Corporate Greed and Brain-Dead Politics Are Selling Out America;" and C. Fred Bergsten, director of the Institute for International Economics, and former assistant secretary of the Treasury for international affairs. Location: National Press Club, Lisagor Room.

SCHWAB _ 6:30 p.m. USTR Susan Schwab attends the Financial Services Forum dinner. Location: Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Maryland Ave. SW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, October 17, 2006 8:44 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, October 17, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061017.pdf; dojclips061017.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, OCTOBER 17, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

N.Y. Civil Rights Lawyer Sentenced To Prison (USAT/AP) 4
Stewart Gets 28 Months On Terror Charge (NSDY) 4
WRIST SLAP FOR SMIRK JERK TERROR ATTORNEY (NYPOST) 5
Lawyer Sentenced For Aiding Terrorist Client (WP) 6
Lawyer, Facing 30 Years, Gets 28 Months, To Dismay Of U.S. (NYT) 7
Radical US Lawyer Gets Jail Term For Terrorism Conviction (AFP-Y) 9
Defense Attorney Stewart Gets 26-Month Sentence (LAW) 9
The Sheik's Apprentice (WSJ) 11
Judge Goes Soft On Terror Lawyer (NYDN) 12
Jury Chosen For Chicago Terrorism Trial (BVND) 13
U.S. Faces Obstacles To Freeing Detainees (WP) 13
Why Democrats Oppose Military Commissions Act (WSJ) 15
Will The Supreme Court Shackle New Tribunal Law? (CSM) 15
Interrogators Beware (WP) 17
Sami's Shame, And Ours (NYT) 18

Homeland Response:

Mandatory Anthrax Shots To Return (WP) 19
Luck May Have Spared Aides In Anthrax Attack (RC) 20
Heavy Load Port-Security Plan, A Bid To Foil Terror, May Slow Deliveries (WSJ) 23
Ashcroft Criticized For Book On 9/11 Panel (AP) 25
In 3rd Storm, FEMA Trailer Is A Charm (NYT) 26

War News:

Bush Reassures Iraqi U.S. Troops Are Staying (WT) 26
Sectarian Fighting Kills 91 In Balad; Sunnis Flee City (USAT) 27
Bush Pledges To Keep U.S. Troops In Iraq (AP-Y) 28
Bush Reassures Iraqi That There Is No Timetable For Withdrawal (NYT) 29
Can You Tell A Sunni From A Shiite? (NYT) 30
Ongoing Iraqi Violence Claims New Lives (LAT) 31
Families Flee Iraqi River Towns On 4th Day Of Sectarian Warfare (WP) 32
Iraqis Ask Why U.S. Forces Didn't Intervene In Balad (NYT) 33
Iraq's Christians Flee As Extremist Threat Worsens (NYT) 35

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney To Join Gibson Dunn (WSJ) 36

Corporate Scandals:

KLA-Tencor Officials Depart Over Options Dating (WSJ) 37
KLA-Tencor Finds More Option Costs; Counsel Resigns (Update2) (BLOOM) 38
KLA Tencor Braces For $400 Million Blow For Mishandled Options (AP) 38
Two More Companies Probing Stock-option Dates Announce Management Changes (MERCN) 39
Stock Options Scandal Spreads (USAT) 40
UnitedHealth Shares Down As CEO Departs (AP-Y) 41
Old Options Still Haunt An Insurer (NYT) 42
McGuire's Options (WSJ) 43
More Exits Likely Over Stock Option Backdating (AP) 44
Comverse CEO Faces Additional Charges (LAW) 44
U.S. Suit Claims Agway Trustees Mishandled Assets (WSJ) 45
Schnitzer Settles With SEC Over Corruption Overseas (DOW) 45
Freddie Mac Names New Finance Chief (WP) 46

Criminal Law:

Attorney General Wants Study Of U.S. Cities' Rising Crime Rates (AP) 46
US Attorney To Study Cities With Violent Crime Issues (BOS) 47
Justice Dept. Will Gauge Need For Additional Funding To Fight Rise In Violent Crime (MCT) 47
Chertoff, Gonzales Tell IACP Cooperation Is Imperative DHS Will Create (OFFICER) 48
FBI Raids Home Of Rep. Weldon's Daughter (USAT) 49
FBI Raids Home Of Weldon's Daughter (AP) 49
FBI Raids Lobbyists' Homes, Office (LAT) 49
FBI Raid Deals New Blow To Republicans (FT) 51
FBI Raids Four Homes, Two Offices In Weldon Probe (PHI) 51
Homes Raided In Rep. Weldon Influence Probe (WP) 52
Searches Carried Out In Influence Inquiry (NYT) 53
FBI Ups Ante On Weldon (RC) 54
FBI Targets Weldon In Influence-peddling Probe (WT) 55
FBI: Weldon Under Investigation (NORRISTH) 56
Editorial: FBI Raid Spurs More Questions Than Answers (DCDN) 58

Doolittle's Lawyers Talking To Justice Department (SACBEE) .. 59
Doolittle Paid Lawyer To Talk To Agency (AP-Y) 59
Five Years After Killing Of Prosecutor, A Stumped FBI Asks The Public For Help (WP) 60
Betonsports, Prosecutors Strike Tentative Deal, Lawyers Say (BLOOM) 61
Former FDA Head Is Charged Over Stock Holdings (WSJ) 62
Former F.D.A. Chief Is Charged With Conflict (NYT) 63
Former FDA Chief Illegally Held Stocks (WP) 64
McLaughlin To Face Corruption Charges (WNBC) 64
Labor Leader Is Expected To Face U.S. Corruption Charges (NYT) 65
Murdered Teen's Family Wants FBI Probe (LCJ) 66
Pellicano Resists Effort To Delay Trial (LAT) 66
Coin Dealer Trial Begins In Ohio Scandal (FINDLAW/AP) 67
Ralphs To Pay $70 Million, In Strike Settlement (LAT) 68
In Shadows Of Net, War On Child Porn Rages (USAT) 69
Business Group Wants More Money To Fight Intellectual Piracy (CONGDAILY) 71
Victims' Families Sentenced To Silence (LAT) 71
Criminal Records Erased By Courts Live To Tell Tales (NYT) ... 73
State Investigates Spending By Suspended Mayor (WP) 75
Hit-run Deaths See 20% Increase (USAT) 75

Civil Law:

Bankruptcy Cases Down In Wake Of New Law (MH) 76
Bankruptcy's New Era (WP) 77
Chapter 13 Filings Grow In Gulf Region (USAT) 79
6 States Stand Up To Divest From Sudan (USAT) 79

Civil Rights:

Monitor Faults Detroit Police (DEN) 80
Feds Sue City Over Voting Rights Of Spanish-speakers (PHDN) 81
FBI Reports Slide In Hate Crimes In U.S. (AP-Y) 82
Most Hate Crimes Spurred By Racial Bias, FBI Says (WT) 82
NAACP To Monitor Elections Following Primary Problems (AP) 83
NAACP To Monitor Mich. Polls (DEN) 83
NAACP To Watch Polling Places (BSUN) 84
NAACP To Monitor Polls For Problems In 10 States (WT) 85
NAACP Will Monitor Polls For Voting Irregularities (WP) 86
Barnes Sues Perdue Over Voter Letter Photo ID Information May Have Misinformed (AJC) 87
Missouri State Supreme Court Strikes Down Voter ID Law (FINDLAW/AP) 87
Agents Take Jail Records (BSH) 88
Supreme Court Turns Away Scouts Appeal (LAT) 89
53% Of Voters Say They Back Va. Same-Sex Marriage Ban (WP) 90

Antitrust:

U.S. Extends SRAM Antitrust Probe To Samsung (IDG) 91
Microsoft Sharing Security Data (SEAPI) 92
HP Extends Tender Offer For Mercury (FT) 93
E.On Lawsuit Claims Acciona Misled SEC On Interest In Endesa (WSJ) 93
Silverman Testifies On Walter Forbes' Role In Cendant Merger (USAT) 93
Oshkosh Truck To Buy JLG Industries For $3 Billion (NYT/AP) 94
Macquarie Wins Battle For Thames Water (FT) 95
Steeling Jobs (WSJ) 95

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Judge To Decide On Setting Deadlines For Everglades Restoration (AP) 96
ConocoPhillips Will Pay More Than $2.3 Million For Dalco Spill (SEAPI) 97

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Money-laundering Scheme Puts Lawyer Through The Ringer (SEAPI) 98
Clogged Sinuses? Sign In, Please (HARTC) 98
White House Commends Montana Meth Project (AP) 99
Larimer/Weld Summit Takes On Meth Issue (COL) 99
Officials Discuss Growing Problem Of Meth Use At Regional Summit (GT) 99
Plan Called A Meth Gateway (DENP) 100
Colombian Man Gets 15 Years In Cocaine Bust (NDN) 101
Border Patrol, Lawmen Outgunned By Cartels (HC) 101
Rebel Head Said Plotted To Keep Hostages (AP) 102
US General: Military Aid To Colombia Should Be Reduced (AP) 103
U.S. Taking Wait-and-see Approach On Ecuador, General Says (MCT) 104
Moonshiners Nearly Extinct In W.Va. (CDM) 105

Immigration:

Child Abuse Lawsuit Creates Immigration Waves (CBS2CHI). 106
Some Democrats Send A More Conservative Immigration Message (NYT) 106
Law On Overseas Brides Is Keeping Couples Apart (NYT) 108

Congress-Administration:

Losing Faith In The President (WP) 109
A Faith-Based Battle For Voters (WP) 110
The Reliable Source (WP) 111
Internal Specter Review Found No Wrongdoing (RC) 112
Hastings Leads Way In Page Investigation (AP-Y) 113
Page Board Said Discussed Other Charges (AP-Y) 114
The GOP: Slugged On The Nose (WP) 114
Reid To Amend Ethics Reports To Fully Account For Land Deal (WP) 115
Reid Rewrite (RC) 115
Senator Reid Used Donations For Condo Tips (NYT/AP) 116
Reid To Reimburse Campaign For Donations (AP-Y) 116
Reid Used Campaign Funds To Pay Bonuses To Staff (WT/AP) 117
Relatives Have 'inside Track' In Lobbying For Tax Dollars (USAT) 119
Little Accountability In Earmarks (USAT) 122
Congress's Charity Cases (NYT) 123
President Bush To Visit Greensboro Elementary (News14NC) 123
President To Visit Greensboro Students (WGHP) 124

DOJ_NMG_0082063

As TSP Grows, Participants Get Chance To Chart Future (WP) 124
Our View On Higher Education: Time To Grade Colleges (USAT) ... 125
Don't Invade Student Privacy (USAT) ... 126
Sen. Brownback's Litmus Test (WP) ... 126

Other News:

Lower Deficit Sparks Debate Over Tax Cuts' Role (WP) ... 127
It's A Faith Thing (WSJ) ... 128
Dow Industrials Inch Closer ... Ever Closer (WSJ) ... 130
Stock Market Surge May Boost Charities (USAT) ... 130
Consumers Face Test As Gas Prices Fall (WSJ) ... 131
Energy Shortage (NYT) ... 132
As Talk Radio Wavers, Bush Moves To Firm Up Support (NYT) 133
Bush's Appearances Revolve Around Core Themes (USAT) ... 134
What's Behind Bush's Stump Speech (USAT) ... 135
Cheney Hits Heartland, And He Can Feel The Love (NYT) ... 136
Backstory: 14 Hours, Really, With Dick Cheney (CSM) ... 137
Report Indicates Democrats Out-raising In Key House Races (USAT) ... 139
In Close House Races, GOP Incumbents Hold Advantage In Funds (WP) ... 140
Committee TV Spending Rises (RC) ... 141
Why Your Vote Doesn't Matter As Much (USAT) ... 143
Handicapping Long Shots And Late Shots (RC) ... 144
In Senate Fund Drive, Democrats Are Ahead (WSJ) ... 145
Lieberman Likes Bolton For UN Job (NYDN) ... 145
In 2nd Debate, Whitehouse, Chafee Return To Familiar Themes (BOS/AP) ... 146
Chafee, Whitehouse Debate Along Familiar Lines (PROJO) ... 147
Allen Touts Conservative Record, Ideas (WT) ... 147
Ex-Gov. Warner Puts Weight Behind Webb (WT/AP) ... 148
Boxing's King Throws Jabs For Steele, GOP (WT) ... 149
Senate Hopes To Hinge On Corruption Charges In N.J. (WT) ... 150
The Columnist Who Shut Up To Speak Out (WP) ... 152
Politicians' Campaigns Invade MySpace (USAT) ... 155
With Tactical Itinerary, Mrs. Clinton Skirts Iowa (NYT) ... 156
States Considering Privatizing Highways Can Study Indiana Toll Road Experience (USAT) ... 157
Cloning Double Talk (PTR) ... 158
Crime And Punishment (WP) ... 158
And The Winner Is ... Me (NYT) ... 159
Paying For Better Parenting (NYT) ... 160
North Korean Fuel Identified As Plutonium (NYT) ... 160
Nations Discuss Second Nuke Test Reports (AP) ... 161
Rice: N.Korea Sanctions Serve As Warning (AP-Y) ... 162
Rice Trip To Push Full Sanctions For N. Korea (WP) ... 163
Rice: World United Against North Korea (AP) ... 164
Rice Adds Moscow Stop To Asia Tour On NKorea Crisis (AFP) 165
US And China At Odds Over N Korea Cargo (FT) ... 166
China Boosts N. Korea Border Inspections (AP) ... 166
U.S. Confirms N. Korea Blast Was Nuclear (USAT) ... 168
U.S. Expects China's Backing On N. Korea (AP-Y) ... 169
Japan's Pacifism Is Tested Anew By U.N. Sanctions (WSJ) ... 169
Russia Demands U.S. Lift Sanctions (AP) ... 170
U.S. Eases Push For Egypt Reforms (USAT) ... 171
Israeli Premier Says He Would Talk To Lebanese And Palestinians (NYT) ... 172
Israel Rejects Syrian Offer On The Golan Heights (MCT) ... 173
Suicide Bomber Kills 94 In Northern Sri Lanka (NYT) ... 174
Attack Kills 93 Sailors In Sri Lanka (WP/AP) ... 175
Venezuela Is Denied Security Council Seat (WP) ... 175
Venezuela Slips In Voting For U.N. Seat (NYT) ... 177
Guatemala, Venezuela Even For U.N. Seat (AP) ... 177
Link To Chávez May Have Hurt Ecuadorean Candidate (NYT) 178
Mexican Leftist Suffers Setback In Local Race (NYT) ... 179
State Race Signals Big Defeat For Mexican Leftist (CSM) ... 180
Tabasco Defeat Deals Setback To Lopez Obrador (LAT) ... 181
In Colombia, A Dubious Disarmament (WP) ... 182
Wal-Mart Said To Be Acquiring Chain In China (NYT) ... 184
Wal-Mart Closing In On $1bn Deal For China's Trust-Mart (FT) 186
France In Denial (NYT) ... 186

DOJ_NMG_0082064

TERRORISM NEWS:

N.Y. Civil Rights Lawyer Sentenced To Prison (USAT/AP)

By Larry Neumeister

USA Today, October 17, 2006

NEW YORK — A firebrand civil rights lawyer who has defended Black Panthers and anti-war radicals was sentenced Monday to nearly 2½ years in prison — far less than the 30 years prosecutors wanted — for helping an imprisoned terrorist sheik communicate with his followers on the outside.

Lynne Stewart, 67, smiled, cried and hugged supporters after U.S. District Judge John Koeltl pronounced the sentence of 28 months.

The judge said Stewart was guilty of smuggling messages between the sheik and his followers that could have "potentially lethal consequences."

However, in departing from federal guidelines that called for 30 years behind bars, Koeltl cited Stewart's more than three decades of dedication to poor, disadvantaged and unpopular clients.

"Ms. Stewart performed a public service, not only to her clients, but to the nation," Koeltl said. The judge said Stewart could remain free while she appeals, a process that could take more than a year.

Stewart was diagnosed with breast cancer last year. Her lawyer Elizabeth Fink warned Koeltl: "If you send her to prison, she's going to die. It's as simple as that."

Outside court, Stewart said she thought the sentence was "a victory for doing good work all one's life."

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia had no comment.

Stewart was convicted in 2005 of providing material support to terrorists. She had released a statement issued by one of her clients, Omar Abdel-Rahman, a blind sheik sentenced to life in prison for plotting to blow up five New York landmarks and assassinate Egypt's president.

Stewart said she did not intentionally enter into any conspiracy to help a terrorist organization.

Earlier, about 150 Stewart supporters stood outside the courthouse, chanting, "Free Lynne!"

Stewart Gets 28 Months On Terror Charge (NSDY)

By ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO, NEWSDAY STAFF WRITER

Long Island Newsday, October 17, 2006

Lynne Stewart, the feisty 67-year-old civil rights lawyer who spent a lifetime helping unpopular defendants and political causes, was sentenced Monday to 28 months in prison for helping a blind, imprisoned Egyptian sheik unlawfully communicate with followers.

Stewart, who lost her law license after her 2005 conviction in the case, was facing up to 30 years in prison but caught a break from U.S. District Judge John G. Koeltl. He cited her years of advocacy for the poor and down-trodden as a reason for a more lenient term behind bars.

"Ms. Stewart performed a public service, not only to her clients but to the nation," said Koeltl, who refused a prosecution request to sentence Stewart, who is battling breast cancer, to a 30-year term.

Stewart, a Manhattan grandmother, herself made an impassioned plea for leniency and said she had suffered greatly after losing the privilege of practicing law.

"At the end of my career, this is truly like a sword in my side," said Stewart. "Permit me to live out the rest of my life productively, lovingly, righteously."

Outside the federal courthouse in lower Manhattan, cheers and applause rippled through a crowd of 200 Stewart supporters as word spread of her sentence.

Around 3:30 p.m., Stewart exited the courthouse, free on bail, and told the crowd she saw the sentence as vindication of her work as an attorney for the unpopular.

"You get time off for good behavior usually at the end of your prison term," Stewart quipped. "I got it at the beginning."

"I am thrilled she is coming home," said Stewart's sister, Laurel Freedman, 47, of Huntington.

If there was any chill for Stewart it was in a statement by Manhattan U.S. attorney Michael Garcia, who said the government was disappointed in the sentence and was considering an appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0082065

Stewart was convicted largely for her involvement in releasing a statement by Omar Abdel-Rahman, the Muslim cleric sentenced to life in prison after his 1995 conviction for plotting to blow up New York City landmarks and assassinate the president of Egypt. Koeltl noted that the smuggled messages could have "potential lethal consequences."

Also convicted in the 2005 trial with Stewart were paralegal Ahmed Abdel Sattar and Mohammed Yousry, an Arabic interpreter. The three were indicted in 2002 during the tenure of former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft.

The 24-year prison term for Sattar, who was convicted of negotiating with militants overseas, was less than the life term called for under federal sentencing guidelines. In handing down the sentence Monday, Koetl noted that the defendant lacked a criminal record and no one was killed or injured because of his crimes.

"I am not a terrorist, your honor," Sattar said. "I am not a violent person. I am a human being. I am an American. I am a Muslim who practices and believes strongly in his religion."

Yousry, who was convicted of helping Stewart smuggle the sheik's messages out of prison, received a sentence of 20 months.

While the allegations against Stewart had nothing to do with the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, she has said she was charged because of what she called a climate of hysteria. However, assistant U.S. attorney Andrew Dember said the case had nothing to do with the attacks.

"What she was doing was smuggling terrorism messages and smuggling out Abdel-Rahman's responses," Dember said."

WRIST SLAP FOR SMIRK JERK TERROR ATTORNEY (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, October 17, 2006

October 17, 2006 -- A grinning, gloating Lynne Stewart declared "victory" yesterday after a federal judge sentenced the civil-rights lawyer to just 28 months behind bars for helping a U.S.-hating terror mastermind communicate with his jihadi warriors.

The sentence was a sliver of the 30 years sought by prosecutors.

"I can do that standing on my head!" Stewart boasted of the light prison term.

Judge John Koeltl's extraordinary leniency was a blow to the federal prosecutors who had won a conviction against the 67-year-old Stewart.

She had been found guilty of providing material support to terrorists by helping her jailed client - blind Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, the suspected mastermind of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing - communicate with his followers.

Koeltl said Stewart was guilty of "extraordinarily severe criminal conduct" with "potentially lethal consequences" by smuggling messages for Abdel-Rahman and issuing inflammatory public statements.

Yet he ruled that a light sentence was justified, given Stewart's treatment for breast cancer and her 30-year career representing poor and unpopular clients.

"Ms. Stewart performed a public service not only to her clients, but to the nation," he said. "It is clear that prison will be particularly difficult for this defendant."

In addition to imposing the light term, Koeltl also ruled that Stewart could remain free on bail while she appeals her conviction.

"Thank you, Judge," said a teary-eyed Stewart, who briefly rested her head on the table in relief.

Outside court, a beaming Stewart said, "I hope the government realizes their error because I am back out - and I'm staying out pending an appeal that I hope will vindicate me and make me back into the lawyer I was.

"I feel that it's a victory for doing good works all one's life. You get time off for good behavior usually at the end of your prison term. I got it at the beginning."

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia issued a statement saying he was "disappointed" in the sentence. "We will be exploring our appellate options."

But Stewart crowed to more than 100 cheering supporters outside Manhattan federal court: "This is a great victory against an overreaching government."

Stewart was arrested six months after the 9/11 terrorist attacks and accused of violating strict prison rules by helping the Egyptian-born Abdel-Rahman spread the word to kill those who did not buy into his extremist interpretation of Islamic law.

The sheik was serving a life sentence for plotting to blow up five New York landmarks, including the Holland Tunnel and George Washington Bridge, and to assassinate Egypt's president when Stewart helped him communicate with his followers and leaders of an Egyptian-based terrorist organization.

Former Attorney General John Ashcroft brought the indictment against Stewart, as well as against Mohamed Yousry, an Arabic interpreter, and Ahmed Abdel Sattar, a postal worker.

DOJ_NMG_0082066

With the possibility of life behind bars still looming large yesterday morning, an emotional Stewart appeared to tremble as she entered the packed courtroom.

Prepared for the worst, her husband, Ralph Poynter, brought along a bag containing medication for his wife, who has undergone radiation and surgery for her cancer.

He also had with him a Robert Goddard book, "Play to the End," and a pair of sweatpants for her because, she said, "I wasn't going to jail in a dress."

Meanwhile, a throng of Stewart's supporters who could not get seats filled the courthouse hallway, chanting, "Set Lynne free!"

"The end of my career truly is like a sword in my side," Stewart told the judge before the sentence was imposed. "I don't want to be in prison. I don't believe I need to be in prison. I believe I still have contributions to make to society."

Defense lawyer Josh Dratel said: "This situation is already tragic."

Stewart has admitted to knowingly violating prison rules, but denies condoning violence and claims she was just trying to do her job as a lawyer by looking after Abdel-Rahman's interests.

Defense lawyer Elizabeth Fink argued that Stewart made "foolish" mistakes by violating prison rules and begged the judge, "Please don't send her to prison, because if you send her to prison, she's going to die."

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Dember refuted Stewart's defense that she was wrongly targeted by the feds in the wake of 9/11.

"This case had nothing to do with Sept. 11, Your Honor," Dember said. "She knew full well what she was doing was a criminal act, and she didn't want to be caught."

Also yesterday, Koeltl sentenced Sattar to 24 years behind bars for conspiring to kill and kidnap people in a foreign country.

Sattar, 47, was convicted of conspiring to kill people overseas by helping to compose a chilling "fatwa" that prosecutors said called for "the killing of Jews everywhere."

"I am not a terrorist, Your Honor," said Sattar, who faced a maximum sentence of life behind bars.

The third defendant, Yousry, 51, an Arabic interpreter, received a 20-month prison term.

"He is kind of a footnote in this case," said defense lawyer David Stern, whose client could have faced up to 20 years behind bars.

When it came to Stewart, Koeltl found that prison time was necessary as punishment, but praised the longtime civil-rights lawyer for her dedication to her clients over the past three decades - and noted that no one was hurt as the result of the crimes in the case.

In a letter Stewart sent to Koeltl last month, she wrote: "If I have a tragic flaw, it is that I care too much for my clients. I am soft-hearted to the point of self-abnegation," according to the New York Times.

As supporters showered Stewart with bouquets of red roses outside court, she said, "I don't think anybody would say going to jail for 28 months is anything anyone would look forward to, but as my clients have told me, 'I can do that standing on my head.' "

Members of the law-enforcement community expressed outrage at the light sentence.

Gus Danese, president of the Port Authority's Police Benevolent Association, said, "She deserved the maximum penalty. As far as I'm concerned, in light of the 1993 bombing and the 9/11 attack, she's a terrorist herself."

"Anyone who believes in helping terrorists and their cause should be willing to serve the maximum penalty. With a 28-month sentence, she'll soon be out doing it again."

An investigator who worked on the case said, "It's a shame she's getting off so lightly. If a cop or some other law-enforcement person did the same thing, they'd throw the book at him. Isn't a lawyer supposed to know what she's doing?"

Additional reporting by Marsha Kranes and Murray Weiss

kati.cornell@nypost.com

Lawyer Sentenced For Aiding Terrorist Client (WP)

By Michael Powell, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

28 Months Is Far Less Than Prosecutors Sought

NEW YORK, Oct. 16 -- Lawyer Lynne Stewart was sentenced Monday to 28 months in prison for helping a terrorist client communicate with his followers, a far less severe sentence than the 30 years sought by federal prosecutors.

As U.S. District Judge John G. Koeltl delivered his sentence in a packed federal courtroom in Manhattan, Stewart lifted her glasses and dabbed at tears while her husband gave a tight hug to their daughter. An hour later, the 67-year-old lawyer emerged from the federal courthouse holding hands with her granddaughter and grandson and, to loud cheers and applause from hundreds of supporters, declared a victory of sorts over the Bush administration.

"The judge did a fair and right thing," she told a thicket of reporters and television cameras, as a supporter placed a bouquet of roses in her arms. "This is a great victory against an overreaching government."

And of her sentence, she sounded almost jaunty: "As my clients say to me, 'I could do that standing on my head.' "

In fact, Koeltl made it clear that Stewart had committed a serious offense by smuggling messages between her client, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, and his followers in the Middle East, including a statement withdrawing the sheik's support for a cease-fire with the Egyptian government. Stewart's actions, Koeltl said, constituted "extraordinarily severe criminal conduct" and material support for terrorism, and could have had "lethal consequences."

Koeltl noted, however, that neither Stewart's actions nor those of her co-defendants, translator Mohammed Yousry and Rahman aide Ahmed Abdel Sattar, resulted in violence in the United States or overseas. Having lashed Stewart for her criminal conduct, the judge executed a pivot, commending her for leading an otherwise exemplary life as a legal advocate for the poor, despised and dispossessed. Many of her clients have been known for their radical views.

"Ms. Stewart performed a public service, not only to her clients but to the nation," Koeltl said. "She's made an extraordinary contribution."

Taken as a whole, the judge argued, her accomplishments amounted to a strong argument for departing from nonbinding federal guidelines that otherwise might have led him to impose a 30-year sentence.

Koeltl's decision to mete out a comparatively mild sentence amounted to a slap at federal prosecutors in a case that former attorney general John D. Ashcroft repeatedly had hailed as a nationwide model. U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia released a statement expressing disappointment and held out the possibility of appealing the sentence. It is not unusual for a federal appeals court to reverse a sentence handed out by a lower court.

More than a few legal observers divined a message in the judge's sentences.

"There's no doubt the government has tried to use this case to chill effective advocacy in terror cases," said Neal R. Sonnett, a former federal prosecutor, past chair of the American Bar Association's criminal justice section and current chair of the association's task force on the treatment of enemy combatants. "I'm delighted the judge was not swayed by the frenzy over terrorism."

More conservative legal commentators -- including Andrew McCarthy, who prosecuted Rahman -- had urged the court to impose a stiff sentence on Stewart.

When the government convicted Rahman in 1995 of plotting to blow up New York landmarks, prosecutors and prison officials imposed stringent restrictions on his contact with the outside world. By smuggling out the sheik's messages, they said, Stewart strayed far across the invisible boundary between zealous advocacy and criminal conspiracy.

Stewart acknowledged as much in a letter to Koeltl before her sentencing. "I inadvertently allowed those with other agendas to corrupt the most precious and inviolate basis of our profession -- the attorney-client relationship," she wrote.

Koeltl also rejected the government's request for a 20-year sentence for Yousry, the translator, meting out a far shorter sentence of 20 months. Yousry, prosecutors acknowledged during the trial, was not a practicing Muslim, disliked fundamentalism and did not believe in violence; nonetheless they successfully argued that he -- at Stewart's direction -- had helped Rahman take his messages to the outside world.

Koeltl gave a far more substantial 24-year sentence to Sattar, a postal worker and legal aide who was found to have spoken by phone with known terrorists in the Middle East. This sentence, however, still fell short of the sentence requested by prosecutors.

The judge allowed Stewart and Yousry to remain free while they appeal their convictions, a process that could stretch for more than a year. This will enable Stewart, who was recently diagnosed with breast cancer, to continue to receive treatment.

"Am I surprised? I'm happy," Stewart's attorney, Elizabeth Fink, said afterward as she walked north from the courthouse toward a celebration in Chinatown. "It could have been much, much worse."

Lawyer, Facing 30 Years, Gets 28 Months, To Dismay Of U.S. (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

Lynne F. Stewart, the radical defense lawyer, was sentenced yesterday to two years and four months in prison on charges that she smuggled messages from an imprisoned terrorist client to his violent followers in Egypt.

DOJ_NMG_0082068

The sentence, handed down by Judge John G. Koeltl in Federal District Court in Manhattan, was significantly lower than the 30 years sought by prosecutors. He cited the service Ms. Stewart, who is 67, had provided in her three-decade career as a government-appointed lawyer for unsavory criminals and penniless outcasts.

The judge allowed her to remain free on bail while a higher court hears her appeal, saying there was a possibility that her conviction might be overturned.

The sentence was an unexpected setback for the Justice Department in a case the Bush administration has frequently highlighted to show the effectiveness of its tough policy on terror prosecutions. Former Attorney General John Ashcroft devoted a chapter to it in his recent memoir. Defense lawyers and other supporters of Ms. Stewart had warned that a severe sentence would have a chilling effect, dissuading others from representing clients accused of terrorism.

In a brief statement to the judge before the sentence, Ms. Stewart, shaking and barely suppressing tears, refrained from political comment or discussion of her case, but noted that she would never be permitted to practice law again.

"The end of my career is truly like a sword in my side," she said. "I don't want to be in prison," she pleaded. "Permit me to live in the world and live out my life, productively, lovingly, righteously."

Ms. Stewart's lawyers, citing her recent bout of breast cancer, had asked the judge not to give her any prison time.

But Judge Koeltl said there had been "an irreducible core of extraordinarily severe criminal conduct" in her actions on behalf of the client, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, a blind fundamentalist Islamic cleric who is serving a life sentence for plotting to bomb New York City landmarks. Ms. Stewart was convicted on Feb. 10, 2005, of conspiring to provide material aid to terrorism by smuggling the sheik's messages encouraging violence by his militant followers in Egypt.

While agreeing that Ms. Stewart had flouted the law and deceived the government by breaking prison rules to publicize the sheik's messages, Judge Koeltl broadly rejected the prosecutors' portrayal of her as a serial liar and terrorist conspirator who would be a danger to society if she remained free.

Instead, he focused on her past service as a lawyer. "She has represented the poor, the disadvantaged and the unpopular," Judge Koeltl said, adding that Ms. Stewart had demonstrated "enormous skill and dedication" in her legal work and earned little money from it.

"It is no exaggeration to say that Ms. Stewart performed a public service not only to her clients but to the nation," Judge Koeltl told a crowded but hushed courtroom.

The judge acknowledged that Ms. Stewart's crimes were "serious, involved dishonesty and breach of trust," and led to "potentially lethal consequences." But he appears to have been impressed by about 1,100 letters of support she received from law professors, former prosecutors, retired judges and former clients. Among the clients was Matias Reyes, a federal inmate who told how she helped him confess that he was the true attacker in the infamous Central Park jogger case, after others had been wrongfully convicted.

The judge pointed out that Ms. Stewart would lose her license to practice law as a result of her conviction and sentence, which he said was a form of punishment, and that she is barred from having any contact with Mr. Abdel Rahman. He said the chance that her crimes would recur was "nil," and noted there had been no evidence that anyone was harmed as a result of her actions.

He also mentioned that there was a "statistically significant" chance that Ms. Stewart's breast cancer would recur.

As the judge read the sentence, Ms. Stewart's face brightened with a grin of surprised relief. She flashed a quick clenched fist of victory to her relatives in the gallery.

Judge Koeltl imposed a relatively tough sentence on one of Ms. Stewart's co-defendants, though it also fell short of what the government had sought. A former Staten Island postal worker, Ahmed Abdel Sattar, 46, was sentenced to 24 years in prison for negotiating by telephone with a follower of the sheik's who was an associate of Osama bin Laden's to try to bring an end to a cease-fire by Mr. Abdel Rahman's group in Egypt. Mr. Sattar also wrote and released a statement he called a fatwa, or religious edict, calling for the killing of Jews. Prosecutors had asked for a life sentence.

The third co-defendant, Mohamed Yousry, 51, Ms. Stewart's Arabic translator in her discussions with the sheik, was sentenced to one year and eight months in prison.

Judge Koeltl said that Mr. Yousry was "the necessary link" in a conspiracy with Ms. Stewart to smuggle prohibited letters into prison for the sheik and convey his replies to his followers. Prosecutors wanted Mr. Yousry to serve 20 years in prison.

Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, attended the sentencing yesterday. He and his prosecutors left the courtroom without comment. "The government is disappointed in the sentences imposed today," Mr. Garcia said in a statement later. "We will be exploring our appellate options."

DOJ_NMG_0082069

One of his assistants, Andrew Dember, had said before the sentencing that Ms. Stewart knew that she was smuggling terrorist messages. “She stepped over the line from being a lawyer to being a clear-cut criminal,” he said, who had “endangered the lives of innocents.”

Mr. Dember dismissed the notion that Ms. Stewart’s sentence could have a chilling effect, saying that none of her actions “had anything to do with legitimate lawyering or legal representation of her client.”

One of Ms. Stewart’s lawyers, Joshua L. Dratel, said the judge did not need to impose a severe sentence because “the message has been sent loud and clear” that Ms. Stewart committed serious mistakes and lapses of judgment in representing the sheik, as she acknowledged in recent weeks.

When Ms. Stewart emerged from the courthouse, a few blocks from the World Trade Center site in Lower Manhattan, she was greeted with bouquets of roses from a crowded of elated, cheering supporters who had waited outside for hours after being blocked by federal marshals from attending the proceedings.

“This is a great victory against an overreaching government,” Ms. Stewart said, returning to her familiar feisty rhetoric, as she was embraced by her husband, Ralph Poynter, and her three grandchildren. “I hope the government realizes their error, because I am back out,” she said. “And I am staying out until after an appeal that I hope will vindicate me, that I hope will make me back into the lawyer that I was.”

Ms. Stewart said she was grateful to the judge for giving her “time off for good behavior.” She had been ready to go straight to jail when she came to court, she said, carrying a pair of sweat pants in a plastic bag. She said if she eventually has to serve the 28-month sentence, “I could do it standing on my head.”

Radical US Lawyer Gets Jail Term For Terrorism Conviction (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 17, 2006

A radical US rights lawyer convicted of conspiring with terrorists by acting as a go-between for a jailed Egyptian cleric and his militant followers was sentenced to 28 months in jail.

Lynne Stewart, 67, was convicted in February 2005 of lying to the government and conspiring with her client, Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman, to convey messages to his militant disciples in Egypt and inciting them to violence.

The sentence was far below prosecutors' requests for a 30-year term.

Her sentencing had been delayed while the veteran attorney and grandmother underwent treatment for breast cancer.

In a letter to Judge John Koeltl before her sentencing Monday, Stewart pleaded for a lenient sentence, insisting she was a well-intentioned lawyer who had made a lapse in judgement.

"I am not a traitor. The government's characterisation of me and what occurred is inaccurate and untrue. It takes unfair advantage of the climate of urgency and hysteria that followed 9/11," she wrote, referring to the September 11, 2001 attacks on New York and Washington.

Neither Stewart's supporters nor prosecutors offered any immediate reaction to the sentence.

Abdel Rahman was jailed for life after being convicted in 1995 of conspiring to blow up New York landmarks and assassinate Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Stewart's two co-defendants, US postal worker Ahmed Sattar and Arabic translator Mohammed Yousry were also up for sentencing Monday.

Ever since she was charged, Stewart has insisted she was being unfairly targeted for her unorthodox choice of clients over a 30-year career that has seen her represent mobsters and political radicals.

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at the time the verdict was an "important step" in the Department of Justice's "war on terror".

Giving testimony during the trial, Stewart had insisted that she neither abetted nor endorsed the concept of Islamic holy war held by Abdel Rahman.

Prosecutors held that between 1997 and 2002, Stewart and her co-defendants helped Abdel Rahman pass messages to his followers in violation of government restrictions on his right to communicate with the outside world.

In particular, the prosecutors said, Abdel Rahman used the three defendants to exhort his militant Islamic group to break a ceasefire with the Egyptian government.

Defense Attorney Stewart Gets 26-Month Sentence (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082070

Veteran defense attorney Lynne Stewart cried tears of relief Monday as a federal judge ordered her to serve a dramatically lower sentence than prosecutors had requested for her conviction on providing material support to a terrorist conspiracy.

Southern District Judge John Koeltl gave Stewart a sentence of only 28 months. The government had asked for 30 years behind bars.

Weighing in Stewart's favor, the judge said, were her years of service to the poor, the disadvantaged and the unpopular; her battle with cancer and the fact that her actions, though reprehensible, did not result in violence.

Stewart was also allowed to remain free on bail pending her appeal for convictions for providing and concealing material support, conspiring to do so, making false statements and defrauding the government.

The result produced the bizarre spectacle of a victory celebration following a criminal sentencing, with Stewart holding flowers and chanting "yes" with supporters outside the Daniel Patrick Moynihan Courthouse. The rulings came after emotional pleas by defense lawyers Elizabeth Fink, Joshua Dratel and Jill Shellow-Levine, who argued that the federal sentencing guidelines' call for a lengthy prison term did not fit the circumstances of the crimes Stewart actually committed.

Indeed, Judge Koeltl, before he announced he was giving Stewart a "non-guidelines" sentence, pronounced a guidelines enhancement for a crime of terrorism, one that would have increased her prison term significantly, "dramatically unreasonable in the case of Ms. Stewart."

The judge made the same finding for co-defendant Ahmed Abdel Sattar, who was convicted of the more serious crime of conspiracy to kill or kidnap people in another country, as he gave him a 24-year prison term. The government had sought life behind bars for Sattar.

Monday, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia released a statement saying he was "disappointed" in the sentences and was weighing an appeal.

The sentences came 4 1/2 years after Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the indictment of Stewart, Sattar and interpreter Mohamed Yousry in a plot to pass messages to and from the Egyptian-based Islamic Group to imprisoned Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman. Yousry was sentenced Monday to 20 months in prison.

Sheik Abdel-Rahman, considered the spiritual leader of Islamic Group, was serving a life sentence for a terror plot against the United States. He had been placed under Special Administrative Measures (SAMs) by the Bureau of Prisons to prevent him from communicating with his followers in the group.

Stewart was convicted of defrauding the government by signing attorney affirmations promising to abide by the SAMs and of providing material support along with Yousry by helping the sheik send and receive messages in prison.

'POTENTIALLY LETHAL'

Her most "potentially lethal" action, Judge Koeltl said, was in June 2000, when she read a press release to a reporter indicating that the sheik was withdrawing his support for a "cease-fire" or cessation of attacks against the Egyptian government.

Sattar served as a paralegal for Stewart and other defense lawyers at the sheik's 1995 trial for seditious conspiracy against the United States in connection with a plot to bomb New York City landmarks. At this trial, Sattar was accused by the government of being the "communications hub" for Islamic Group and the spearhead of efforts to have the sheik freed from prison.

Sattar was recorded on government surveillance tapes as plotting with a high-ranking militant in Islamic Group named Taha to resume the group's campaign against the Egyptian government -- a campaign that, before the cease-fire became widely accepted by the membership, included the 1997 massacre of 62 people at an archeological site in Luxor, Egypt.

He also admitted that he drafted a religious edict, or fatwa, in Sheik Abdel-Rahman's name calling for the murder of Jews around the world.

Stewart and Yousry were convicted of assisting this effort by acting as a conduit to the sheik, transporting messages from Taha to him. Stewart was caught on tape making, and bragging about making, covering noises to distract corrections officers while Yousry and the sheik communicated. Prosecutors Andrew Dember and Robin Baker objected to the judge's decision to give the trio non-guidelines sentences.

'DOWNWARD VARIANCE'

Instead of giving a guidelines sentence to Stewart and her co-defendants and downwardly departing within the framework of the guidelines, Judge Koeltl adopted what he called a "downward variance."

The judge seemed to vindicate the contention of Stewart's attorneys that the indictment against her, and the possibility of the rest of her life in prison, was wholly disproportionate to her actions.

But Judge Koeltl, while commending Stewart for a life of public service, also had some harsh words for the 67-year-old grandmother, saying she "abused her position as a lawyer to gain access to Sheik Abdel-Rahman and used that access" to smuggle messages to terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0082071

In the end, the judge said the impending loss of her license to practice law, and the fact that she would therefore no longer be in a position to repeat her crime, was a factor in his decision.

So too was Stewart's treatment for breast cancer.

Fink seemed to test the judge's patience by arguing that Stewart would receive poor medical treatment in prison and by claiming her client would be "tortured" behind bars because she was convicted of a terrorist offense.

The lower-than-expected sentence given to Sattar set the stage for Stewart's lawyers to confidently argue she should receive no prison time at all.

It also gave Dember warning that he was fighting an uphill battle in arguing for a longer sentence. Dember reminded the court that Stewart "repeatedly lied to and deceived the government" -- first when she smuggled in a message from Taha urging the sheik to withdraw his support for the cease-fire on terror attacks in 1999, then again when she signed an affirmation in 2000 promising to comply with the SAMs, and then still again after she issued the press release and "was confronted, and required to sign a new affirmation."

Dember aggressively rejected Stewart's claim that she was merely advocating for her client, saying that "smuggling terrorist messages" into and out of prison "has nothing to do with legitimate legal representation."

'SERIOUS CRIMINAL CONDUCT'

This was not merely "a violation of some administrative rule" but "serious criminal conduct," he said, and Stewart knew it because she spoke on the phone to Yousry after the press release was issued, and before a "clarifying" press release on the sheik's position was to be issued and said "she didn't do this lightly" and was "risking her whole career."

"She didn't step over a line that was fine, or thin, or blurry," Dember said. "She stepped over a line that was clear."

Dratel answered by arguing that the government "robs this case of context."

Dember ridiculed the defense claim that the prosecution of Stewart was meant to send a message to lawyers willing to defend the rights of those accused of, or convicted of, terrorist plots.

The prosecution, he said, was brought "not because she represents unpopular clients nor to deter defense counsel from involvement in terrorist-related cases ... or to chill them," he said. "And this had nothing whatsoever to do with 9/11."

He reminded the judge that terrorism prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald had wanted to launch a criminal investigation into Stewart's actions, but was told to "stand down" because there was an ongoing "intelligence investigation under way."

But Dratel insisted that the government wanted to "chill" aggressive defense tactics in terror cases and make an example of Stewart.

'UNWARRANTED OVERKILL'

Among the some 400 letters sent to the judge in support of Stewart was one that came from Jo Ann Harris, former assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Criminal Division and now in private practice. Harris' letter accused the government of "unwarranted overkill" in charging Stewart. It is not every day that a criminal defendant celebrates a prison sentence, but Stewart walked out of the courthouse acting like a champ.

She had entered 500 Pearl St. somber and appearing shaken -- even after she was serenaded by dozens of supporters who had been denied admission to the overcrowded 12th floor courtroom. Some in the crowd sang the "Glory Hallelujah" refrain from "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" while others chanted, "Set Lynne free."

But as Judge Koeltl began to hint at a low sentence, Stewart and members of her legal team began to perk up. When he finally announced his decision, there were broad smiles and, once a break was announced, Stewart was enveloped in hugs from her family, friends and attorneys.

Later, outside the courthouse, addressing a crowd of about 150 supporters chanted, "The people, united, will never be defeated." Stewart was handed a bouquet of red roses and told the gathering, "I love you." Stewart quoted one of her former clients on the old saw of receiving a light sentence, saying she could serve the 28 months "standing" on her "head."

She then checked herself and said she did not want to be seen as being "in the face" of the government and was humbled by the experience.

Her relief was shared by lawyers David Stern and David Ruhnke for Yousry.

Attorneys Kenneth Paul and Barry Fallick, representing Sattar, were more subdued, but nonetheless gratified the judge did not embrace the recommendations of the government and the U.S. Probation Department. "We were expecting life," Paul said.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

The Sheik's Apprentice (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082072

It was a case of radical chic and the radical sheik. Yesterday in New York, Lynne Stewart, a self-styled "civil rights" attorney whose past clients include the Black Panthers and Weather Underground, was sentenced to 28 months in prison for illegally passing messages between her imprisoned client, Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, and his followers in Egypt's Al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya, the terrorist group responsible for killing 62 mostly European and Japanese tourists in Luxor in 1997. Some of those tourists were beheaded; others were disemboweled. The Sheik was also involved in planning terror attacks in New York, for which he is serving a life sentence.

In an age when courts routinely impose five-year prison terms for drug offenders, and life sentences on former CEOs, 28 months may not seem an appropriate sentence for a terrorist accomplice, especially when the government sought 30 years. Ms. Stewart certainly had the sympathy of the judge, John Koeltl, who praised her as a champion of "the poor, the disadvantaged and the unpopular." She herself seems to have had few misgivings about her actions: "The government's characterization of me and what occurred is inaccurate and untrue," she told the judge. "It takes unfair advantage of the climate of urgency and hysteria that followed 9/11."

In similar circumstances -- albeit with a different defendant -- a case could be made for leniency. Ms. Stewart is 67 and recovering from breast cancer. But remorse is also a prerequisite for mercy, and Ms. Stewart shows none, either for her crime or for the arc of a career which flows too naturally from championing the "liberation" movements of the 1960s to the Islamists of the present day. What her clients have in common is that they loathe America.

Now she basks in the pity and praise of her fellow radical travelers, who haven't seemed to spare much thought for the victims of Luxor. It says everything about her, and about them.

Judge Goes Soft On Terror Lawyer (NYDN)

New York Daily News, October 17, 2006

<USnew_edit>Ah, mercy has a human heart, pity a human face. No hangin' judge is John Koeltl of the federal bench, who yesterday outrageously handed radical lawyer Lynne Stewart just 28 months in prison, rather less than the 30 years prosecutors wanted her to serve for helping a terrorist bomber transmit messages to fanatic followers.

Perhaps kindly Judge Koeltl was touched by the sight of Stewart, all her revolutionary bravado fled, blubbering that the end of her legal career "is like a sword in my side." Perhaps he was moved by the defense argument that Stewart, who is 67 and ailing, would die behind bars if a sentence of any reasonable length were imposed.

Or perhaps he just felt that two-something years is enough for the very grave crime she committed. He seemed to say so, on the one hand finding Stewart guilty of "extraordinarily severe criminal conduct" while on the other hand portraying her as a sainted provider of lawyering to "poor, disadvantaged and unpopular clients." Stewart had provided "a public service, not only to her clients but to the nation," Koeltl concluded. Sort of like Mother Teresa with a law degree.

Let us disagree. It will never be known what secret codes might have been in those communications she enabled Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman to dispatch from his cell or how many jihadist plots they resulted in. The sheik was only the man who had plotted to blow up city landmarks and assassinate the president of Egypt. And Lynne Stewart, consciously and knowingly, gave him material assistance. It is jaw-dropping that she ended up standing before a soft touch like Koeltl. From somewhere across the sea, we believe we hear a few terrorists chuckling in delighted satisfaction.

"I am not a traitor," she wailed, and presumably by her own lights, she sincerely believes that. But even some underworld mouthpiece caught carrying some imprisoned mob czar's instructions to his torpedoes outside gets more than 28 months.

Lynne Stewart has never been one to appreciate the many blessings of this system she has for so long ranted and railed against. We do not expect her to be more than fleetingly grateful at this time for the absurd pass this system has just given her.

<USnew_edit>Calling all bravest

The Fire Department has extended the application deadline for one of the best and most respected jobs, that being a city firefighter. If you are interested in good-paying public service and believe you have what it takes to do the heroic, the deadline for submitting papers is now Nov. 3. And if you are minority or female, all the better.

The FDNY is conducting one of the most aggressive recruitment drives in its history, searching for the most qualified candidates and hoping in the process that the force becomes more reflective of the city's population. The early signs offer some grounds for optimism.

More than 42,000 people have inquired about taking the hiring exam, two-thirds of whom were minorities or women. Of those, more than 12,000 have paid the $30 application fee, and 30% were minorities or women. That's double the minority representation when the fire exam was last given. And the number suggests that the FDNY's community outreach has paid off, at least preliminarily.

DOJ_NMG_0082073

But there is a long way to go. Jobs will go only to those who ace the written and physical exams. The FDNY is planning test prep courses. These must be as thorough as the department's recruitment has been so all candidates have the chance to do their best. The word is out, New Yorkers: The FDNY wants you.

<USnew_edit>Hevesi, original recipe

Democrat Andrew Cuomo and Republican Jeanine Pirro debated Sunday and they will discuss the issues in the race for attorney general again today. Sen. Hillary Clinton and GOP challenger John Spencer are scheduled to have back-and-forths Friday and Sunday. Gubernatorial contenders Eliot Spitzer and John Faso have gone two rounds, and Spitzer said yesterday that fellow Democrat Alan Hevesi (left) should step forth to debate the GOP's Chris Callaghan. That would mean braving an appearance with a rival who flat-out calls Hevesi a thief for assigning a state worker to chauffeur Hevesi's wife at a cost of at least $82,688. And so Hevesi is staying cooped up. "Cluck, cluck," said his spokesman.

You can e-mail the Daily News editors at voicers@edit.nydailynews.com. Please include your full name, address and phone number. The Daily News reserves the right to edit letters. The shorter the letter, the better the chance it will be used.

Jury Chosen For Chicago Terrorism Trial (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 17, 2006

CHICAGO - A jury was chosen Monday for the federal trial of two men accused of supplying money and recruits to the Palestinian terrorist organization Hamas.

Opening statements were set for 9:30 a.m. Thursday at the trial of suburban Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, and former university professor Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, of Alexandria, Va.

U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve overruled objections from federal prosecutors that defense attorneys had acted to keep whites from serving on the jury.

The defense was allowed to strike 10 prospective jurors from the list without showing cause as to why they should not serve. Such strikes cannot be for reasons such as race or ethnicity.

Prosecutors noted that nine of the 10 struck by the defense were white and asked St. Eve to restore four of them to the list. But the judge held that in each case there was a non-racial explanation.

Salah and Ashqar are accused of taking part in a 15-year conspiracy in which money was funneled into U.S. bank accounts and delivered to Hamas military cells.

Recruits also are suspected of being mustered in the United States and sent to join Hamas forces trying to topple the Israeli government.

Both men deny they are members of Hamas and say they are innocent of the federal racketeering conspiracy charges.

U.S. Faces Obstacles To Freeing Detainees (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Allies Block Returns From Guantanamo

BERLIN -- British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett last week issued the latest European demand to close down the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The existence of the prison is "unacceptable" and fuels Islamic radicalism around the world, she said, echoing a recent chorus of complaints from Europe about U.S. counterterrorism policy.

Behind the scenes, however, the British government has repeatedly blocked efforts to let some prisoners leave Guantanamo and return home.

According to documents made public this month in London, officials there recently rejected a U.S. offer to transfer 10 former British residents from Guantanamo to the United Kingdom, arguing that it would be too expensive to keep them under surveillance. Britain has also staved off a legal challenge by the relatives of some prisoners who sued to require the British government to seek their release.

Other European governments, which have been equally vocal in assailing Guantanamo as a human rights liability, have also balked at accepting prisoner transfers. A Turkish citizen who was born and raised in Germany was finally permitted to return from Guantanamo in August, four years after the German government turned down a U.S. proposal to release him.

In addition, virtually every country in Europe refused to grant asylum to several Guantanamo prisoners from China who were not being sent home because of fears they could face political harassment there. The Balkan nation of Albania agreed to take in five of the Chinese in May, but only after more than 100 other nations rebuffed U.S. pleas to accept them on humanitarian grounds, State Department officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0082074

"In practical terms, it's not enough to say, 'Guantanamo should be closed,' without suggesting the next sentence: What do you do with the people who are there?" John B. Bellinger III, the State Department's chief legal adviser, said during a visit to Berlin last week to meet with German counterterrorism officials.

There are about 435 prisoners from about 40 countries at Guantanamo, according to the Pentagon. Military tribunals have concluded that about one-quarter of the prisoners are not a security risk, or are otherwise eligible for release or transfer.

Ultimately, Bellinger said, U.S. officials expect 60 to 80 prisoners to face trial by military commission. The rest will be released, though many of them might face charges or other restrictions in their home countries.

But those whom the Pentagon wants to free often have nowhere to go. In many cases, their native countries don't want them or have challenged their nationalities. Also slowing the process is a U.S. policy stipulating that prisoners cannot be transferred to nations with a record of human rights violations unless there are written assurances that they won't be mistreated.

The Pentagon has already freed all but a few European citizens from Guantanamo. But U.S. officials have struggled to persuade Britain, Germany and other allies in Europe to accept prisoners who once had legal residency there, or who are effectively stateless.

"We think countries whose nationals are in Guantanamo ought to take responsibility for them," Bellinger said. "We have also, in certain cases, encouraged European governments to see if they would be eager to take detainees of other nationalities."

So far, there have been few takers.

Although Albania agreed to accept the five Chinese prisoners -- all ethnic Uighur Muslims -- the United States is still looking for a home for 17 Uighurs who remain at Guantanamo. Several European countries with small Uighur immigrant populations declined to give the prisoners asylum after receiving pressure from the Chinese government, which wants to extradite the Uighurs and try them on terrorism charges, according to U.S. and European officials.

Among those countries is Germany, which also balked for years at allowing a German native, Murat Kurnaz, to return even though U.S. military intelligence and German law enforcement officials had largely concluded there was no information tying him to al-Qaeda or terrorist activities, U.S. and German documents show.

In 2002, U.S. officials indicated they were willing to release Kurnaz, who was born and raised in Germany but holds Turkish citizenship. But the German government barred him from returning.

The official explanation: Kurnaz had failed to renew his German residency permit while he was locked up at Guantanamo. But German diplomats acknowledged that they saw no reason to take Kurnaz back and that they considered him an American problem.

"It was a shame what happened," said one of his attorneys, Bernhard Docke. "It was a kind of excuse for being passive and just watching what was going on. If Germany had done something then, it would have kept him from having to spend another four years in Guantanamo."

European officials say the United States deserves the bulk of the blame for delaying the release of inmates who have been found not to be a threat.

In January, new German Chancellor Angela Merkel raised Kurnaz's case in visits to the White House and said her country had changed its mind. But it took until August to secure his release, largely because U.S. officials insisted he be indicted or placed under 24-hour surveillance. The Bush administration ultimately relented after Germany refused, according to German officials and Kurnaz's lawyers.

Some of the strongest resistance to helping Guantanamo inmates has come from Britain, America's closest ally on counterterrorism matters.

Despite the presence of British troops in Afghanistan and Iraq, as well as a longtime special relationship between U.S. and British intelligence agencies, British officials have become increasingly blunt in their calls for the closure of Guantanamo on moral and legal grounds.

Beckett, the foreign secretary, said Thursday that Guantanamo was "unacceptable in terms of human rights" and added that it was "ineffective in terms of counterterrorism."

In an interview last month with The Washington Post, Charles Falconer, one of the highest-ranking justice officials in Britain, accused the United States of a willingness "to do things beyond the law." He has also called Guantanamo "an affront to the principles of democracy."

While all British citizens in Guantanamo were freed starting in 2004, Britain has balked at allowing former legal residents of the country to return. British officials say they are under no legal obligation to intercede on their behalf because they lack citizenship.

DOJ_NMG_0082075

It's unclear exactly how many British residents remain in prison at the U.S. military base in Cuba. British officials said there are nine who were residents of the United Kingdom at one time, four of them illegally. U.S. officials say there are 10, court papers show.

According to an affidavit filed in a London court case by David F. Richmond, director general of defense and intelligence for the British Foreign Office, U.S. officials informally floated a proposal in June to see whether Britain would be willing to accept the transfer of all 10 prisoners. Court papers show that Britain nixed the idea, saying it would be too costly and difficult to meet U.S. conditions to keep the men under constant surveillance.

George Brent Mickum IV, a Washington lawyer, represents two of the British residents, Jamil el-Banna, a Palestinian with Jordanian citizenship who legally moved to Britain in 1994, and Bisher al-Rawi, an Iraqi citizen who immigrated to Britain as a teenager in 1984. He said his clients would much rather return to London, even if it meant restrictions on their liberty there. But he said Britain was clearly opposed to the idea, under any circumstances.

"As far as I'm concerned, they can put them under whatever surveillance they want -- they're infinitely better off in Britain," Mickum said. "But the British have indicated to me that they are adamant. They do not want these guys back."

The British security service known as MI5 played an instrumental role in sending Banna and Rawi to Guantanamo in the first place.

The men were seized in 2002 during a business trip to West Africa, taken to a secret CIA prison in Afghanistan and later shipped to Cuba. Documents show that British agents tipped off the CIA to the men's whereabouts after they had refused to work as informants for MI5 in London.

Researcher Julie Tate in Washington contributed to this report.

Why Democrats Oppose Military Commissions Act (WSJ)

By Steny Hoyer and Ike Skelton

Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

Your assertion ("Democrats on al Qaeda," Review & Outlook, Oct. 2) that Democrats will not be tough on terrorism because many of us opposed the Republicans' Military Commissions Act is offensive and untrue. The party of Wilson, Roosevelt, Truman, Kennedy and Clinton takes a back seat to no one in protecting our nation and our people. We have always fought for freedom and confronted tyranny -- and do so today.

Our national security interests are best served when we interrogate and try terrorist suspects in a manner that comports with our American values; produces convictions that will withstand appeals; and honors our international commitments, thereby protecting our troops who fall into enemy hands. We believe the Republican bill failed on each point.

If anything, the Military Commissions Act is not tough enough on terrorists because there is no certainty the act will withstand the scrutiny of the Supreme Court. If the act is tied up in litigation and eventually struck down, convicted terrorists could have a "get-out-of-jail-free" card. During the debate on the legislation, we pointed to numerous constitutional challenges that will likely be brought against the act, such as that it unlawfully strips federal courts of jurisdiction over habeas corpus claims; creates ex post facto laws in violation of Article I; purports to make the president the final arbiter of the Geneva Conventions, in violation of Article 3; and because of the way it is written, may apply to U.S. citizens -- as well as non-citizens -- and allow coerced testimony in violation of the 5th, 8th and 14th Amendments.

Will The Supreme Court Shackle New Tribunal Law? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, October 17, 2006

The terror legislation set to be signed into law Tuesday by President Bush sits atop an ideological fault line that sharply divides the US Supreme Court and highlights the emerging power of Justice Anthony Kennedy.

The new law rejects at least five key holdings by the liberal wing of the court and sets the stage for what many analysts believe will be yet another historic showdown between the courts, the president, and Congress.

Mr. Bush's authorization of the Military Commissions Act of 2006 will trigger a barrage of challenges asking judges to strike down the law as illegal, unconstitutional, or both. And it has sparked a heated debate among legal scholars and lawmakers.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, who voted for the law, nonetheless told his colleagues just prior to its passage that he doubted the Military Commissions Act would survive judicial scrutiny. Others disagreed. "I bet you dollars to doughnuts when the Supreme Court gets hold of our work product, they are going to approve it," Sen. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina said in a speech on the Senate floor.

DOJ_NMG_0082076

The Military Commissions Act of 2006 establishes rules for trying Al Qaeda suspects for war crimes before special military tribunals. It somewhat narrows the protections of the Geneva Conventions available to detainees in the war on terror. And it tosses several hundred detainee lawsuits out of the federal courts, replacing rigorous habeas corpus review with a more constrained and streamlined appeals process.

The sharp divide at the Supreme Court is driven by a fundamental disagreement over the proper level of judicial oversight of the war on terror. Liberal justices seek more aggressive oversight to protect individual liberties. Conservatives favor granting more deference and flexibility to the president/ commander in chief during times of war. Kennedy's key role

Although the votes of specific justices have sometimes been difficult to predict, there are signs that a familiar pattern is emerging in cases dealing with the war on terror. Just as in hot-button social issues like affirmative action and so-called partial-birth abortion, the balance of power in potential landmark national-security cases appears increasingly to rest in the hands of Justice Kennedy.

Of the three major high-court precedents dealing with the war on terror - the Hamdi and Rasul decisions announced in 2004 and the Hamdan decision in June 2006 - Kennedy voted in the majority in all three. Most important, his was the least restrictive opinion of the five-justice liberal majority that struck down Bush's military commission process in June. That is, Kennedy was reluctant to go as far as Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Stephen Breyer in limiting Bush's options in the war on terror.

However, he was even more reluctant to grant the president the broad discretion that analysts say would have resulted in the approach favored by Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas, and Samuel Alito.

Instead, Kennedy joined the liberal wing in the Hamdan decision, but once there, he adopted a more centrist stance. He invited Congress to strike the proper balance between protecting national security while also upholding international human rights treaties. "Congress, not the court, is the branch in the better position to undertake the sensitive task of establishing a principle not inconsistent with the national interest or international justice," Kennedy wrote in his concurrence to the Hamdan decision.

The Republican-controlled Congress eagerly accepted the invitation. But if Justice Stevens's Hamdan decision was a rebuke of Bush's terror policies, as many analysts have opined, the Military Commissions Act is a counterrebuke of the liberal wing of the high court - including Kennedy.

The new law rejects much of the liberal wing's approach in the Rasul and Hamdan decisions.

• It rejects the high court's view (in the Rasul decision) that suspected Al Qaeda members detained at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, must be afforded the right to file habeas corpus challenges in US courts.

• It rejects Stevens's majority opinion (in the Hamdan decision) that the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 did not retroactively strip the Supreme Court (and other federal courts) of jurisdiction to hear habeas corpus challenges filed by Guantánamo detainees.

• It rejects the conclusion of four justices in the liberal wing (in Hamdan) that Al Qaeda defendants on trial before military commissions must be allowed to attend their entire trial and confront all evidence being used against them - even when the evidence is classified.

• It rejects the conclusion of the Stevens plurality in the Hamdan decision that conspiracy is not a war crime and thus cannot be the basis of a trial before a military commission operating under the Law of War.

• And it rejects the liberal wing's more expansive view (in Hamdan) of the applicability of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions to Al Qaeda suspects. That provision gives a base line of human rights protections for detainees.

Although Congress and the Bush administration acknowledge that Common Article 3 applies in the war on terror, the Military Commissions Act interprets the treaty in a way that narrows its protections and retroactively provides a defense for US officials who engaged in harsh interrogation tactics such as simulated drowning and induced hypothermia.

Human rights workers say such harsh tactics violate the treaty. Administration officials deny that US personnel have engaged in torture or unlawfully cruel conduct during interrogations. What a new case could revolve around

Ultimately, if the Military Commissions Act winds up before the high court, the outcome may turn on how Kennedy interprets a single paragraph in the 2004 Hamdi decision. At issue in that case was whether a US citizen could be held indefinitely as an enemy combatant. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor (who has since retired) wrote a plurality opinion joined by Kennedy. It said that a citizen-detainee accused of being an enemy combatant must be able to examine the factual basis for his detention and be given a fair opportunity to rebut the government's allegations before a neutral decisionmaker.

Allowing a detainee to file a habeas corpus petition to a federal judge would satisfy this standard, the court said. But the Hamdi opinion continues: "There remains the possibility that the standards we have articulated could be met by an appropriately authorized and properly constituted military tribunal." The opinion cites Army Regulation 190-8 as an appropriate substitute.

DOJ_NMG_0082077

In the aftermath of both the Hamdi and Rasul decisions, the Defense Department was searching for a way to avoid a flood of habeas corpus petitions filed on behalf of Guantánamo detainees to federal judges in Washington. Defense officials relied on that key paragraph in the Hamdi decision and created the Combat Status Review Tribunal system, modeled on Army Regulation 190-8. It involves three officers who review evidence supporting a detainee's designation as an enemy combatant.

The thinking was that if the Supreme Court endorsed such a system as a constitutional alternative to habeas corpus review for US citizens in the Hamdi case, the same system should provide more than enough due process to noncitizen enemy combatants being held at Guantánamo.

If Kennedy agrees with this position, the Military Commissions Act would probably survive its most serious legal challenge. But Kennedy's stance on this issue is unclear.

Lawyers for Guantánamo detainees say that Combat Status Review Tribunals (CSRT) fall far short of the fair procedures required in the Hamdi case. "They are a sham," says Thomas Wilner, one of the lead Guantánamo defense lawyers who won the Rasul case and is continuing to litigate related issues at the federal appeals court in Washington. "They did not give what Hamdi said you have to give - the minimal basic due process requirement."

The requirement includes that a detainee receive prior notice of all accusations being made against him and a fair opportunity to confront those charges before a neutral decisionmaker.

When the evidence is classified, a declassified summary doesn't always provide enough information to enable a detainee to defend himself, defense lawyers say.

In one CSRT hearing, the detainee was accused of associating with a known Al Qaeda operative in Bosnia.

"Give me his name," the detainee said.

The tribunal president said he didn't know the name.

"How can I respond to this?" the detainee asked.

"Did you know of anybody who was a member of Al Qaeda?" the tribunal president asked.

"No, no."

The detainee added, "This is something the interrogators told me a long while ago. I asked the interrogators to tell me who this person was.... If you tell me the name, then I can respond and defend myself against this accusation."

Defense lawyers say that unlike previous wars, most of the US detainees at Guantánamo Bay weren't captured by US soldiers on a battlefield. Many were "sold" to the Americans by Pakistanis and Afghans seeking payment of US bounties for Al Qaeda members even when their Al Qaeda involvement was less than clear. Defense lawyers say this is why there may be a significant number of innocent detainees among those being held at Guantánamo.

This is complicated by the widely held assumption that most bona fide Al Qaeda members will falsely insist during hearings that they are innocent goatherders or hapless students rather than holy warriors. Key parts of the Military Commissions Act

• Establishes special rules for military-commission trials for Al Qaeda suspects accused of committing war crimes. The rules permit the exclusion of a defendant from his trial if classified evidence is being presented, and the admission of hearsay and coerced statements as evidence.

• Authorizes a three-officer military panel to determine a detainee's status as an enemy combatant eligible for indefinite detention in US custody. This is in lieu of the ability to file a habeas corpus petition challenging the legality of the detention in federal court.

• Creates a retroactive legal defense for US personnel who engaged in harsh interrogation tactics from September 2001 to December 2005. Also narrows the range of activities that might constitute a violation of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions outlawing torture and cruel treatment.

• Expands the definition of an unlawful enemy combatant to provide that anyone who offers "material support" to someone engaged in hostilities against the US can be held indefinitely in military detention, regardless of whether he or she actually engaged in hostilities. Also provides that only noncitizens held as unlawful enemy combatants may be tried by a military commission.

Interrogators Beware (WP)

By Stephen Rickard

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

On rare occasions, President Bush and his toughest critics agree on something. That will happen today when Bush signs the Military Commissions Act, while claiming "clear" authorization from Congress for "enhanced" CIA interrogations. Many critics claim the bill authorizes torture. Fortunately, both sides are wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0082078

You can't blame the CIA for demanding clear authorization. It reportedly was using waterboarding (a terrifying mock execution in which a prisoner is strapped to a board and convinced he is being drowned), dousing naked prisoners with water in 50-degree cold and forcing shackled prisoners to stand for 40 straight hours.

Should the CIA be worried? Yes. The United States has prosecuted every one of these techniques as a war crime. So when Congress passed the McCain amendment last fall banning cruel treatment, CIA interrogators reportedly stopped working. Vice President Cheney had sought an exemption for the CIA -- but didn't get one. The administration apparently pushed the interrogators hard to resume their tactics, saying these techniques were still legal, but the CIA refused.

It seems the agency had learned an important lesson from the infamous Justice Department "torture memo," which claimed that to be deemed "torture" a procedure had to be capable of causing major organ failure or death. The administration repudiated the memo when it became public. The lesson? Secret, contorted legal opinions don't provide any real protection to CIA officers.

So the CIA demanded "clarity" -- from Congress. No wonder President Bush practically sprinted to the cameras to begin spinning his "compromise" with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) on the Military Commissions Act. He needs to convince CIA interrogators that they now have congressional carte blanche.

They don't. In fact, if they yield to White House pressure to renew brutal interrogations, they will be at greater risk than they were last fall.

The bill's language on torture is far from perfect, and it has many other objectionable provisions. It should have been rejected. But on its face it criminalizes cruel treatment. An interrogator can go to prison if a court finds that the techniques used caused "serious" mental or physical "suffering," which need not be "prolonged." According to Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), the administration agrees that this rules out waterboarding.

As for hypothermia, prolonged sleep deprivation and stress positions, does the CIA really want to put that question to a jury? Legions of highly qualified experts would line up to testify that these techniques cause severe, prolonged suffering. The CIA knows this. It funded some of the seminal studies on the subject.

As for Congress, administration supporters made general claims about the importance of continuing "the program" and its legality. But Graham said specifically that the bill "reined in the [CIA] program." McCain said it can be interpreted to mean that "extreme deprivation -- sleep deprivation, hypothermia and others -- would be not allowed." Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) said that such abusive techniques are "clearly prohibited by the bill."

"Reined in," "not allowed," "clearly prohibited" -- that's from the bill's Republican sponsors in the Senate. The House was no more supportive. The chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), said it is "absolutely false" to claim that the bill authorizes the "enhanced" techniques. Another senior House Republican, Rep. Christopher Shays of Connecticut, said that "any reasonable person" would conclude that the CIA's techniques "clearly cause 'serious mental and physical suffering.' " That's congressional approval?

Another inconvenient fact for the White House: The bill emphatically reaffirmed the McCain amendment -- the law that led the CIA to demand clear authorization in the first place.

The Bush administration has been pushing the idea that the McCain amendment is infinitely elastic, banning only what "shocks the conscience" -- that no technique is prohibited if interrogators need the information badly enough. Under this preposterous theory, Japanese Americans could have been tortured after Pearl Harbor if authorities thought it would reveal an imminent attack on the West Coast. It's really "in the eye of the beholder," said Cheney.

But if a CIA interrogator is indicted after this administration leaves office, it will not matter whether keeping a naked prisoner standing for 40 straight hours shocks Dick Cheney. It will matter whether it shocks the court.

U.S. courts know cruelty when they see it, even if the Bush Justice Department doesn't. The Supreme Court agreed decades ago that sleep deprivation "is the most effective torture" and said that "the blood of the accused is not the only hallmark of an unconstitutional inquisition . . . the efficiency of the rack and the thumbscrew can be matched . . . by more sophisticated modes of 'persuasion.' "

The administration is trying to convince CIA officers that they won't be indicted -- or at least convicted. But the CIA demanded clarity, not more ambiguity and "plausible deniability."

At the end of the day all the president can honestly tell CIA interrogators is this: "The law has some loose language. We'll give you another memo. Don't worry."

Sure.

The writer is director of the Washington office of the Open Society Institute.

Sami's Shame, And Ours (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

DOJ_NMG_0082079

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

There is no public evidence that Sami al-Hajj committed any crime other than journalism for a television network the Bush administration doesn't like.

But the U.S. has been holding Mr. Hajj, a cameraman for Al Jazeera, for nearly five years without trial, mostly at Guantánamo Bay. With the jailing of Mr. Hajj and of four journalists in Iraq, the U.S. ranked No. 6 in the world in the number of journalists it imprisoned last year, just behind Uzbekistan and tied with Burma, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.

This week, President Bush is expected to sign the Military Commissions Act concerning prisoners at Guantánamo, and he has hailed the law as "a strong signal to the terrorists." But the closer you look at Guantánamo the more you feel that it will be remembered mostly as a national disgrace.

Mr. Hajj is the only journalist known to be there, and, of course, it's possible that he is guilty of terrorist-related crimes. If so, he should be tried, convicted and sentenced.

But so far, the evidence turned up by his lawyers and by the Committee to Protect Journalists — which published an excellent report on Mr. Hajj's case this month — suggests that the U.S. military may be keeping him in hopes of forcing him to become a spy.

Mr. Hajj, 37, who attended university and speaks English, joined Al Jazeera as a cameraman in April 2000 and covered the war in Afghanistan. He was detained on Dec. 15, 2001, and taken to the American military prison in Bagram, Afghanistan.

"They were the longest days of my life," Mr. Hajj's lawyers quoted him as saying. He told them he was repeatedly beaten, kicked, starved, left out in the freezing cold and subjected to anal cavity searches in public "just to humiliate me."

In June 2002, Mr. Hajj was flown to Guantánamo, where he says the beatings initially were brutal but have since subsided somewhat.

At first, interrogators said Mr. Hajj had shot video of Osama bin Laden during an Al Jazeera interview, but it turned out that they may have mixed him up with another cameraman of a similar name. When that assertion fell apart, the authorities offered accusations that he had ferried a large sum of money to a suspicious Islamic charity, that he had supported Chechen rebels, and that he had once given a car ride and other assistance to an official of Al Qaeda.

One indication that even our government may not take those accusations so seriously is that the interrogations barely touched on them, Mr. Hajj's lawyers say.

"About 95 percent of the interrogations he went through were about Al Jazeera," said one of the lawyers, Zachary Katznelson of London. "Sami would say, 'What about me? Will you ask about me?' "

He added, "It really does seem that the focus of the inquiry is about his employer, Al Jazeera, and not about him or any actions he may have taken."

Mr. Katznelson also says that interrogators told Mr. Hajj they would free him immediately if he would agree to go back to Al Jazeera and spy on it. He once asked what would happen if he backed out of the deal after he was free.

"You would not do that," Mr. Hajj quoted his interrogator as saying, "because it would endanger your child."

The Defense Department declined to comment on Mr. Hajj's case, saying that in general, it does not comment on specific detainees at Guantánamo.

While Mr. Hajj is unknown in the U.S., his case has received wide attention in the Arab world. The Bush administration is thus doing long-term damage to American interests.

Mr. Hajj's lawyers say he has two torn ligaments in his knee from abuse in his first weeks in custody, making it exceptionally painful for him to use the squat toilet in his cell. The lawyers say he has been offered treatment for his knee and a sitting toilet that would be less painful to use — but only if he spills dirt on Al Jazeera. And he says he has none to spill.

And while Defense Department documents indicate that he has been a model inmate at Guantánamo, he protests that he has been called racial epithets (he is black) and that he has seen guards desecrate the Koran.

When Sudan detained an American journalist, Paul Salopek, in August in Darfur, journalists and human rights groups reacted with outrage until he was freed a month later. We should be just as offended when it is our own government that is sinking to Sudanese standards of justice.

This doesn't look like a war on terrorism, but a war on our own values.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Mandatory Anthrax Shots To Return (WP)

By Christopher Lee

DOJ_NMG_0082080

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

The Defense Department will resume mandatory anthrax vaccinations for more than 200,000 troops and defense contractors within 60 days, a Pentagon official said yesterday, rejecting the concerns of some veterans and service members who say that the vaccine has not been proved safe or effective.

The vaccinations will be required for most military units and civilian contractors assigned to homeland bioterrorism defense or deployed in Iraq, Afghanistan or South Korea, said William Winkenwerder Jr., a physician and the assistant secretary of defense for health affairs. As troops rotate in and out of those regions, the number receiving vaccinations will grow considerably, he said.

A lawsuit filed by six former or current service members had blocked the mandatory vaccinations since October 2004, when U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan ruled that the Food and Drug Administration had erred in approving the vaccine in 2003 without seeking public comment and conducting a full review.

But the FDA then held a 90-day comment period to overcome that hurdle and granted the vaccine final approval last December, clearing a legal path for the Pentagon to resume the controversial program.

"The FDA went out again . . . and came to the very unambiguous and clear conclusion that the vaccine was safe and it was effective against all forms of exposure," Winkenwerder said. "In our view, that has definitively settled the question."

But Mark Zaid, an attorney for the six plaintiffs, said yesterday that Sullivan's ruling and the Pentagon's remedy both turned on procedural technicalities. The plaintiffs plan to file a new lawsuit challenging the government's contention that human studies from the 1950s and more recent studies in animals demonstrated the safety and efficacy of the vaccine.

"It is an unnecessary, unproven and potentially unsafe vaccine," Zaid said. "Everyone is concerned as to their health, and the fact is that there is no scientific evidence that the vaccine works in humans. . . . I think this program is nothing more than a glorified public relations campaign to demonstrate that they are doing something."

Anthrax is a deadly infectious disease caused by the spore-forming bacterium Bacillus anthracis . A month after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, letters tainted with anthrax infected people in Connecticut, Florida, New Jersey, New York and the District. The unsolved attacks killed five people, sickened 17 and caused about 10,000 to be put on antibiotics.

Although the previous anthrax attacks occurred on U.S. soil, Winkenwerder said troops overseas are believed to be a higher risk, and military personnel in the United States do not have to receive the six shots.

"I have not been vaccinated because I'm not in any of the targeted groups," Winkenwerder said. "If I was, I would receive the vaccine without hesitation."

The Clinton administration began the mandatory vaccinations in 1997. Over the next few years, hundreds of active-duty service members refused to take the vaccine, and more than 100 were court-martialed as a result. Winkenwerder said that 27 people refused the vaccine and left the military in 2003, and that 10 did so in 2004. A voluntary vaccination program that Sullivan allowed last year saw participation rates of 50 percent, Winkenwerder said. In all, more than 1.2 million military and civilian personnel have received the vaccine.

Some who received vaccinations for anthrax and smallpox around the time of the 2003 invasion of Iraq have complained of fatigue, migraines, pain and diseases such as multiple sclerosis.

Winkenwerder said that, as with any vaccine, some who receive the shots develop adverse reactions, but that there is no evidence to indicate a particular problem with the anthrax vaccine.

But as recently as this spring, the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, said questions remain about the vaccine. "The long term safety of the licensed vaccine has not been studied," the agency said in a May 9 report. ". . . Also, there is some evidence that the current anthrax vaccine may have diminished efficacy against certain virulent strains of anthrax."

Barbara Loe Fisher, president of the National Vaccine Information Center, said her nonprofit advocacy group is adding more information to its Web site about the research and development of biological defense vaccines.

"The DOD has a moral duty to fully disclose anthrax vaccine risks, as well as benefits, to soldiers and allow them to make an informed, voluntary decision," she said in a statement.

Luck May Have Spared Aides In Anthrax Attack (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

The letter from the fourth-grade class of the “Greendale School” in Franklin Park, N.J., arrived on a Friday afternoon at Room 509 of the Hart Senate Office Building. It quickly was shipped up to the sixth-floor mailroom — its last stop on a four-day, roughly 160-mile journey that would leave several people dead, more than a dozen injured and the Congressional community in shock.

DOJ_NMG_0082081

But no one opened the letter that Friday, as the interns and staff who dealt with mail in then-Sen. Tom Daschle's (D-S.D.) office were instead getting lectured about the threat of biochemical attacks through the postal service. By Monday morning, Grant Leslie, an intern, had found the seemingly innocent letter, postmarked Oct. 9, 2001, at the top of a pile and made the slightest cut in the envelope, causing a small amount of powder to spill on her skirt, shoes, the intern standing next to her and the office floor.

Five years later, those ex-staffers and health experts who dealt with the medical issues involved in the immediate aftermath of the anthrax attacks largely attribute the fact that those exposed to the deadly biological agent avoided long-term health problems to a single factor: luck.

"We are very lucky that no one died," said Greg Martin, who at the time was head of the infectious disease center at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda.

Interviews with Daschle, some of his former staffers, other Congressional aides and experts involved with the short-term fallout from the anthrax attacks on Capitol Hill revealed that a series of actions taken along the way — some well-thought-out, others largely accidental — combined to allow for a relatively happy ending rather than a deadly outcome.

Mistakes were made at the outset, and internal fights between agencies continued for months afterward, but each of those setbacks was gradually overcome, some because of hard work and some a result of preparation for just such an attack.

Several of the actions taken at the time were not revealed to the public for months or even years, and in the process created the potential for far greater carnage from the attacks, such as:

• The Daschle intern, Grant Leslie, only partially opened the letter, which was then fully opened minutes later by Capitol Police on the scene, an act that may have further spread the anthrax spores into the air and a ventilation system that didn't stop running for 45 minutes after the first emergency call was placed;

• The initial recommendation to the aides from the Office of the Attending Physician, after several hours of being essentially quarantined in an anthrax-laden office, was that only the staffers on the sixth floor in and around the mail room needed to be tested for exposure, while other staffers in Hart were allowed to go home without monitoring;

• Even after staffers demanded they all be tested — a process which revealed a total of 20 aides were exposed — the experts on the scene allowed the staff to go home without any decontamination, potentially spreading the agent throughout the Washington, D.C., metropolitan region.

In the end, five people died along the East Coast from anthrax-laced letters sent to Daschle, Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), NBC News and the New York Post. Just a few blocks from the Capitol, two employees at the U.S. Postal Service's Brentwood facility, which processed the letter to Daschle and another anthrax-tainted letter to Leahy, discovered a month later, died from anthrax inhalation.

"The luckiest thing was we saw the powder, unlike the postal workers. That's the critical difference between our people living through it and those two postal workers not living through it," said Laura Petrou, Daschle's chief of staff in his Hart office at the time.

•••

While federal investigators have failed to apprehend the source of the anthrax attacks, each of the letters was sent from suburban New Jersey, routed through Trenton, and then delivered to Washington. By the time they hit the Capitol, the potential anthrax threat had already become a central topic in discussions of terrorist threats, as the NBC and New York Post letters had already been discovered. Roll Call's lead headline on Oct. 15, 2001, was "Hill Braces for Anthrax."

That morning, according to numerous sources inside the Daschle office at the time, Leslie had only barely opened the letter from the "Greendale School." (It would later be revealed that there is there is no such school in the Garden State.) She sat frozen, refusing to further open the letter and potentially have more powder come out — a fact that runs contrary to the public perception at the time that the intern had ripped open the letter and accidentally sprayed anthrax spores throughout the office.

The first Capitol Police officers on the scene weren't even equipped with hazardous materials suits to handle the letter, according to Daschle and ex-staffers who was in the Hart office that day. According to a book he wrote about the 107th Congress, Daschle said the call to the Capitol Police from his office about the suspicious envelope was the third they'd received that morning.

The officers opened the letter and read aloud: "You cannot stop us. We have this anthrax. You die now. Are you afraid? Death to America. Death to Israel. Allah is great." Within minutes, other officers arrived on the scene in hazardous materials suits, calls to the FBI and Centers for Disease Control went out, and the on-scene officers conducted field tests which immediately came back with the news that would rock the Capitol for months to come: a positive result for anthrax.

DOJ_NMG_0082082

In the Capitol, where he was serving as Senate Majority Leader, Daschle received the news from a top aide and began calling family members of the aides exposed to the powder. Even as he was absorbing the news, he took a call from President Bush about other anti-terror matters, during which he informed Bush that the field tests for anthrax were positive. Minutes later, in a press conference, Bush told the world about the letters testing positive, sending a wave of dread throughout the Hart building.

"There was really no knowledge about what should be done. The book had not been written," said Martin, who was brought in as an adviser to the situation by Attending Physician John Eisold.

•••

Martin said the officers opening the letter and reading it aloud probably did expose the area around the Daschle mail room to a greater level of contamination, but he added that the two grams of the deadly agent were so potent that everyone on that floor likely had been exposed already. He compared the incident to opening a canister of gasoline in a small room, which would fill the room with its odor in a matter of seconds.

Just as big a problem was the fact that it took 45 minutes to shut down the HVAC system in Hart. Likewise, much of the scientific history regarding anthrax and its interaction with humans came from military testing conducted in the 1950s.

Eisold's office, consulting with other medical experts from the CDC and Bethesda Naval, believed that the aides on the fifth-floor Daschle office would be fine, and dispatched the mail room staff to a ninth-floor office for testing. The remaining 25 or so staffers quarantined in the fifth floor were kept there for the next five hours — long enough that a pizza delivery man was eventually summoned to deliver lunch and accidentally went too far into the office, potentially exposing himself to the agent.

At one point that afternoon, the staff were told they could go home without getting tested for anthrax exposure, a process which involved using a nasal swab to test for any anthrax spores. A legislative assistant to Daschle, Peter Hanson, dissented, and soon a group of staffers were circulating a petition demanding to be swabbed, according to aides in the room.

Eventually, the clamor led to any concerned staffer being allowed to be tested, and all were eventually tested. But many left their offices that day believing that they were condescended to by police and health officials.

Looking back, Martin said this — letting the staff leave without going through some sort of decontamination process, letting them go to the Capitol and then home wearing the same clothes that they had been wearing — was the most critical mistake made in the entire anthrax ordeal.

Daschle recalled an emotional scene that Monday afternoon when his Capitol-based staff finally got to see their friends from Hart. "We all hugged them, not thinking that their clothes were probably totally saturated with these anthrax spores," he said in a recent interview.

That night, tests came back revealing that more than 20 staffers had tested positive for anthrax exposure (that number would settle at 20 after all the proper tests were done). Additional tests came back showing that the grade of anthrax involved was a more dangerous, more purified form and had spread farther than anyone initially suspected.

Pete Rouse, Daschle's leadership chief of staff, and Petrou began calling aides and telling them to assemble in the Capitol the next morning for the most serious meeting they were ever likely to have. "That was pretty devastating. I was terrified that some of them were going to die," Petrou recalled recently.

They showed up at the Capitol that Tuesday morning with trash bags filled with their clothes from the day before, which were then turned over to the FBI for testing.

Daschle's staff made an immediate decision that they would tackle the issue together, regardless of who among them had tested positive and who hadn't. No one would identify to the media which staffers tested positive, and they went to great lengths to initially conceal Leslie's identity as the person who initially opened the letter.

Daschle identified Leslie, who returned to Capitol Hill to work full time for Daschle, in his book. The then-intern, who now works for Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), has declined all media interviews on the topic.

•••

The ensuing days were a back-and-forth of confusion and fear, as thousands in the Capitol complex lined up for nasal swabs and to receive their supply of the powerful antibiotic Cipro.

Briefings were given to chiefs of staff to relay information to anxious aides throughout the Capitol, but many staffers left those meetings confused. "It's easy to Monday-morning quarterb ack, but I think it would have been better if they told us, 'This is our best estimate, we've never done this before.' We didn't get that," said Luke Albee, Leahy's chief of staff at the time.

Several staffers in the offices of Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), next door to 509 Hart, also tested positive for anthrax exposure. Martin, who is now in charge of the infectious disease program at the Naval Medical Research Center in Lima, Peru, said the health-care community had never encountered anything like the level of anthrax exposure displayed in some of the staffers, which he described as "hundreds" of times above the amount that could kill them.

DOJ_NMG_0082083

If those immediately exposed had not been placed on Cipro within 24 hours, Martin said he believes fatalities would have occurred on the Hill. In addition, had Leslie not seen the powdery substance, Martin said, “I think we would have had scores if not hundreds of deaths.”

Martin acknowledged that several things would be done differently in the event of a similar biochemical attack, notably not leaving those exposed in the same room for hours on end, and not sending them home before going through decontamination.

“What saved those people was knowing or suspecting it was anthrax [in the letter], and getting them on antibiotics,” he added.

By the end of the year, the staffers and Capitol Police who tested positive for exposure had received an anthrax vaccine as an extra precaution, the final seal of approval for medical experts. And throughout the ordeal, staffers for Daschle and Feingold continued performing the everyday tasks that came with their profession.

“They all carried out their jobs really well, under extraordinary pressure, and wondering whether they were going to die,” Petrou said.

Heavy Load Port-Security Plan, A Bid To Foil Terror, May Slow Deliveries (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

LONG BEACH, Calif. -- Rafael Rivera spends more than a dozen hours a day in the cab of his old blue truck. In a typical day spent hauling shipping containers from the Port of Long Beach to distribution centers for companies such as Ikea, Pier 1 Imports or Toyota, the El Salvadoran immigrant clears about $8 an hour.

Mr. Rivera's humble but critical job is about to come under scrutiny. A federal antiterrorism program set to go into practice later this year will require port workers -- including more than 100,000 drivers like Mr. Rivera who pass through the nation's terminals -- to prove they are legal U.S. residents. While Mr. Rivera says he's here on a work permit, many drivers in this predominantly Hispanic work force are believed to be illegal immigrants. For the harbor trucking industry, which already faces a shortage of drivers, the new regulations promise to make the crunch acute.

Washington's bid to ratchet up port security is expected to leave thousands of undocumented drivers without jobs in ports across the country. That would undermine the flow of goods to U.S. consumers, highlighting the crucial role immigrants such as Mr. Rivera play in the nation's economy.

At issue is the Transportation Worker Identification Credential program, or TWIC, a component of the Maritime Transportation Security Act of 2002. Under this federal program's guidelines, workers with unescorted access to secure U.S. port areas must be legal residents and pass a background check. Disqualifying felonies are likely to include robbery and drug dealing. Those who pass will be issued biometric identification cards, which include a photo and fingerprints. Workers will gain access to a secure port area by swiping the cards at the entrance.

The worker-credential plan wasn't crafted with illegal immigrant workers in mind. It was an outgrowth of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, which alerted authorities to the vulnerability of U.S. infrastructure and raised concerns that radioactive materials could be smuggled into one of the country's 180 commercial ports. After languishing for years, TWIC -- which will be implemented by two Homeland Security divisions, the U.S. Coast Guard and the Transportation Security Administration -- is expected to launch late this year, says a TSA spokesman.

The program will require identification cards for about 750,000 port workers nationwide, which include about 110,000 truck drivers, the TSA says. A large proportion of the truckers are Hispanic -- as much as 90% at the sprawling, adjacent harbors of Los Angeles and Long Beach, the nation's busiest ports. No one knows for sure how many are illegal immigrants, though estimates range from 20% to 50% nationally. With these truckers out of the work force, major ports such as Houston, Miami and New York-New Jersey would also be heavily affected.

"We need TWIC for security," says Bill Madden, general manager for terminal services at Long Beach Container Terminal Inc. "But it will cause a big dislocation. The truckers are the guys who make this place work."

Critical Link

The drivers form a critical link between global suppliers to retailers throughout the U.S. Nationwide, they haul everything from spare auto parts and life-saving medical devices to toys and T-shirts from harbors to distribution points 50 or 100 miles away. Working as independent contractors, they are paid a flat per-trip fee -- typically $40 to $100, depending on the distance between port and warehouse, and averaging about $55. Most drive aged trucks -- known as bobtails -- to which they attach trailer rigs. They normally take out loans to buy the trucks, paying them off in monthly installments. The drivers are paid by trucking firms retained by freight forwarders, steamship lines and importers.

DOJ_NMG_0082084

Mr. Rivera's experience illustrates why U.S. citizens aren't clamoring for these jobs. On a recent day at noon, the 51-year-old trucker parked his rig in a transportation company's staging yard to wait for an assignment. At 3 p.m., a dispatcher gave him a ticket for the day's first container pickup. Mr. Rivera drove to the Long Beach port so he could be among the first to get his load when the harbor opened for its 6 p.m. night shift.

His first load was a container heading to Kmart, which he dropped at a consolidation yard near the port. By 3 a.m. the next morning, Mr. Rivera had made two additional round trips to retailer warehouses and railway depots in Southern California.

Mr. Rivera bought his truck, which has nearly 900,000 miles on the engine, for $15,000, plus about $3,000 more he paid to service a loan. After accounting for fuel, insurance and truck maintenance, he figures he clears about $2,400 a month. He shares a $600-a-month, one-room apartment with his wife, Carlota, as well as the youngest of their five children and a 28-year-old niece.

The worst part of the job, Mr. Rivera says, is sitting in line for a container -- downtime he's only rarely paid for. "Sometimes I wait four or five hours just to collect one little box," he said, speaking in Spanish. He clears his throat often when he talks. Asked about the cause, he mentions the pollution from the hundreds of trucks idling at one time at the port.

Few Americans want these jobs, says Bob Curry, president of California Cartage Co., a privately held Southern California port-logistics company. The per-trip pay structure of port trucking isn't as attractive as the hourly wages more typical of the local trucking business. Already, Mr. Curry estimates, turnover among the 12,000 drivers who work the Long Beach-Los Angeles port complex is about 60% each year. "They can haul dirt for more money than cargo," he says.

A cut in the work force could be devastating, as a nationwide work-stoppage earlier this year demonstrated. As few as 10% of all truckers at Los Angeles-Long Beach picked up containers on May 1, when pro-immigration groups called a "Day Without Immigrants." Freeways normally jammed with immigrant-driven rigs were virtually free of trucks.

More than half of all imported apparel and shoes bound for U.S. stores move through Los Angeles or Long Beach ports, says Bruce Berton, officer/director of international business consulting at Stonefield Josephson Inc., a textile and apparel accounting firm. Other ports wouldn't be able to pick up the slack on short notice, he says. Consumers would feel shortages within 30 days. "It would seriously disrupt the economy," says Mr. Berton, who is also on the board of the Export Textile Advisor Commission of the U.S. Department of Trade.

The Transportation Security Administration says it is aware of the ID program's potential impact on port work forces. "We will continue to work with industry, port authorities and workers to address it as we roll out this vital security measure," says Darrin Kayser, manager of strategic initiatives for the TSA.

Demand for port truckers has soared in recent years, as maritime transportation has been revolutionized by containers -- large, stackable steel boxes that are easily transferred between ships, trucks and rail cars. More than 14 million twenty-foot-equivalent containers moved through Los Angeles-Long Beach in 2005, compared with 9.5 million in 2000. The ports began operating a night shift last year and expect container traffic to increase again this year. Overall, the value of international trade in and out of the U.S. climbed to $949 billion in 2004, up 29% from 2000.

At the Los Angeles-Long Beach ports, truckers have enormous freedom to roam the terminals. On a recent day, after presenting his driver's license and container number at the gate, Guatemalan immigrant Carlos Ruiz rumbled into a Long Beach terminal, which looks like a massive parking lot on the water's edge. He weaved through row after row of containers stacked four high, driving with relief past a line of truckers waiting for their containers to be plucked from a pile. "If I'd been assigned to a container in that other row I'd be stuck here another three hours," Mr. Ruiz said.

His container sat halfway down a stack at Row D. There, Mr. Ruiz waited a few minutes for a crane operator -- whom he called a "flip-iadora," Spanglish for a woman who "flips" containers -- to lower a 40-foot orange container onto his truck. His rig trembled at the 20-ton impact.

The drivers have no idea what the sealed containers hold. Mr. Ruiz, en route to a Target distribution center in nearby Carson, could have been hauling plastic toys or millions of dollars worth of plasma TVs. "I know what's sold at Target, but I have no idea what's in this container," he said.

As Mr. Ruiz headed toward the gate, the number on his container was read by an optical camera and checked against his delivery ticket. A taped message informed him, in English and Spanish, that he was free to exit the terminal. After delivering his load to Target he began the cycle again, picking up an empty container from the retailer's yard and returning it to the port.

The unescorted terminal access of Mr. Ruiz and other drivers is what worries some security officials. They're concerned that truckers, whose vehicles aren't inspected when they enter a terminal, could be persuaded to carry explosives inside, or facilitate passage of lethal cargo. "If a port is a target, these extremely low-income truck drivers are susceptible to bribery," says Jon Haveman, a research fellow at the Public Policy Institute of California, a nonpartisan institute that studies state social, political and economic issues.

Lapses Abound

DOJ_NMG_0082085

Experts in security say that lapses abound at the seaports. Port truckers aren't allowed to bring unauthorized guests into a marine terminal, for example. But recently one trucker entered Los Angeles port with his adult son sitting beside him. Both father and son, who asked not to be identified, said that the son frequently rides along.

Immigrant advocates and port experts say truck drivers rank far down the list of potential security threats. The big concern is that nuclear devices or other weapons could be smuggled from abroad and detonated on U.S. shores. U.S. Customs and Border Protection, a Homeland Security division, is addressing smuggling: The agency has struck accords with foreign governments to station U.S. inspectors abroad to examine some U.S.-bound containers. The program is operating at 50 ports so far. On Friday, President Bush signed a law that would place radiation-detection equipment at 22 U.S. ports by the end of next year.

Unauthorized workers often carry false Social Security numbers or work under the names of others. But bosses at the area's dozens of trucking companies say they're not in the position to verify whether documents provided by employment-seeking immigrants are authentic. Such undocumented drivers account for as many as half of the port-trucking work force nationwide, estimates Michael H. Belzer, professor of industrial relations at Wayne State University. By comparison, more than 50% of crop workers are undocumented, according to the U.S. Labor Department.

Port trucking hasn't always been so unappealing to American workers. Decades ago, when the jobs fell under Teamsters union protection, they offered middle-class wages and benefits. But in the 1970s, major industrial shippers lobbied for an open market to reduce the cost of transporting goods.

When the government deregulated trucking in 1980, nonunion, mom-and-pop trucking firms rushed in. Many union shops folded and most unionized truckers left the ports. Pay and work conditions soon deteriorated, according to Wayne State's Mr. Belzer, who wrote a book on the transformation, "Sweatshops on Wheels." Many of the jobs were taken by Hispanic immigrants.

To protest poor conditions, about 6,000 Latino port truckers in Los Angeles and Long Beach stopped driving in the spring of 1996. Shipping companies and trucking firms were unresponsive and ultimately the campaign failed. "I ruined my credit, lost my car and the trucking company didn't want me back," says Enrique Aguilar, a veteran trucker who stayed away for four months.

A survey conducted in 2004 by Kristin Monaco, a professor at California State University, Long Beach, found that port truckers in Los Angeles-Long Beach earned a median $25,000 a year after expenses. By comparison, unionized longshoremen, who unload containers from incoming vessels, make about $110,000.

Trucking companies say they have little power to raise wages to attract new drivers, because new firms are constantly cropping up and offering lower transport rates to importers. Margins are razor-thin. Averting a longer-term driver shortage would require trucking companies to raise pay enough to make driving jobs more attractive. But that would mean charging higher fees, which the trucking companies say importers and freight forwarders are reluctant to accept.

It's not clear whether consumers would feel the impact of a price hike. Currently, for a typical pair of shoes, freight, duty and brokerage charges come to about $1.15, says Mr. Berton of Stonefield Josephson. Of that, he says, the cost of transporting the shoes from port to distribution center is minimal -- about one cent per pair.

Ashcroft Criticized For Book On 9/11 Panel (AP)

AP, October 17, 2006

ST. LOUIS - Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft has been blasted by fellow Republicans for his new book criticizing the 9/11 Commission's investigation of the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Republicans who served on the commission told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that Ashcroft's behavior as a witness and as an author is "underhanded" and "outrageous."

In his book, "Never Again," Ashcroft accuses the commission of "assessing blame and grandstanding" instead of finding the truth and protecting Americans.

He alleges that the hearings "disintegrated into show trials" and that the Republican-chaired panel was "dangerously out of control" and "obsessed" with blaming President Bush for not preventing the terrorist attacks while "absolving" President Clinton's administration.

Ashcroft's spokeswoman said he stands by the accounts in his book.

Former Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., said Ashcroft was the least interested in helping the panel get at the facts of what had happened before Sept. 11, 2001, so another terrorist attack could be averted.

"John was the least cooperative of all the witnesses we had," Gorton said. "He was the only one who refused to submit his written testimony in advance, he probably came with the largest entourage of any of the people we talked to, and he engaged in a disingenuous and partisan attack" on the committee.

DOJ_NMG_0082086

Former Illinois Gov. James Thompson said Ashcroft's behavior as a witness was so bad that Bush privately apologized to commission members.

"Ashcroft tried to put us on trial and it backfired. The president of the United States apologized to us in the Oval Office for his conduct, which is kind of embarrassing," Thompson said.

"The president has thanked us for our report, and he gave us a four-hour interview," Thompson said. "As far as I can tell, the American people overwhelmingly support the commission and our report. The Congress supports the commission and our work. We were not partisan - we were evenhanded, and we made recommendations based on the history of what happened. So I don't know where John is coming from."

Thompson said the only motive he could guess at is that Ashcroft is "selling a book."

In his testimony before the commission in April 2004, Ashcroft indicated that commission member Jamie Gorelick, a Justice Department official in the Clinton administration, had put up barriers between intelligence and law enforcement that contributed to the terrorist attacks.

But Gorton said that weeks before Ashcroft testified, his own Justice Department had reaffirmed that the barriers should continue. So while Ashcroft tried to divide panel members along partisan lines, his only impact was to antagonize and further unify them, Gorton said.

The former Missouri governor and senator writes about the "Democratic vitriol" he faced during his confirmation hearing to be attorney general.

He lists a number of personal accomplishments after Sept. 11 that he says helped protect the nation, including arrests, surveillance and deportations, while still respecting civil liberties.

He now runs the Ashcroft Group, a Washington-based consulting and lobbying business that assists firms seeking contracts in the field of homeland security and helps with corporate management.

In his book, Ashcroft blames the loss of his Senate seat in 2000 to Democrat Mel Carnahan partly on newspapers that venerated the former governor.

Ashcroft also contends that the Carnahan campaign, continued by his widow, Jean Carnahan, pre-empted Ashcroft's own message by focusing on the late governor's "family values."

In 3rd Storm, FEMA Trailer Is A Charm (NYT)

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

LEEVILLE, La., Oct. 16 — Jack Melancon lost his shrimp nets and his roof to Hurricane Katrina last year and the rest of his house to flooding from Hurricane Rita.

So when he awoke Monday morning to the groan of a tornado advancing on his government-issued trailer home here about 60 miles south of New Orleans, Mr. Melancon, a commercial fisherman, was certain he was about to take a third strike.

Skipping across the wind-driven waters of Bayou Lafourche, the tornado toppled trailers and cut shrimp boats free, driving one into a natural gas pipeline that was quickly turned off. Two people suffered minor injuries.

The tornado snatched the roof from the house of Mr. Melancon's father and the siding from the house of his brother. Then it hurled debris against Mr. Melancon's trailer, provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Short-lived banshee winds strained to pull the trailer from the soggy earth, but metal straps held it firm. The storm then veered north and disappeared.

"It rocked and it rolled and it shook and it blew," Mr. Melancon said. "The trailer did its job. I would recommend one of these to anybody."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Reassures Iraqi U.S. Troops Are Staying (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

President Bush yesterday assured Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he has no plans to withdraw troops from Iraq and told him there is no truth to rumors that the United States has set a two-month deadline for his government to control sectarian violence.

In a 15-minute phone call initiated by the president, Mr. al-Maliki raised concerns about the rumored timeline, saying such reports undermine confidence in the Iraqi government and inspire terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0082087

"The president underscored his commitment to a democratically elected government of Iraq, encouraging the prime minister to ignore rumors that the United States government was seeking to impose a timeline on the [al-Maliki] government," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

Mr. al-Maliki "said that rumors sometimes can undercut confidence in the government and also its ability to work effectively in fighting terror," Mr. Snow said. "And the president said, 'Don't worry. You still have our full support.' "

The White House did not know where Mr. al-Maliki picked up the rumors, but the prime minister may have been referring to comments by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, who said earlier this month that the United States might have to consider a change of course if the Iraqi government fails to restore order within two or three months.

During the phone call, Mr. Bush and Mr. al-Maliki also discussed suggestions that Iraq be broken into three regions -- one each for Kurds, Sunnis and Shi'ites -- as a way to end sectarian violence. But the two leaders rejected such a division.

"I don't think that's the right way to go. I think that will increase sectarian violence. I think that will make it more dangerous -- and so does [Mr. al-Maliki]," Mr. Bush said yesterday in an interview with Bill O'Reilly on the Fox News Channel.

"On the point you brought up about dividing the country in three, he rejected that strongly. He thought that was a bad idea. And I agree with him. ... Federalism is one thing, in other words, giving a balance between regional government and central government, but dividing is basically saying there will be three autonomous regions, will create, Bill, a situation where Sunnis and Sunni nations and Sunni radicals will be competing against Shia radicals.

"The Kurds will then create problems for Turkey and Syria. And you've got a bigger mess than we have at this point in time, which I believe is going to be solved," he said.

Mr. Bush also used the phone call to press the prime minister, telling him "we expect you to make tough political decisions to move forward. And he assured me he would continue to make tough political decisions necessary to move forward."

The president also told Mr. al-Maliki that he supports efforts to go after militias and terrorists through political, economic and military means, Mr. Snow said. In turn, Mr. al-Maliki "debunked this notion that he's not going to go after these criminal elements and/or militias that are killing innocent people," Mr. Bush said on Fox. "He knows he's got to provide the security necessary for this country to move forward."

Sectarian Fighting Kills 91 In Balad; Sunnis Flee City (USAT)

USA Today, October 17, 2006

BAGHDAD — Four days of violence in Balad, an hour's drive north of the capital, left at least 91 people dead by Monday. All but 17 were Sunni Muslims.

Also Monday, the U.S. military said five soldiers and two Marines were killed Sunday. The latest deaths put the American military toll so far in October to 58; the month is on course to be the deadliest since 107 U.S. servicemembers died in January 2005.

The violence in Balad began Friday when the headless bodies of 17 Shiite Muslims were found in an orchard. Over the next three days, Shiite death squads killed 74 Sunnis and forced many more to flee east across the Tigris River to the Sunni-dominated city of Duluiyah, police said. Mohamed Ali Hamid, 35, a Sunni taxi driver, said Shiite militiamen gave his family just two hours to leave town Sunday.

American forces helped quell the violence in Balad, where a major U.S. logistical airbase is located.

“Coalition force units are partnering with Iraqi police and Iraqi army units involved in operations around Balad. We are also providing quick reaction assets to the Iraqi police and army,” Lt. Col. Christopher Garver said.

President Bush, meanwhile, telephoned Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Monday to reassure him of U.S. support, apparently in response to rumors that the United States had lost patience with the Shiite leader.

Bush spokesman Tony Snow said the president told al-Maliki there was no American deadline for the Iraqi government to be able to stand on its own.

“He (al-Maliki) said that rumors sometimes can undercut confidence in the government and also its ability to work effectively in fighting terror,” Snow said.

Snow also challenged a story published Monday by USA TODAY that said al-Maliki will not force militias to disarm immediately. “There is no mention … that he's not going to force militias to disarm until later this year or early next year. As a matter of fact, he says he's in the process of doing it now.”

A transcript of the interview showed Al-Maliki had told USA TODAY, “The initial date we've set for disbanding the militias is the end of this year or the beginning of next year.” He also said a government committee was formed Oct. 8 “to work on disbanding militias and give them a deadline by which they have to lay down their arms.”

DOJ_NMG_0082088

In addition to the deaths in Balad, 60 other people were killed in Iraq on Monday. According to an Associated Press count, 708 Iraqis have been reported killed this month. Among the victims Monday: Imad al-Faroon, the brother of the chief prosecutor in the second trial of former dictator Saddam Hussein. Saddam is accused of genocide in connection with a government crackdown in the 1980s against Iraqi Kurds. Al-Faroon was shot by gunmen who burst into his home, government official Ali al-Lami said.

The most deadly attack — 20 dead and 27 wounded — occurred when a suicide bomber slammed an explosives-packed car into a Shiite funeral tent in eastern Baghdad's Ur neighborhood. A second car bomb ripped through a crowd of rescuers and onlookers, police Lt. Ahmed Mohammed Ali said.

Also Monday, Saddam issued an open letter saying Iraq's "liberation is at hand" and calling for an end to Sunni-Shiite killings. Saddam said he was addressing Iraqis in a letter because "my chances to express my opinion are limited" while in detention. The judges in Saddam's two trials have repeatedly censured him and turned off his court microphone.

Court officials said a verdict and sentence would be handed down Nov. 5 in Saddam's first trial for the killings of 148 Shiites from the town of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him in 1982.

Bush Pledges To Keep U.S. Troops In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

President Bush told Iraq's prime minister on Monday he has no plans to pull U.S. forces out of the war-torn country, in a conversation that underscored Iraqi worries that the president is being pressured to curtail America's role in the widely unpopular war.

In a 15-minute morning phone call, Bush told Nouri al-Maliki that rumors of a withdrawal of troops in two months were untrue and that the United States would stand strong with its new ally. But even as Bush reassured al-Maliki, he is having to confront growing doubts among Republicans in Congress about his war policies.

A small but growing group of GOP lawmakers, including Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., have suggested a change in course may be necessary. Warner could provide political cover for other GOP members to challenge Bush on Iraq because he is normally a Bush loyalist and a respected leader on national security issues.

Also providing ammunition for lawmakers unhappy over Iraq — and potential political cover — _ should be recommendations expected by an independent commission after next month's congressional elections. Former GOP Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a leader of that panel, has said the group will recommend options for changing in course in Iraq.

Leon Panetta, a member of the panel and President Clinton's former chief of staff, said the panel hopes to present Congress its findings by January. Among the options being considered are whether to set a timetable for withdrawal and whether to solicit help from Iran and Syria to stop the fighting, but "the study group has made no decisions," he said.

By then, there could be enough Republican defections to produce the biggest challenge yet by Congress to Bush's policy in Iraq — even if the GOP retains control of the House and Senate.

"The war is a 100-pound albatross hanging on the necks of Republicans," said Norman Ornstein, a political scholar with the American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

A spike in American casualties in Iraq in recent weeks, as ethnic violence there spirals ever more out of control, has only served to increase the likelihood that Republicans will increasingly question Bush's policies in the war. At least 58 Americans have died there in the first two weeks of October, a pace that, if continued, would make the month the worst for coalition forces since 107 U.S. soldiers died in January 2005.

According to polls, Bush's support on Iraq among Republicans is soft. While three-fourths of Republicans say they approve of his handling of the war, fewer than half say they strongly approve and three in 10 either have mixed feelings or disapprove.

In contrast, three out of four Democrats disapprove strongly, according to AP-Ipsos polling.

Political experts see next month's elections as a turning point in Congress' oversight of the war, because it may be read as a litmus test for voters' support of Bush. GOP lawmakers will be more likely to challenge the president's policies on the war if they win by a slim margin or are forced to hand control to Democrats, especially as Bush slips further into lame-duck status during his final two years in office.

Concerned U.S. support was faltering, Al-Maliki told the president "that rumors sometimes can undercut confidence in the government and also its ability to work effectively in fighting terror," said Bush spokesman Tony Snow. "And the president said, `Don't worry, you still have our full support,'" Snow added.

DOJ_NMG_0082089

Warner recently returned from a trip to the region and immediately told reporters that the war was "drifting sideways," with little progress being made. Warner said he would wait two to three months — until after the elections — to see if the situation could be turned around before suggesting a change in course.

Warner has found support from other Republicans — including Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a possible 2008 presidential contender and frequent maverick, as well as Sens. Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine and several House Republicans.

Taking a different tack, Republican Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John McCain of Arizona have challenged Bush's assertion that the size of the Army is adequate. The two senators say they support boosting the number of troops to reduce the strain on units repeatedly sent into combat.

"The American people are not going to continue to support, sustain a policy that puts American troops in the middle of a civil war," Hagel said Sunday on CNN's "Late Edition."

Despite recent noise from Hagel and others, Bush counselor Dan Bartlett said the White House has not detected a loss of Republican support for Bush's Iraq policy. "The vast majority of Republicans understand the stakes in Iraq ... and want to win," he said.

Political experts say Republicans do not want to alienate their major support base — staunch GOP voters loyal to Bush. But at the same time, more GOP members could call for changes to the nation's war policies after the Baker panel releases its results.

Democrats long have urged a change in Iraq policy. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the leading Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said there is "no military solution to this conflict" and the United States must pressure Iraqis to take over their country.

Bush Reassures Iraqi That There Is No Timetable For Withdrawal (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 — President Bush reassured Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq on Monday that he would not set a timetable for withdrawal of American troops and would continue to support the prime minister, despite recent reports that military officials and some Republican lawmakers were dissatisfied with the Iraqi government's performance.

The White House also suggested that it would not necessarily accept the recommendations of an independent commission reviewing Iraq policy. "We're not going to outsource the business of handling the war in Iraq," said Mr. Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow.

The president's remarks to Mr. Maliki came during a 15-minute telephone conversation, Mr. Snow said. During the call, initiated by Mr. Bush, Mr. Maliki expressed concern about news reports that there would be an attempt to replace him if he was unable to assert control over Iraq within two months, Mr. Snow said.

"There was a rumor that there were going to be attempts to replace him if certain things don't happen in two months," Mr. Snow said. "And the president said, the rumors are not true; we support you."

Mr. Maliki, he said, "assured the president that he is and will continue making tough decisions" to get rid of the militias that are responsible for sectarian violence in Iraq.

The exchange reflects the delicate line the White House is walking as it tries to shore up the Maliki government while reassuring an increasingly skittish American public that it remains flexible in its approach to the war.

Senior American military officials have been warning that time is growing short for Iraq to root out militias inside and outside the government. Leading Republicans on Capitol Hill, including Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, have also been expressing concern.

Mr. Warner said recently that he thought Iraq was "drifting sideways," and Mr. Hagel said Sunday that he agreed. Mr. Snow, asked Monday if the president was confident that the Maliki government was doing everything in its power to get rid of the militias, was equivocal.

"There is more to be done," Mr. Snow said. "There has to be more to be done. The violence is absolutely unacceptable."

A commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III is reviewing the president's Iraq policy, and Mr. Baker has indicated that he will recommend a change in course. The panel's findings are due after the election, and Mr. Bush has said he looks forward to them, although Mr. Snow seemed to push back against the idea that the White House would adopt the recommendations.

"We'll have to see what they say," he said. "We will read it with interest."

The panel has not yet reached any conclusions, its co-chairman, Lee Hamilton, said in an interview on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0082090

Recent news reports have suggested the panel is weighing two options. One would emphasize stability in Iraq, while abandoning the goal of establishing democracy there; the other emphasizes a phased withdrawal of soldiers.

"We have literally scores of recommendations in front of us, and those are only two," Mr. Hamilton said. Asked about Mr. Snow's remarks, he said, "If he said that they're going to take a close look at it, we're pleased with that."

Can You Tell A Sunni From A Shiite? (NYT)

By Jeff Stein

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

Washington

FOR the past several months, I've been wrapping up lengthy interviews with Washington counterterrorism officials with a fundamental question: "Do you know the difference between a Sunni and a Shiite?"

A "gotcha" question? Perhaps. But if knowing your enemy is the most basic rule of war, I don't think it's out of bounds. And as I quickly explain to my subjects, I'm not looking for theological explanations, just the basics: Who's on what side today, and what does each want?

After all, wouldn't British counterterrorism officials responsible for Northern Ireland know the difference between Catholics and Protestants? In a remotely similar but far more lethal vein, the 1,400-year Sunni-Shiite rivalry is playing out in the streets of Baghdad, raising the specter of a breakup of Iraq into antagonistic states, one backed by Shiite Iran and the other by Saudi Arabia and other Sunni states.

A complete collapse in Iraq could provide a haven for Al Qaeda operatives within striking distance of Israel, even Europe. And the nature of the threat from Iran, a potential nuclear power with protégés in the Gulf states, northern Saudi Arabia, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, is entirely different from that of Al Qaeda. It seems silly to have to argue that officials responsible for counterterrorism should be able to recognize opportunities for pitting these rivals against each other.

But so far, most American officials I've interviewed don't have a clue. That includes not just intelligence and law enforcement officials, but also members of Congress who have important roles overseeing our spy agencies. How can they do their jobs without knowing the basics?

My curiosity about our policymakers' grasp of Islam's two major branches was piqued in 2005, when Jon Stewart and other TV comedians made hash out of depositions, taken in a whistleblower case, in which top F.B.I. officials drew blanks when asked basic questions about Islam. One of the bemused officials was Gary Bald, then the bureau's counterterrorism chief. Such expertise, Mr. Bald maintained, wasn't as important as being a good manager.

A few months later, I asked the F.B.I.'s spokesman, John Miller, about Mr. Bald's comments. "A leader needs to drive the organization forward," Mr. Miller told me. "If he is the executive in a counterterrorism operation in the post-9/11 world, he does not need to memorize the collected statements of Osama bin Laden, or be able to read Urdu to be effective. ... Playing 'Islamic Trivial Pursuit' was a cheap shot for the lawyers and a cheaper shot for the journalist. It's just a gimmick."

Of course, I hadn't asked about reading Urdu or Mr. bin Laden's writings.

A few weeks ago, I took the F.B.I.'s temperature again. At the end of a long interview, I asked Willie Hulon, chief of the bureau's new national security branch, whether he thought that it was important for a man in his position to know the difference between Sunnis and Shiites. "Yes, sure, it's right to know the difference," he said. "It's important to know who your targets are."

That was a big advance over 2005. So next I asked him if he could tell me the difference. He was flummoxed. "The basics goes back to their beliefs and who they were following," he said. "And the conflicts between the Sunnis and the Shia and the difference between who they were following."

O.K., I asked, trying to help, what about today? Which one is Iran — Sunni or Shiite? He thought for a second. "Iran and Hezbollah," I prompted. "Which are they?"

He took a stab: "Sunni."

Wrong.

Al Qaeda? "Sunni."

Right.

AND to his credit, Mr. Hulon, a distinguished agent who is up nights worrying about Al Qaeda while we safely sleep, did at least know that the vicious struggle between Islam's Abel and Cain was driving Iraq into civil war. But then we pay him to know things like that, the same as some members of Congress.

Take Representative Terry Everett, a seven-term Alabama Republican who is vice chairman of the House intelligence subcommittee on technical and tactical intelligence.

"Do you know the difference between a Sunni and a Shiite?" I asked him a few weeks ago.

DOJ_NMG_0082091

Mr. Everett responded with a low chuckle. He thought for a moment: "One's in one location, another's in another location. No, to be honest with you, I don't know. I thought it was differences in their religion, different families or something."

To his credit, he asked me to explain the differences. I told him briefly about the schism that developed after the death of the Prophet Muhammad, and how Iraq and Iran are majority Shiite nations while the rest of the Muslim world is mostly Sunni. "Now that you've explained it to me," he replied, "what occurs to me is that it makes what we're doing over there extremely difficult, not only in Iraq but that whole area."

Representative Jo Ann Davis, a Virginia Republican who heads a House intelligence subcommittee charged with overseeing the C.I.A.'s performance in recruiting Islamic spies and analyzing information, was similarly dumbfounded when I asked her if she knew the difference between Sunnis and Shiites.

"Do I?" she asked me. A look of concentration came over her face. "You know, I should." She took a stab at it: "It's a difference in their fundamental religious beliefs. The Sunni are more radical than the Shia. Or vice versa. But I think it's the Sunnis who're more radical than the Shia."

Did she know which branch Al Qaeda's leaders follow?

"Al Qaeda is the one that's most radical, so I think they're Sunni," she replied. "I may be wrong, but I think that's right."

Did she think that it was important, I asked, for members of Congress charged with oversight of the intelligence agencies, to know the answer to such questions, so they can cut through officials' puffery when they came up to the Hill?

"Oh, I think it's very important," said Ms. Davis, "because Al Qaeda's whole reason for being is based on their beliefs. And you've got to understand, and to know your enemy."

It's not all so grimly humorous. Some agency officials and members of Congress have easily handled my "gotcha" question. But as I keep asking it around Capitol Hill and the agencies, I get more and more blank stares. Too many officials in charge of the war on terrorism just don't care to learn much, if anything, about the enemy we're fighting. And that's enough to keep anybody up at night.

Ongoing Iraqi Violence Claims New Lives (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

BAGHDAD — Fresh waves of killing continued to engulf the Iraqi capital and surrounding areas today, with at least 26 mutilated bodies discovered, a car bomb explosion near a bank killing eight people and wounding 47 and violence that left at least six others dead.

At least five U.S. military personnel died in combat Sunday, raising to at least 56 the number of American soldiers, Marines and airmen killed during the first 15 days of the month.

Also today, the court trying Saddam Hussein for an alleged campaign of vengeance against a Shiite Muslim village in the 1980s will hold a Nov. 5 session at which a verdict will be delivered for the former Iraqi president and seven other defendants.

"Most likely they will reach a verdict after finishing checking some minor things," said Jaafar Mousawi, the lead prosecutor in the case.

Gunfire and explosions shook much of the capital throughout the day as a whirling sandstorm added to the gloom.

Three bystanders were killed when a gun battle erupted between Iraqi soldiers and suspected insurgents in central Baghdad. Five civilians and two soldiers were also injured in the fighting, quelled when U.S., forces moved into the area.

One Iraqi soldier was killed in a ferocious 30-minute gun battle that erupted when U.S. and Iraqi troops confronted suspected insurgents in northwestern Baghdad.

Insurgents opened fire on security guards driving through agricultural fields back from an electricity substation on capital's southern outskirts, killing one and injuring four.

Five roadside bombs targeting Iraqi police and soldiers in and around Baghdad today killed one and injured 18.

One U.S. soldier was killed in Baghdad on Sunday night when his vehicle struck a roadside bomb. Earlier, two U.S. soldiers attached to the 3rd Brigade of the 25th Infantry Division were killed and two wounded in fighting near the northern city of Kirkuk. Two Marines were also killed in combat earlier in western Iraq.

At least 12 U.S. military personnel were killed in hostile incidents over the weekend.

U.S. and Iraqi forces continued efforts to restore order in and around Balad, a mostly Shiite agricultural hub surrounded by Sunni tribesmen. Scores of Iraqis were killed this weekend in an outburst of sectarian violence in the town 50 miles north of Baghdad.

On Saturday, Shiite gunmen with alleged ties to militia groups hunted down and shot dead Sunni Arab men in the city, avenging a group of Shiite farmers killed and beheaded earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0082092

Ministry of Interior spokesman Abdul-Kareem Khalaf blamed the latest outburst of violence on insurgents hitting random targets and "seeking to incur as much damage and death as possible." But the rhythms of the ongoing violence coincide with the country's political impasse.

Once-dominant Sunni Arabs are waging an insurgency against the Shiite and Kurdish-dominated government as well as its U.S. backer. Ascendant Shiites struggle to enforce their will politically as well as through violent death squads that kill dozens of innocent Sunnis every night.

A highly publicized Oct. 21 conference on national reconciliation, aimed at reducing tensions between the country's communities, was abruptly delayed until further notice Sunday. Saad Muttalibi, an advisor to the Ministry of State for Dialogue and Reconciliation, cited "technicalities" for the delay but acknowledged that the country's factions appear to be moving in the direction opposite to discussion and compromise.

"It doesn't mean we have to give up," he said in an interview. "The cost of reconciliation is very high. Some corners are afraid of it. The road ahead is very long."

Families Flee Iraqi River Towns On 4th Day Of Sectarian Warfare (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Muhanned Saif Aldin, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 16 -- Families fled in search of safety Monday as open warfare raged for a fourth day between Shiite militias and armed Sunni men in Tigris River towns north of Baghdad. Militias allied with Iraq's Shiite-led government held sway in Balad city, forcing out Sunni families and leaving the bodies of slain Sunni men to rot in the streets, according to police, residents and hospital officials.

The Iraqi government deployed still more reinforcements to try to calm the embattled towns and hold open the main roads, Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani said in the capital. But local police officers accused Shiite-dominated government police forces of working alongside Shiite militias in executing Sunnis and appealed for more help.

The escalating violence in the Tigris River towns in many ways serves as a microcosm of the daily violence roiling Iraq. Sectarian attacks have increased more than tenfold since the start of the year and now claim more than 100 victims a day, according to the Iraqi government.

The violence in Balad was unusual because of the sustained deployment of the militias on the streets, and the killing seemed particularly vicious. Balad was "under siege from all sides," police 1st Lt. Bassim Hamdi said by telephone from the city. "We demand that leaders from both sides intervene to stop the bloodshed. Because if this goes on, it will explode sectarian violence all over Iraq."

As the carnage mounted, President Bush called Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to reassure the Iraqi leader of his support and assure him he was under no time pressure from the United States to curb sectarian violence.

Bush told Maliki he had no plans to pull out U.S. troops and advised him to ignore rumors that Washington intended to impose a two-month deadline for Iraq to rein in the violence, White House spokesman Tony Snow said in Washington.

Bush assured the Iraqi leader, " 'Don't worry, you still have our full support,' " Snow said.

American officials and Iraqis have expressed increasing frustration with inaction by Maliki, who this week indefinitely postponed measures both to disband militias and convene a reconciliation conference meant to close the widening rift between Iraq's Shiite majority and Sunni minority.

Maliki has bridled at growing U.S. pressure to act against the illegal private armies, which include armed wings of the two biggest parties in his governing alliance of Shiite religious parties. The prime minister issued a statement late Monday stressing that government forces have already confronted militias in some provinces. His administration "is determined to confront the armed groups with all political and military means," he said.

Although Baghdad has been the nexus of the Shiite-Sunni struggle for months, sectarian killing exploded in river towns about 50 miles to the north of the capital Friday after suspected Sunni insurgents kidnapped and beheaded 17 Shiite laborers from date palm groves in the predominantly Sunni hamlet of Duluiyah, across the river from Balad.

Shiite elders of Balad said they called in the Baghdad militias of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr -- whose bloc is the largest in Iraq's Shiite-led government -- to take revenge.

Most of the victims since then have been Sunni men in Duluiyah and neighboring Sunni towns. Hasanein al-Badawi, a physician at Balad's hospital, said almost all had been shot and some had been tortured with electric drills.

The total number of victims received by Balad's hospital morgue held steady at 80 on Monday, Badawi said. Members of Sadr's Mahdi Army militia were blocking Sunni families from picking up more of their dead from the streets, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082093

The American military had recorded 57 killings in Balad, Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a military spokesman, said in Baghdad.

On Monday, Sunni families fleeing Balad described Shiite militias going door-to-door, giving people two hours to clear out.

A police officer in Duluiyah, Capt. Qaid al-Azawi, accused American forces of standing by in Balad while militiamen in police cars and police uniforms slaughtered Sunnis. Americans did act, however, in Duluiyah, arresting three local police officers whom they suspected of fighting with insurgents against the militias, Azawi said.

Garver, the spokesman in Baghdad, said he had no information on these specific reports. "We're providing assistance where we see criminal behavior, such as violence and killing," he said.

Police officials said Balad had calmed by nightfall with the deployment of large numbers of Iraqi army troops, who are seen as more neutral than forces of the Shiite-dominated police.

Meanwhile, clashes between Iraqi and foreign members of al-Qaeda in Iraq signaled a possible split in the foreign-led Sunni insurgent group over its leaders' declaration Sunday of a separate, Sunni-led Islamic emirate in nine provinces of Iraq.

The hospital in Ramadi, a western city badly battered by years of fighting between American forces and Sunni insurgents, by late Monday had received the bodies of 13 insurgents killed in the internal clashes, including a top local leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, according to Saad Naji, a physician.

A mid-ranking Iraqi official of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Ma'an al-Ani, said scores of Iraqi members of Iraq's most feared Sunni insurgent group had broken away, spurred by unhappiness at Sunday's declaration. Creation of a separate Sunni state would only "tear the country apart . . . and divert from the main goal, which is getting Americans out," Ani said.

In other violence Monday, 11 people were killed when assailants used car bombs to attack the funeral of a Shiite policeman in Baghdad, the Interior Ministry said.

Two American soldiers were killed in fighting north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said, bringing to 12 the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq since Friday, an unusually high toll. Attacks have killed more than 50 American troops in October, putting the month on track to be one of the bloodiest of the war for U.S. forces.

Execution-style shootings claim the great majority of victims in Baghdad, where scores of bodies are dumped each day. Monday's victims included the brother of the chief prosecutor in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial, who was shot to death in front of his wife at his home.

Aldin reported from Tikrit. Special correspondents Saad al-Izzi and Naseer Nouri in Baghdad, Saad Sarhan in Najaf and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Iraqis Ask Why U.S. Forces Didn't Intervene In Balad (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 16 — American military units joined with Iraqi forces on Monday in maintaining a fragile peace between Sunni and Shiite communities in Balad, a rural town north of the capital where an explosion of sectarian violence over the weekend left dozens dead.

In the aftermath of the reprisals, some residents of Balad asked why American troops had not intervened when the killings began in earnest on Saturday. One of the largest American military bases in Iraq, Camp Anaconda, which includes a sprawling air base that serves as the logistical hub of the war, is nearby.

"People are bewildered because of the weak response by the Americans," said one Balad resident who asked not to be identified for fear of reprisals. "They used to patrol the city every day, but when the violence started, we didn't see any sign of them."

The situation in Balad, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, appears, in stark form, to show the dilemma for American military commanders at a time when they are hastening the transfer of wide areas of the country to Iraqi forces. They are also insisting that those troops take the lead in quelling violence, leaving American forces to step in only when asked.

It also highlighted yet again the powerlessness of the Iraqi forces to stand in the way of such sectarian violence.

Killings also continued to besiege the capital on Monday with the discovery of at least 64 bodies across the city, and two car bomb attacks that appeared to kill 22 people. The American military, meanwhile, said Monday that five American service members were killed Sunday, bringing the toll this month to 58. One soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdad; two died in Kirkuk Province and two in Salahuddin Province.

Sectarian violence and retribution killings of the kind that unfolded in Balad over the weekend are the purview of the Interior Ministry, in charge of Iraq's police forces, and the Iraqi government in general, said Lt. Col. Michael Donnelly, a spokesman for the Army's Fourth Infantry Division, adding that responsibility for the Balad area was transferred from American military units to the Fourth Iraqi Army about a month ago.

DOJ_NMG_0082094

The job of the United States military, he said, is to work "by, through and with" its Iraqi counterparts "to build further capacity to reduce the violence, and bring about stability."

American military commanders reviewing what happened over the weekend concluded that the situation in Balad was best dealt with by the Iraqi armed forces, a senior American military official said.

The senior officer, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly on the subject, said that American commanders viewed the upheaval in Balad as a new test for the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who has come under American pressure to crack down on militias that have been responsible for much of the killing in the country.

The American military eventually provided what Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman, described as "quick reaction force assistance" to the Iraqi Army and the police in the area.

"We were waiting for a request from the Iraqi government," he said.

It was unclear, however, when that request came. The sectarian killings began on Friday in the neighboring town of Dhuluiya, where the decapitated bodies of 14 Shiite workers from Balad were found. While the center of Balad is mostly Shiite, its outskirts and the neighboring area, including Dhuluiya, are overwhelmingly Sunni.

By the following day, groups of Shiite gunmen from Balad were setting up checkpoints and hunting down and killing dozens of Sunni Arab residents, the authorities said.

Overall, the bodies of some 31 Sunni Arab residents of the area were found during the weekend, said Qasim al-Qaisi, the director of Balad Hospital. Most of the killings took place on Saturday, the authorities said.

American troops did not arrive until late Sunday afternoon, taking up positions in the town center and on its outskirts, said Hamad al-Qaisi, governor of Salahuddin Province. By then, a curfew had been imposed on the town and the situation had mostly stabilized.

On Monday mortar rounds landed on Balad, injuring five civilians, a police official said. Otherwise, the town was mostly quiet. Shiite clerics broadcast appeals over loudspeakers for calm on Monday, urging residents not to attack their Sunni neighbors, residents said. The leader of one mosque even urged any Sunnis harmed in any attacks to visit the mosque and register a complaint, said a resident who asked not to be identified.

A meeting between the provincial governor, security officials, American commanders and tribal sheiks in Balad and Dhuluiya will be held Wednesday to discuss ways to defuse tensions in the area, a provincial government official said.

At least 60 Sunni families have fled Balad for neighboring Dhuluiya, said Adel al-Smaidaei, a representative of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's leading Sunni political party.

The burst of violence in Balad, which had previously only dealt with relatively low levels of sectarian tension, came as American troops were continuing the largest series of sweeps in the nation's capital since the invasion, in an attempt to stop sectarian bloodshed. Over the past year, American forces had gradually withdrawn from large areas of the capital, leaving security in the hands of the Iraqi Army and the police.

That policy, however, was followed by unhindered sectarian bloodletting, particularly after a bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra in February, which prompted the American military command to move troops back to the capital.

The police in Baghdad reported the discovery of the 64 bodies, all of which appeared to have been shot at close range and showed signs of torture. In the largely Shiite neighborhood of Ur, two car bombs, one of which was aimed at a large Shiite funeral gathering, exploded almost simultaneously Monday evening, an Interior Ministry official said. The other bomb went off nearby, about 200 meters from a busy market.

At least 22 people were killed and 31 people wounded in the blasts, said Qasim al-Sweidi, an official at Imam Ali Hospital in nearby Sadr City, where the victims were taken.

Earlier in the day, a car bomb exploded in Suwayra, a neighborhood located southeast of Baghdad, killing 10 people and wounding 15 others, the official said.

The day's toll in Baghdad included another killing, at least the 12th of its kind, of a victim linked to the court trying Saddam Hussein and his associates. Court officials said that the older brother of Munkith al-Faroun, chief prosecutor in the so-called Anfal trial that began in Baghdad in August, was shot dead by unknown assailants at his home in the western Baghdad suburb of Jamaa.

The officials said the brother, Emad al-Faroun, who is a legal adviser to Ahmad Chalabi, one of the most prominent Iraqi politicians in the period since the overthrow of Mr. Hussein, was killed by men who attacked him in the carport of his home. His wife and son, also shot in the attack, survived, the officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0082095

On Monday, Mr. Hussein's lawyers made public a letter they said they had been given by Mr. Hussein during a weekend consultation at Camp Cropper, the American-run detention center near the Baghdad airport, where he has been held during the trials.

Mr. Hussein used the letter to call on Iraqis to end the current wave of sectarian bloodletting and to focus attacks instead on "occupiers from far away who crossed the Atlantic Ocean under the inspiration of Zionism." He added, "You should remember that your goal is to liberate your country from the invader's forces and their followers, and that there should be no other issues to distract you from this goal."

Iraq's Christians Flee As Extremist Threat Worsens (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 16 — The blackened shells of five cars still sit in front of the Church of the Virgin Mary here, stark reminders of a bomb blast that killed two people after a recent Sunday Mass.

In the northern city of Mosul, a priest from the Syriac Orthodox Church was kidnapped last week. His church complied with his captors' demands and put up posters denouncing recent comments made by the pope about Islam, but he was killed anyway. The police found his beheaded body on Wednesday.

Muslim fury over Pope Benedict XVI's public reflections on Islam in Germany a month ago — when he quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as calling Islam "evil and inhuman" — has subsided elsewhere, but repercussions continue to reverberate in Iraq, bringing a new level of threat to an already shrinking Christian population.

Several extremist groups threatened to kill all Christians unless the pope apologized. Sunni and Shiite clerics united in the condemnation, calling the comments an insult to Islam and the Prophet Muhammad. In Baghdad, many churches canceled services after receiving threats. Some have not met since.

"After the pope's statement, people began to fear much more than before," said the Rev. Zayya Edward Khossaba, the pastor of the Church of the Virgin Mary. "The actions by fanatics have increased against Christians."

Christianity took root here near the dawn of the faith 2,000 years ago, making Iraq home to one of the world's oldest Christian communities. The country is rich in biblical significance: scholars believe the Garden of Eden described in Genesis was in Iraq; Abraham came from Ur of the Chaldees, a city in Iraq; the city of Nineveh that the prophet Jonah visited after being spit out by a giant fish was in Iraq.

Both Chaldean Catholics and Assyrian Christians, the country's largest Christian sects, still pray in Aramaic, the language of Jesus.

They have long been a tiny minority amid a sea of Islamic faith. But under Saddam Hussein, Iraq's million or so Christians for the most part coexisted peacefully with Muslims, both the dominant Sunnis and the majority Shiites.

But since Mr. Hussein's ouster, their status here has become increasingly uncertain, first because many Muslim Iraqis framed the American-led invasion as a modern crusade against Islam, and second because Christians traditionally run the country's liquor stories, anathema to many religious Muslims.

Over the past three and a half years, Christians have been subjected to a steady stream of church bombings, assassinations, kidnappings and threatening letters slipped under their doors.

Estimates of the resulting Christian exodus vary from the tens of thousands to more than 100,000, with most heading for Syria, Jordan and Turkey.

The number of Christians who remain is also uncertain. The last Iraqi census, in 1987, counted 1.4 million Christians, but many left during the 1990's when sanctions squeezed the country. Yonadam Kanna, the lone Christian member of the Iraqi Parliament, estimated the current Christian population at roughly 800,000, or about 3 percent of the population. A Chaldean Catholic auxiliary bishop, Andreos Abouna, told a British charity over the summer that there were just 600,000 Christians left, according to the Catholic News Service.

At the Church of the Virgin Mary, Father Khossaba showed a visitor the baptism forms for parishioners leaving the country who need proof of their religious affiliation for visas. Some weeks he has filled out 50 of the forms, he said, and some weeks more.

Attendance on Sundays has dwindled to four dozen or so, he said; it used to be more than 500 on average, and on Easter Sundays, before the collapse of the Hussein government, more than 1,500. Not all the missing members have left, of course; some simply stay at home on Sundays because of fears for their safety.

DOJ_NMG_0082096

Many Christians have relocated, changing neighborhoods or even cities. About a thousand Christian families, from Mosul, Baghdad, Basra and elsewhere, have taken refuge in Ain Kawa, a small town outside the Kurdish city of Erbil, which has become an oasis for Christians, said the Rev. Yusuf Sabri, a priest at St. Joseph's Chaldean Catholic Church there.

A Christian man with Baghdad license plates on his car who asked not to be identified said he had just arrived in Ain Kawa to inquire about moving there. A leaflet had been left at his home demanding he leave in three days. It bore the signature of Muhammad's Army, a Sunni insurgent group.

"They regarded me as an agent for the crusaders," he said.

Asaad Aziz, a 42-year-old Chaldean Catholic, is one of those trying to leave the country. After the ouster of Mr. Hussein, he bought a liquor store in a mostly Shiite neighborhood. Nine days after he opened, the store was bombed. Mr. Aziz was hospitalized for a month.

The employees rebuilt the store. But several months later, a note slipped under the door gave Mr. Aziz 48 hours to close.

"Otherwise, you will blame yourself," it said.

Mr. Aziz closed. But after an unsuccessful stint at a friend's printing company, he returned to the business he knew best, opening a liquor store in a mostly Christian neighborhood. Last month, a gunman riddled the new storefront with bullets as Mr. Aziz cowered in a back room.

He told another story: the teenage daughter of another Christian family he knows was kidnapped recently. The captors initially demanded a ransom, but later sarcastically said the pope was the only one who could release her. She was eventually killed.

"When the pope gave his statement, it destroyed any last hope that we had here," said Mr. Aziz, who has forbidden his daughters, one in high school and the other in college, to return to school.

He recently went to the Turkish Embassy to inquire about a visa but was rebuffed. At this point, he said, he will go anywhere.

"We cannot practice our rituals and we cannot bring food home to our families," he said. "That's why I want to leave the country."

Mosul, near the historic heart of Christianity in Iraq, has also become increasingly dangerous. The recently murdered priest, the Rev. Boulos Iskander Behnam, is just the latest member of the Christian community to be kidnapped or killed there.

Conditions have been especially bleak for Christians in Basra, the southern city that is dominated by radical Shiite militias. Christian women there often wear Muslim head scarves to avoid harassment from religious zealots trying to impose a strict Islamic dress code. After the pope's statement, an angry crowd burned an effigy of him.

In Baghdad, Juliet Yusef attends St. George's, the country's lone Anglican church. She, too, now wears a head scarf anytime she ventures outside her neighborhood. "I am afraid of being attacked," she said.

Dora, a neighborhood in southern Baghdad that was once heavily populated by Christians and has been plagued by sectarian violence, has now been mostly emptied of them. Christians were singled out there by insurgents who accused them of being friendly with the occupying Americans.

"They are Christian, we are Christian," said one holdout, who asked to be identified only by her first name, Suzan. "They think most likely we know each other well."

Two priests were kidnapped over the summer in Dora, although both were released, one after nearly a month.

Oddly, before the pope's comments, as sectarian violence has escalated in Baghdad in the past year, some said the situation might have actually improved for Christians as Muslim militants turned their attention on one another.

Canon Andrew White, the Anglican vicar of Baghdad, who lives in Britain but visits Iraq frequently, said his driver was kidnapped recently but was promptly released after his Sunni Arab captors discovered he was a Christian. He said his captors apologized by saying, "We thought he was Shiite."

"It must be the only occasion when being a Christian actually helped in this country," he said.

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney To Join Gibson Dunn (WSJ)

By Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

In the latest example of a government prosecutor jumping to a high-paying law firm, Debra Wong Yang, the U.S. Attorney in Los Angeles, has resigned her post and will join Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher as a partner at the beginning of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0082097

During Ms. Yang's tenure, her office has spearheaded several high-profile corporate-crime cases, including the indictment earlier this year of law firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, which is accused of paying individuals to file suits. Milberg Weiss has denied the allegations and vowed to fight the charges.

Ms. Yang, 47 years old, serves on the Justice Department's Corporate Fraud Task Force, an interagency group created in July 2002 amid white-collar scandals.

Prior to her appointment by President Bush in 2002, Ms. Yang was a California state judge. Before that she was an assistant U.S. attorney. A 1985 graduate of Boston College Law School, she also worked in private practice.

At Gibson Dunn, which has more than 800 lawyers, she will be based in the firm's Los Angeles office and co-chair its "crisis-management" group along with Theodore Olson, the former solicitor general, and Randy Mastro, a former federal prosecutor and deputy to former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani. Members of that group are currently handling internal investigations for companies ensnared by the stock-options backdating scandal.

Write to Peter Lattman at peter.lattman@wsj.com1

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

KLA-Tencor Officials Depart Over Options Dating (WSJ)

By Robert Tomsho And James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

Two senior employees at a Silicon Valley company lost their jobs yesterday, and another technology company said that former top executives misled its board as the stock-options scandal continued to gain traction.

In the latest personnel shakeups, Stuart J. Nichols, general counsel of KLA-Tencor Corp., and Kenneth L. Schroeder, a former chief executive who had remained with the company in an advisory role, left following an internal probe that found backdating of options at the company.

KLA-Tencor, of San Jose, Calif., a big semiconductor-equipment maker, said yesterday it "terminated" all aspects of its employment relationship with Mr. Schroeder, who was chief executive from 1999 to 2005. Mr. Nichols resigned.

The company also said it was canceling all outstanding backdated stock options held by Mr. Schroeder and repricing all backdated options held by Mr. Nichols. Shirli Fabbri Weiss, a lawyer for Mr. Schroeder, said she didn't believe the company had a basis to take such action and that her client hadn't been allowed to respond to evidence against him. Mr. Nichols couldn't be reached for comment.

The company said it expects restatements because of the backdating to result in charges of less than $400 million.

Separately, another San Jose company, Altera Corp., said an internal investigation found its former CEO and its former general counsel repeatedly misled its board's compensation committee about backdating stock options for themselves and other executives.

As a result of faulty accounting, the chip maker said it will restate its earnings downward by $35.2 million from 1996 to 2005.

More than 100 companies are under investigation for options backdating, and many of them are still conducting internal probes. So far, more than 30 executives and directors have lost their jobs. Sunday, UnitedHealth Group Inc. said its chief executive, William McGuire, would leave the giant health insurer by Dec. 1.

Backdating amounts to pretending that an option was granted earlier than it actually was, at a beneficial time when the share was trading at a low price. As options entitle their recipients to profit from a rise in price, claiming the grant occurred at a time of low prices could give the recipient a running start on an extra profit.

Altera said that between 1996 and 2000 it granted stock options every December to senior managers, including Rodney Smith, its former chief executive, and C. Wendell Bergere, its former general counsel. The company said that while Mr. Smith had the authority to set the grant date, the compensation committee intended for it to coincide with the completion of an annual, end-of-year performance-review process.

Instead, Altera said, Mr. Smith and Mr. Bergere repeatedly falsely claimed as the options' grant date the particular day on which the stock hit its lowest closing price of December. The company said that at some point after the review process, Mr. Bergere prepared minutes that "did not reflect the grant date intended by the compensation committee but rather falsely indicated that the actual grant date" was the beneficial day that he and Mr. Smith selected.

DOJ_NMG_0082098

An Altera spokeswoman declined to comment beyond the company's written statement. Mr. Smith's attorney, William Kimball, declined to comment. Mr. Bergere's attorney, Henry Asbill, called the company's accusations "unfair," given that Altera hasn't let him review related documents and that his client has dementia.

Mr. Smith retired as Altera's chief executive in 2000 and as its chairman in 2003. Mr. Bergere retired from the company in 2001.

Altera also said yesterday that Chief Financial Officer Nathan Sarkisian retired, effective immediately. The company had previously said Mr. Sarkisian planned to retire by the end of the year, and it wasn't clear whether the departure was connected to the options troubles. A company spokeswoman declined to address the matter.

Mr. Sarkisian didn't return a call seeking comment.

KLA-Tencor's probe was touched off by a Wall Street Journal article in May that reported on a pattern of extraordinarily well-timed stock-option grants to several companies' top officials, including KLA-Tencor Chairman Ken Levy. In all, Mr. Levy received 10 grants from KLA-Tencor and its predecessor company from 1994 to 2001 -- all preceding quick runups in the share price; an analysis by The Wall Street Journal found the probability that that pattern occurred merely by chance was around one in 20 million.

Mr. Levy couldn't be reached for comment.

The company said yesterday the board has concluded that current members of management weren't involved in any improper options practices. A KLA-Tencor spokeswoman declined to comment beyond the press release.

KLA-Tencor Finds More Option Costs; Counsel Resigns (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Ian King

Bloomberg, October 17, 2006

Oct. 16 (Bloomberg) -- KLA-Tencor Corp., a maker of semiconductor-testing equipment, said it found $400 million in costs related to backdated company stock options and canceled grants to former Chief Executive Officer Kenneth Schroeder.

General Counsel Stuart J. Nichols resigned and KLA-Tencor will reprice options given to him and Chief Operating Officer John Kispert, the San Jose, California-based company said today in a statement. Current management, including Kispert, had no involvement in the options practices, the company said.

``This clears up whether there has to be a departure of the top management," said Mark Bachman, a Portland-based analyst for Pacific Crest Securities, who rates the stock ``market perform" and doesn't own it. ``It's going to be a positive for the stock."

KLA-Tencor is among more than 140 companies to disclose internal or federal investigations of stock-option practices to determine if grant dates were manipulated to enrich employees. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are looking for evidence that companies broke securities or tax laws by backdating grants to coincide with days when share prices were low.

They're also examining grants that were made in advance of news that drove up company stock prices, a practice known as spring-loading.

Shares of KLA-Tencor rose 41 cents to $49.95 in extending trading after the announcement. They gained 73 cents to $49.54 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading and are little changed this year.

Eight CEOs

KLA-Tencor said it terminated ``all aspects of its employment relationship" with Schroeder, who ran the company from 1999 to 2005.

The company said in September it would restate results from 1997 to 2002 after a special committee found incorrect dates were used in granting stock options.

All told, more than 30 executives, including eight CEOs, have lost their jobs as companies have come under scrutiny for manipulating stock options to enrich employees. Former executives at two companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc., face criminal charges.

UnitedHealth Group Inc., the biggest U.S. health insurer, said yesterday CEO William McGuire will step down after an independent inquiry found evidence that company options were backdated over the past 12 years.

On Oct. 11, McAfee Inc. forced Chief Executive Officer George Samenuk to retire and fired President Kevin Weiss. Cnet Networks Inc., also said CEO Shelby Bonnie and two other executives stepped down after an internal probe found some backdated stock-option grants.

KLA Tencor Braces For $400 Million Blow For Mishandled Options (AP)

By Michael Liedtke

AP, October 17, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - KLA Tencor Corp.'s mishandling of stock options will cost the company up to $400 million - a blow that provoked the supplier of chip.m.aking equipment to cancel the options of its former chief executive.

With Monday's announcement, San Jose-based KLA joins a lengthening list of companies facing up to the consequences of stock option chicanery that went undetected for years.

The repercussions are erasing a substantial chunk of past profits and spurring efforts to clean out executive suites and boardrooms as federal regulators and prosecutors explore possible civil penalties and criminal charges.

In the past week alone, more than a dozen executives and directors at six companies nationwide have either resigned or been fired. Four of those companies are based in Silicon Valley, which has become the focal point of the latest scandal to rock corporate America.

In its reckoning, KLA acknowledged company insiders improperly booked employee stock options from July 1997 through June 2002. KLA will absorb charges of up to $400 million to correct the bogus accounting caused by the shenanigans.

The company had previously reported profits totaling $710 million during that five-year period.

Although KLA didn't directly blame anyone for the misconduct, its actions pointed at its former CEO, Kenneth Schroeder, and top lawyer, Stuart Nichols. The company fired Schroeder, who had been a special adviser since his January retirement as CEO, and accepted the resignation of Nichols, who had been general counsel since 2000.

Schroeder, 60, was KLA's president and chief operating officer from 1991 to 1999 when he was promoted to CEO.

To penalize the former executives, KLA said it will cancel all of Schroeder's outstanding stock options and re-price Nichols' awards so he won't benefit unfairly. The company said it will also re-price the options of its chief operating officer, John Kispert, because he was chief financial officer during part of the time tainted by the mishandled stock options.

KLA absolved Kispert of any wrongdoing, as well as its current CEO, Richard Wallace, and current chief financial officer, Jeffrey Hall.

Both the Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Justice Department are still investigating KLA's past stock option practices. The federal government task force looking for evidence of stock option malfeasance is based in San Francisco.

Like most other companies entangled in the scandal, KLA's troubles revolve around a technique known as "backdating," which occurs when insiders look back in time for a low point in their company's stock price so the exercise, or "strike," price of the options could be set at that ebb.

If they aren't properly disclosed, backdated options can inflate corporate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

Silicon Valley has been caught in the eye of the stock option storm because of an entrepreneurial culture that embraced the rewards during the 1990s as the best way to get rich fast. That mind-set encouraged high-tech companies to pass out stock options like candy on Halloween.

All told, at least 135 companies nationwide have disclosed internal inquiries or government investigations into the accounting of past stock options.

Two More Companies Probing Stock-option Dates Announce Management Changes (MERCN)

By Scott D. Harris And Ryan Blitstein

The San Jose Mercury News, October 17, 2006

Two more prominent Silicon Valley companies that undertook internal investigations of stock-option back-dating announced management changes Monday.

KLA-Tencor, a San Jose builder of semiconductor manufacturing test instruments, and Altera, a leading maker of programmable semiconductor chips, announced the departure of key executives.

KLA-Tencor announced the immediate resignation of General Counsel Stuart J. Nichols and also said it was terminating ``all aspects of its employment relationship'' with former chief executive Kenneth L. Schroeder, who had become a consultant to the company.

Schroeder had been KLA-Tencor's CEO and a member of the board of directors from 1999 through 2005, and previously had been president and chief operating officer from 1991 to 1999. Nichols had been vice president and general counsel since 2000.

Altera said Monday the San Jose company would restate its earnings by $47.6 million after an investigation by board members found grants to former executives of back-dated stock options.

A special committee of independent board members of Altera found seven instances between 1996 and 2001 where recorded grant dates for stock options were different from the actual grant dates, the company said.

In a separate statement, Altera said Chief Financial Officer Nathan Sarkisian has retired. Previously, the company had said he planned to retire by the end of 2006.

More than 120 U.S. companies, about one-fourth of them in Silicon Valley, face investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department or are conducting internal reviews about options back-dating.

Back-dating involves changing the paperwork dates on stock option grants to a day when stock prices were lower, giving recipients a better chance for quick paper profits.

KLA-Tencor had previously announced a special committee of its board had found incorrect dates on stock options from July 1997 through June 2002 and that the company would re-state its financial statements to correct the accounting for back-dated options. KLA-Tencor declined to answer questions on Monday.

Stock Options Scandal Spreads (USAT)

By Matt Krantz And Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 17, 2006

The widening scandal over the alleged manipulation, or "backdating," of executive stock options has claimed another two heads at the top ranks of Corporate America.

Computer-chip maker Altera said Monday that chief financial officer Nathan Sarkisian left the company prematurely after a review of its options-granting practice pinpointed problems. The company said it will need to restate earnings to reflect $47.6 million in costs pertaining to options grants.

Separately, UnitedHealth said Sunday that CEO William McGuire would quit by Dec. 1 after the health insurer's examination of stock option backdating found potential wrongdoing. The study found McGuire received several option grants at yearly lows in the stock, which would be essentially impossible without manipulation.

Backdating is when firms don't disclose they gave executives the right to buy shares at a price lower than the market value when the options are issued. Stock options are designed to reward executives for smart moves after they get the grant. Options typically give executives the right to buy stock in the future at the price it was trading at when the options were issued.

But a growing scandal is finding some companies may have abused the rules. Rather than giving executives the right to buy stock at the current stock price, some companies may have given executives the right to buy stock based on a lower price on a previous date.

This practice, while not necessarily illegal, has the potential of inappropriately rewarding executives in a way not disclosed to shareholders. It understates how much a company paid its executives and affects taxes paid by the companies and the executives as well as what the company reports as earnings.

According to research compiled by Glass Lewis, 150 companies have said they're looking into the issue of whether some of their stock option grants were "backdated." Of those, 142 have opened internal investigations, 91 are being probed by the Securities and Exchange Commission and 55 by the Department of Justice.

As of Monday, the number of companies losing an executive or director in the scandal hit 23. Last week, McAfee CEO George Samenuk and CNet CEO Shelby Bonnie stepped down amid revelations of stock option problems.

Still, only two cases have resulted in criminal charges. Executives at Brocade Communications Systems, including former CEO Gregory Reyes, and Comverse Technology, including former CEO Jacob Alexander, are charged with improperly backdating.

But lawyers who have been following the issue predict that many more investigations will end up in criminal court. "We are only at an early stage of the public airing of this issue," says Mark Zauderer of Flemming Zulack Williamson Zauderer. "We are going to see a wave of cases involving backdating."

Zauderer says prosecutors will jump at the opportunity to bring criminal cases against corporate executives because these cases can be simple. "The issues involved, including changes of documents and misrepresentation of documents, are ones that juries can get their arms around easily. This is far easier to prosecute than Enron-type cases of accounting fraud."

But others say there won't be many criminal prosecutions. "A lot of these cases have terrific statute-of-limitations problems," says David Gourevitch, a Manhattan attorney and former state prosecutor. The statute of limitations for securities fraud, he notes, is five years. Most of the known instances of options "backdating," he points out, occurred in the late 1990s, during the tech bubble. Since 2001, tech stock prices have been low enough that there hasn't been a compelling reason to engage in backdating.

Meanwhile, investors aren't waiting for regulators to act. Currently, 65 companies face class-action shareholder lawsuits in the scandal, Glass Lewis says.

Backdating revelations aren't necessarily harmful to a company's stock. Take UnitedHealth, which is facing a lawsuit.

Monday, the stock fell $1.21 to $47.54, not a brutal loss given that the CEO is quitting. It is down 16% from March when The Wall Street Journal reported the company might be involved in backdating. But before that, the stock had already fallen 11% from its high in late 2005.

Such difficulty in isolating how much backdating issues have hurt stock prices has limited securities class-action lawsuits, Stanford Law School professor Joseph Grundfest said in a midyear assessment of shareholder litigation.

UnitedHealth Shares Down As CEO Departs (AP-Y)

By Joshua Freed, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

UnitedHealth Group Inc. will lose the CEO that built it into a health insurance powerhouse, but on Monday, Wall Street yawned. UnitedHealth shares traded in a narrow range and analysts said that they had expected the departure of Chairman and CEO William McGuire because of apparent stock options backdating.

With McGuire gone from the boardroom immediately, and set to retire as CEO by Dec. 1, the company's board promoted President Stephen Hemsley to CEO.

UnitedHealth shares slipped $1.21, or about 2.5 percent, to close at $47.54 on the New York Stock Exchange. They're off from a high of $64.61 in December, with much of that loss since questions about the company's stock options timing arose in March.

By making Hemsley CEO, UnitedHealth's directors signaled they would keep the company headed in the same direction, which has boosted UnitedHealth's stock price exponentially over the past 15 years and transformed it into the nation's second-largest health insurer. Hemsley has been at the company since 1997 and has run its day-to-day operations since 1999.

"The management uncertainty is largely resolved, and the worst case scenario (which would have been losing both Dr. McGuire and Mr. Hemsley) has been seemingly averted," Morgan Stanley analyst Christine Arnold wrote in a note to clients on Monday.

UnitedHealth said on Sunday that McGuire would step down after a company-commissioned report found widespread, systematic backdating was probably the explanation for his extraordinary good fortune in receiving stock options priced at the lowest possible point in eight different quarters.

Nothing in the report suggests that Hemsley was involved in any backdating, although the report concludes that he received stock options that were "likely backdated."

"I don't see how Hemsley can be separated from McGuire's actions over the last eight years," said Elizabeth Senko, an analyst at Williams Capital Group.

Referring to comic strip buddies known for getting into trouble together, she said: "They're really Mutt and Jeff. I can't believe that he was unaware of what was going on. Now where that falls under his legal responsibilities is another matter."

She said Hemsley has been the architect of many of UnitedHealth's successes since he joined the company — but he has never been the public face of a company the way he will be as CEO.

"Hemsley has for years been viewed as the individual most likely to ultimately succeed McGuire and is very highly respected," Bear Stearns analyst John Rex wrote in a note to clients. He added, "Some of the uncertainty surrounding the stock over the past months related to whether he would be tainted also, a factor that now appears resolved."

McGuire issued a statement saying he has worked closely with Hemsley for eight years.

"He has been a full partner in creating the vision of (UnitedHealth) and helping to achieve it," McGuire said.

UnitedHealth said it had turned over the report by the law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP to the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department. UnitedHealth disclosed in May that the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan were investigating its stock option grants.

SEC spokesman John Nester in Washington declined comment on the report or any other aspect of the matter.

At least 34 senior executives or directors, including nine CEOs, seven finance chiefs and seven general counsels have been fired or have stepped down at 17 companies as of Monday.

By now, investors seem to be somewhat inured to fallout from the options scandal, wrote Thomas Carroll, an analyst at Stifel Nicolaus & Co. He noted that about 100 companies are under SEC investigation and a recent study showing 2,000 may have backdated options.

___

On the Net:

UnitedHealth report: http://www.unitedhealthgroup.com/news/index_news.htm

DOJ_NMG_0082102

Old Options Still Haunt An Insurer (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

When Stephen J. Hemsley joined UnitedHealth Group after 23 years with the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, he was greeted with a grant of 400,000 stock options dated shortly after he started in June 1997.

There was just one thing: the options carried a stock price based on the market price five months earlier, when he did not yet work for UnitedHealth, one of the largest health insurers in the country. The difference in dates effectively created a built-in gain of $7.26 for every share.

Mr. Hemsley, who was chief financial officer at Andersen, said that he "didn't recall focusing at the time" that his options carried a discounted price and that there was not enough evidence to determine if the grant was actually backdated.

But the episode, recounted in a 14-page report into UnitedHealth's option practices, does raise some questions about Mr. Hemsley, who has taken the reins at UnitedHealth from Dr. William W. McGuire, who was forced to resign Sunday amid criticisms of how stock options were awarded.

"That obviously raises credibility issues," said Patrick McGurn, a corporate governance expert at Institutional Shareholder Services, a proxy advisory firm. "We are seeing a lot of modified Sergeant Schultz defenses here," he said, referring to a character in the 1960's television series "Hogan's Heroes." "They are not claiming to know nothing, but only part of what went on."

Mr. Hemsley has not been accused of any wrongdoing.

And the investigation by an outside law firm, Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, that was commissioned by UnitedHealth largely exonerates Mr. Hemsley, accepting his word that he never focused on his stock option grants and that had "he had little or no role" in the negotiation and authorization of a subsequent stock option megagrant.

UnitedHealth declined to make Mr. Hemsley available for comment. His lawyer did not return calls seeking comment.

In shaking up management, the board of UnitedHealth appeared to opt for a middle way between a clean sweep and retaining top executives who could continue the strong track record of Dr. McGuire. Mr. Hemsley is a skilled operations executive who helped execute Dr. McGuire's strategies. Working together, the two helped take UnitedHealth's stock price up more than 500 percent since mid-1997. And with lavish pay packages, both got very rich. Dr. McGuire banked more than $500 million during his 15 years as UnitedHealth's chief executive and currently holds more than $1.1 billion worth of stock options. Mr. Hemsley has taken home more than $135 million and likely holds more than $500 million worth of stock options.

As a result of the recent options problems, both voluntarily agreed to re-price all the options they were awarded from 1994 through 2002 to the annual high share price, eliminating any extra financial benefits from the improper grants. That move would take back only a tiny portion of the value of their outstanding options, but not affect the hundreds of millions of options each has already cashed out.

Dr. McGuire's option holdings will be reduced by about $100 million to a little over $1 billion, according to Brian Foley, an independent compensation consultant. Mr. Hemsley's options will likely be reduced by an even smaller amount. Shares of UnitedHealth fell 2.5 percent yesterday, to $47.54. UnitedHealth is among the biggest of the more than 100 companies that have acknowledged possible problems with their options practices. And despite the ouster of Dr. McGuire, United Health's troubles are far from over. The Justice Department, the office of the Minnesota attorney general, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service all have investigations into the company's stock option practices. The company will also have to restate earnings, lowering past results by potentially hundreds of millions of dollars.

The investigation by Wilmer Cutler focused on 29 option grants that accounted for nearly 450 million stock options that the company granted between 1994 and 2002. Most of those grants, their report concluded, "were likely backdated" after investigators found that nearly 80 percent of the total number of options were granted at the second, third, or lowest price of the quarter. The odds of such a finding appear to defy the possibility of pure chance.

The report absolves most of the directors from legal responsibility, but is critical of Dr. McGuire. It contends he "authorized or sought the approval of the compensation committee" for "option grants at opportune times when the company's share price was depressed," including several times to directly benefit himself.

The report indicates that investigators had little evidence to suggest that Mr. Hemsley, who had served as UnitedHealth's president and chief operating officer, had direct knowledge of stock option problems or other improprieties. But the report does raise flags on whether he should have known more.

Of the nine grants Mr. Hemsley was awarded between 1997 and 2002, for example, nearly half were issued when the stock was at or near a trough, according to an analysis of his stock option grants.

Moreover, the report questions the circumstances of a written employment contract that Mr. Hemsley signed when he became UnitedHealth's president. According to the report, UnitedHealth put out a press release stating that "both Hemsley and McGuire had entered into long-term employment agreements" with the company in mid-September 1999 in an effort to ease concerns about Dr. McGuire's plans to remain at the company. In fact, the report said, it was likely that the contracts were not approved by a board committee until an early November meeting and were not signed until a month later in December. The report does not account for Mr. Hemsley's explanation of the discrepancy.

The report also raises questions about his judgment in managing potential conflicts. Investigators detail that Dr. McGuire had extensive financial dealings with William Spears, a longtime director and chairman of UnitedHealth's compensation committee when Dr. McGuire's contract was being negotiated. Mr. Spears managed millions of dollars for Dr. McGuire's family and was a trustee for two family trusts.

Mr. Hemsley did not engage Mr. Spears in 1999, when his contract was being negotiated. But he did hire him to manage his money in 2001. And his former employer, Arthur Andersen, which was hired by UnitedHealth's management as its auditor, also served as the compensation consultant advising the board committee negotiating his contract.

In addition, the report found that UnitedHealth had "inadequate internal controls" to prevent option grant manipulation. Investigators suggested poor communication and sloppy paperwork among its accounting, legal and human resources departments led to many of the problems. The report said that new hires and promoted employees were routinely awarded stock options at the lowest closing price between the start and finish of the quarter when an employee began work, and those "practices were followed openly" in the human resources department.

Investigators found that Mr. Hemsley played a "more limited role in the option-granting process." He told investigators "he was unaware of how the grant dates were selected" or other precise terms.

Who did the human resources department ultimately report to? Mr. Hemsley, according to analysts.

McGuire's Options (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

William McGuire, with his $1 billion-plus portfolio of unexercised stock-options, was a poster-child for the backdating scandal even before his ouster as CEO of UnitedHealth over the weekend. And if history is any guide, the claiming of a scalp this large will only add fuel to a pyre that is already licking at the heels of several even better-known CEOs, notably Apple's Steve Jobs. So it's worth taking a closer look at what exactly Dr. McGuire is accused of doing, and what it tells us about the morality tale that the backdating story is supposed to represent.

After this newspaper published a story in March about the improbability of UnitedHealth's options grants being dated randomly, both the SEC and the company launched investigations. The SEC's is still proceeding, but the company released its internal report over the weekend, and it is that report that precipitated Dr. McGuire's departure.

The investigation, conducted at the company's behest by Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, concluded that a number of options grants were "incorrectly" dated -- that is, that the effective date of the grants was different from the date on which decisions were actually made about how many to grant and to whom. But Wilmer's report also sheds light on why and how this came to happen, and this side of the story is not being widely reported.

"Stock options were a critical component of UnitedHealth's compensation philosophy," the report explains. "Management viewed options as a vital tool for recruiting, motivating and retaining employees." This should be no surprise, but the report goes on: "Management believed that options were the best means of offsetting what it saw as the Company's below-market cash compensation" (our emphasis).

This is important because the picture the Wilmer report paints is not of a greedy executive manipulating a company he controlled for self-enrichment. Dr. McGuire's 10-digit options portfolio makes great headlines, but facts suggest the CEO was chiefly interested in controlling options dates to ensure he was adequately compensating people he wanted to retain.

The Wilmer report notes that "[f]or grants to new hires and employees promoted during the period 2000 to 2002, HR chose grant dates by finding the lowest closing price of UnitedHealth stock between the date of an event in the recruitment of the new hire . . . or promotion of the employee and the end of the quarter. . . ." Further, "[t]hese practices were followed openly in the Company, at least within the HR organization." In other words, backdating was just another hiring and retention tool, one whose use was not limited to Dr. McGuire or his immediate circle.

It is true that backdating was carried out for the purposes of avoiding the accounting and tax difficulties attendant on openly awarding "in the money" options. The October 13, 1999, supplemental option grant was made, in fact, specifically for the purpose of lowering the strike price of several million options held by people including Dr. McGuire. But it seems unlikely, to say the least, that if the scheme had some nefarious intent it would have been departmental policy at HR for several years.

Accounting rules and SEC regulations are not things to be flouted lightly, even when they appear arbitrary or even harmful. In the end, though, it may have been Dr. McGuire's lack of honesty with the board that proved his undoing. In particular, the Wilmer investigation found that Dr. McGuire may have failed to disclose his personal financial relationship with Compensation Committee Chairman William Spears, who managed assets for McGuire family trusts throughout the 1990s. Just as top executives at public companies shouldn't set their own pay, they should not engage in side financial dealings with those who do. More so than the backdating allegations, this undisclosed conflict of interest seems to have been Dr. McGuire's hanging offense.

On the other hand, UnitedHealth's stock was down 2.5% yesterday after the story broke, suggesting that Mr. McGuire's ouster was not the benediction shareholders were looking for.

More Exits Likely Over Stock Option Backdating (AP)

By Joshua Freed

AP, October 17, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS – The shake-up at UnitedHealth Group Inc. – whose top executive will step down no later than Dec. 1 – adds to the list of corner-office victims of stock option backdating.

Faced with an independent report that found widespread problems with the way UnitedHealth issued stock options, the nation's second-largest health insurer said Sunday that chairman and CEO William McGuire will leave the board immediately and leave the company no later than Dec. 1.

In addition, board member William G. Spears will resign, and General Counsel David J. Lubben will retire.

UnitedHealth shares fell $1.21, or 2.48 percent, to close at $47.54 on the New York Stock Exchange.

So far, at least 30 senior executives or directors at 16 companies with stock option problems have resigned or been fired.

There may be many more to come: At least 135 companies have disclosed Securities and Exchange Commission, Department of Justice or internal investigations according to an Associated Press review.

This past week, McAfee Inc. and CNet Networks Inc. both announced their CEOs would resign, and McAfee also fired its president.

UnitedHealth named Stephen Hemsley, the company's president and chief operating officer, as new CEO. Richard Burke, the founding CEO of UnitedHealth's predecessor company, also was named chairman.

But while UnitedHealth's board shake-up moved a lot of people into new positions, none of them are new faces. Hemsley has been McGuire's heir apparent for several years.

Burke founded the company and has been on its board since 1977.

That shows that UnitedHealth's board is trying to appease prosecutors while avoiding scaring Wall Street by signaling a change in the company's successful business model, said Peter Henning, a former lawyer in the enforcement division of the SEC who is now a law professor at Wayne State University in Michigan.

"They have to make sure that it looks to the regulators that they have done a thorough job and gotten all the miscreants out, but they have to maintain their credibility with Wall Street," he said.

In one example after another, the report by a firm hired by the company's board said McGuire's huge awards of stock options got a boost in value because they were issued on one day but priced as if they'd been issued earlier, when the stock price was lower. The report said his option grants "were likely backdated."

UnitedHealth said it had turned over the report by the law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP to the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department.

Comverse CEO Faces Additional Charges (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 17, 2006

Eastern District of New York prosecutors last week filed a superseding indictment against Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, accusing the former Comverse Technology chief executive of new charges that include obstructing justice.

Alexander, who had been accused of creating a secret slush fund for backdated options and evading the requirements of the company's stock option plans, is now charged with offering "another person" millions of dollars as a bribe to falsely take sole responsibility for the scheme.

The government said Alexander first offered the unnamed individual $2 million, then $5 million, and then stated, in substance, "name your price."

Alexander was a fugitive for more than a month before being discovered in Namibia. He faces extradition back to the United States.

The additional charges against him came the same week the government filed papers saying it was engaged in plea negotiations with two other former Comverse executives facing criminal charges in connection with the backdating scheme. The Eastern District U.S. Attorney has until Nov. 8 to decide whether to indict David Kreinberg, Comverse's chief financial officer, and William Sorin, its former general counsel.

U.S. Suit Claims Agway Trustees Mishandled Assets (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Labor Department has filed suit against trustees of bankrupt agricultural cooperative Agway Inc.'s employee retirement-savings plan, charging the plan's fiduciaries improperly invested $50 million of the assets.

According to the lawsuit, 47 members of Agway's investment committee, administration and the company's board allegedly valued the company's stock at prices higher than market value and gave plan participants false information about the investment.

The Labor Department said the suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of New York, seeks a court order to require the defendants to restore the $50 million in losses along with interest and to forfeit any benefits if all losses suffered by the plan aren't restored.

Agway filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection in October 2002 and began liquidation in April 2004.

The Labor Department files suits against trustees who don't manage retiree assets according to government rules. Generally, retiree complaints of mishandled funds will spark the Labor Department to launch an investigation.

The Agway case is noteworthy because of the large amount of allegedly mishandled money involved, Labor Department officials say.

Some money from the liquidation has been paid to some of the 401(k) plan participants, the Labor Department said. But they may not see the rest of their money returned anytime soon because the trial isn't likely to happen before 2008.

Agway itself isn't part of the suit. The fiduciaries are personally liable for losses to the plan caused by fiduciary impropriety, according to the Employee Retirement Income Security Act.

The Labor Department alleges the defendants caused the plan to incur substantial losses. Before Agway filed for bankruptcy protection, the plan held about $48 million in Agway securities and $2 million in cash reserves.

Schnitzer Settles With SEC Over Corruption Overseas (DOW)

By Siobhan Hughes

Dow Jones, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. (SCHN), a provider of scrap metal, will pay $7.7 million to settle allegations that it made improper cash payments or gave gifts to managers of government-owned steel mills in China in order to win business, federal regulators said on Monday.

The Securities and Exchange Commission said that the Portland, Ore., company settled without admitting or denying wrongdoing. Schnitzer will give up $6.3 million in alleged profits and pay interest of $1.4 million to resolve the allegations.

Schnitzer was accused of making the payments from at least 1999 through 2004, on its own behalf and on behalf of Japanese steel companies for whom it acted as a broker. The SEC said that Schnitzer's South Korean subsidiary made the payments in violation of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, an antibribery law that has been in place for decades.

The SEC also said that Schnitzer paid bribes to managers of privately owned steel mills in both China and South Korea during the same period.

"This case demonstrates that the commission will aggressively pursue companies that make illicit payments to foreign officials in order to obtain business," said Helane Morrison, district administrator of the SEC's San Francisco office, said in a statement.

The SEC said its investigation is continuing, raising the possibility that executives will face SEC civil charges. The SEC also disclosed that it is working with the Justice Department in the case.

The SEC said that a senior Schnitzer official authorized wire transfers for the improper payments to secret bank accounts in South Korea opened by the head of the South Korean subsidiary. It didn't name the senior official, and a spokesperson at Schnitzer didn't return a phone call.

The SEC said that Schnitzer's compliance department uncovered the improper payments in May 2004 and began an investigation. Although a senior executive prohibited further payments, the person authorized the payment of at least two more bribes and authorized employees to increase entertainment expenses in lieu of cash payments to its customers. The SEC said that employees at the South Korean unit destroyed internal documents related to the investigation before they were specifically told to preserve documents.

DOJ_NMG_0082106

The SEC said that it considered the cooperation that Schnitzer provided to investigators in accepting the company's settlement offer. A spokesperson for Schnitzer didn't return a phone call.

Freddie Mac Names New Finance Chief (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Mortgage finance giant Freddie Mac, which is still trying to fix its financial systems more than three years after disclosing billions of dollars of accounting errors, yesterday announced that it hired a finance executive from a health-care company to help lead the effort.

Anthony S. "Buddy" Piszel, 51, chief financial officer of Health Net Inc., will assume that role at Freddie Mac next month. He will replace Martin F. Baumann, who left Freddie Mac in March. Freddie's president and chief operating officer, Eugene M. McQuade, has been doing the finance job since Baumann resigned.

"We were looking for a broadly experienced senior executive with the right blend of accounting controls and financial technology experience," Freddie Mac spokeswoman Sharon McHale said. "Buddy brought that expertise."

Before joining the California managed-care company in 2004, Piszel spent more than a decade at Prudential Financial Inc. Earlier in his career, he was an auditor with the accounting firm Deloitte & Touche and a fellow at the Financial Accounting Standards Board, which makes accounting rules.

Freddie Mac remains unable to perform one of the basic functions of a public company: reporting quarterly financial results on a timely basis. It plans to get back on track next year, spokesman Michael Cosgrove said. The McLean company has said its internal controls have significant weaknesses.

Once it resumes issuing quarterly financial reports on schedule, Freddie Mac plans to begin a long-delayed process of registering with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Piszel has traveled that road before, having helped convert Prudential from a mutual insurance company owned by policyholders to a public company registered with the SEC.

Because Freddie Mac was chartered by the government, it was not required to comply with many of the SEC regulations that govern other publicly traded companies. However, before the accounting scandal derailed its efforts, the company had pledged to submit to those requirements.

"While there's a lot of work to do, it's the kind of work I've done before," Piszel said in an interview yesterday.

At Health Net, Piszel helped manage the resolution of extensive billing disputes with hospitals, for which the company set aside $169 million.

"He's widely credited with putting in place a lot of the systems and processes that helped Health Net turn the company around and put it back on the path to profitability," said Carl McDonald, a managed-care industry analyst for CIBC World Markets.

Piszel received $900,000 in salary and bonus last year and ended the year with Health Net stock options, which were not yet exercisable, worth $12.9 million, according to a Health Net regulatory filing. Freddie Mac plans to disclose Piszel's compensation arrangements on Thursday, McHale said.

Baumann, who joined Freddie Mac in 2003 and was soon promoted to chief financial officer, was an expert in accounting policies, Cosgrove said. Having corrected past financial results, Freddie Mac needed a chief financial officer with extensive experience dealing with controls and technology, Cosgrove said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Attorney General Wants Study Of U.S. Cities' Rising Crime Rates (AP)

AP, October 17, 2006

BOSTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales offered no new crime-fighting initiatives Monday, promising only to study local crime rates in selected cities to see why homicides and other violent criminal activity is on the rise nationally.

In a speech to the International Association of Chiefs of Police, Gonzales said the Justice Departments' role for now is to look for trends in gang violence, drug trafficking, and how inmates released from prison may have contributed to the increase.

Nationally, violent crime rose 2.2 percent last year, the first increase since 2001.

"We need to figure out the whys behind the numbers — whether the story is good or bad," Gonzales said in a 16-minutes speech. He did not specify which cities would be studied.

DOJ_NMG_0082107

He acknowledged that local law enforcement agencies have had more crime-fighting problems to juggle since the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks. "It wasn't like we didn't have a full plate already," he said.

Gonzales' speech was greeted by a standing ovation from the estimated 3,000 local and state police at the Boston convention. The group also was to hear from Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Mayors and police chiefs recently reported seeing spikes in violent crime for 2006, calling for greater support from federal law enforcement. Last month, Gonzales said cities will need to work harder to combat a spike in crime but shouldn't count on more federal funding, citing growing demands in the war on terrorism.

Officials said the study mentioned by Gonzales will be rolled out in three phases: looking at crime increases in cities, analyzing those results for any trends, and identifying federal programs that can help.

It was not clear whether more federal funding will be available for cities, but officials said that "new initiatives" could be created, if necessary.

The government will analyze at least five cities, and potentially dozens more, to get a broad enough picture of crime trends, officials said.

Last month, the FBI found there were 1.39 million violent crimes — including rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault — reported in the United States in 2005, up from 1.36 million the previous year.

However, Justice officials said Monday that even with the recent surge, the overall national violent crime rate remains lower than any year ever measured except for 2004.

US Attorney To Study Cities With Violent Crime Issues (BOS)

By Maria Cramer, GLOBE STAFF

The Boston Globe, October 17, 2006

US Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales told law enforcement officials Monday that his office will study selected cities across the country where violent crime has surged.

Acting Boston Police Commissioner Albert Goslin said he hopes the city, which is ahead of last year's pace for murders, makes the list.

Gonzales Monday addressed the International Association of Chiefs of Police conference at the convention center in South Boston. The gathering, which thousands were expected to attend, ends tomorrow. Gonzales said he wanted to know why violent crime had increased slightly in 2005 compared with 2004.

Nationally, violent crime such as murder, rape, robbery, and aggravated assault rose 2.3 percent in 2005 from 2004, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report.

"In addition, we have recent anecdotal reports that even in this year there may be a rise in violent crime in some areas," Gonzales said, according to a copy of his speech.

The cities will be selected in the next few weeks and will include communities of differing sizes and regions of the country.

"They will also include cities that have experienced significant increases in crime and significant decreases in crime," said Tasia Scolinos, spokeswoman for the Justice Department. The purpose of picking such cities is to understand why some have managed to keep violent crime down, she said.

Goslin, who said he sat next to Gonzales during his speech, said he believes decreased funding for police departments has contributed to the increase in violence, particularly in Boston, where the city has had 58 homicides in 2006, two more than at this time last year. (Mayor Thomas M. Menino said last year that the elimination of federal funds for hiring officers resulted in nearly 300 fewer police in Boston in 2005 than in 2000.)

"We do not have the federal funds that we used to have, and it has a direct correlation to the spike in crime and our ability to fight it," Goslin said Monday.

But he said he hopes Boston is among the cities picked for the study, to help him better understand other possible reasons for the spike in violent crime. "The fact of the matter is that it's a city that has had success [fighting crime] in the past, and has had an uptick," he said. "We want to get ahead of that uptick."

Justice Dept. Will Gauge Need For Additional Funding To Fight Rise In Violent Crime (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

McClatchy Newspapers, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Justice Department investigators will visit police departments across the country to determine whether more federal dollars are needed to stem the nation's rising violent crime, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0082108

In September, the FBI reported that violent crime rose 2.3 percent in 2005, the largest increase since 1991 and a trend that some police officials have blamed on cuts in federal crime-fighting grants. In some cities, such as Minneapolis, violent crime has spiked 15 percent.

"We need to find out why this is happening, what we can do to reverse that trend," Gonzales said. "And we need to do it together."

While Gonzales said the review was important to determine the causes of what he described as a "small uptick" in violent crime, he emphasized that the overall crime rate is the lowest in more than 30 years.

Some police organizations expressed disappointment that the initiative didn't include immediate financial help for local police departments struggling to make up for years of reductions in federal funding.

President George W. Bush's administration has cut grants for state and local crime-fighting programs on the grounds that they have outlived their usefulness or have underperformed.

Legislation pending before Congress largely would restore the administration cuts proposed this year.

Andrea Mournighan, the legislative director of the National Association of Police Organizations, said, "My hope would be the Justice Department will look at certain cities and . . . understand that more funding is needed."

Thomas Frazier, the executive director of the Major Cities Chiefs Association, said police departments already knew the reason for rising violent-crime rates: gangs, drug use and poverty.

Chertoff, Gonzales Tell IACP Cooperation Is Imperative DHS Will Create (OFFICER)

By Lon Slepicka, Officer.com News

Officer.com, October 17, 2006

The First General Assembly of the International Association of Chiefs of Police at their 113th Annual Conference in Boston featured United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff as keynote speakers.

Both had a strong message on what local law enforcement and their respective federal offices could do and should do together to combat terrorism.

"Our shared responsibilities are vast. None of us can do it alone," Gonzales said.

Both men spoke of improving the federal and local relationship. Since September 11, there is no more us versus them according to the Attorney General. He said it is clear that local law enforcement has many more officers on the street. "There can be no question that we learn from you, that we support you and that we are a team."

Chertoff said the greatest challenge of Homeland Security is terrorism, "and our principal partner in dealing with terror is state and local law enforcement."

He was particularly proud of the way federal and local agencies worked together when the small plane hit the apartment building in New York City. He described the immediate contact between the city and the DHS offices in Washington, D.C. and the real-time information that pass between the two.

Chertoff announced the steps he was taking with major city chiefs to start to move information sharing to the next level, one being the creation of a national network intelligence "fusion centers" to support state and local decision makers, chiefs of police and state and local intelligence officials. They will build new information centers to further facilitate the sharing of classified and unclassified information and move that information over secure facilities. He is going to expedite the classified secret level clearance process to get clearance out to the field more quickly. They are going to act quicker in granting top secret to those who require that level of classified access.

DHS will be assigning people to these "fusion centers" and will be asking local departments to also send their intelligence analyists and major operators looking for all to become more deeply embedded in each others operational activities.

Chertoff said there are already five of the "fusion centers" established including one in Las Angeles called the Joint Regional Intelligence Center, a regionally focused intelligence sharing center. He wants 20 new centers by the end of this fiscal year and up to 35 centers by the end of next fiscal year.

The terrorist front is fought every day by local state and federal law enforcement. Gonzales said we never know when a gas station holdup is in fact a funding operation for a terrorist group and it will more the likely be the local law enforcement that discovers the initial evidence to prove that.

Gonzales emphasized that massive responsibility to find the terrorists among us was added to the responsibilities to crack down own drugs, gangs, violent crime, and crimes against children. "We have not had a terrorist attack on American soil in five years and that is a testament to you and the police forces that you lead."

DOJ_NMG_0082109

FBI Raids Home Of Rep. Weldon's Daughter (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — FBI agents raided the homes of a Pennsylvania congressman's daughter and her business partner Monday as part of an investigation into whether Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., helped them secure lucrative lobbying contracts.

Federal investigators targeted four locations near Philadelphia, including the home of Karen Weldon, and two properties in Jacksonville, FBI spokesman Debbie Weierman said.

Weierman declined to elaborate. But another federal law enforcement official said the probe focused on whether the congressman used improper influence to steer business to his daughter and her partner, Charles Sexton.

The official, who has been briefed on aspects of the investigation, was not authorized to comment publicly on the inquiry. The congressman's properties were not among the locations searched, the official said.

At a campaign stop near Philadelphia where Weldon is in a tight re-election race against Democrat Joe Sestak, the congressman denied any wrongdoing and questioned the timing of the investigation.

"What I find ironic, if there is an investigation, is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election. This incident was 2½ years ago," he told the Associated Press. "I've never helped my daughter get anything. My kids are qualified on their own."

In 2004, a liberal watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, called on the Justice Department to examine whether Weldon violated federal law by assisting companies that hired his daughter as a lobbyist.

FBI Raids Home Of Weldon's Daughter (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale

AP, October 17, 2006

MEDIA, Pa. -- Three weeks before Election Day, an FBI corruption probe involving Republican Rep. Curt Weldon intensified as agents raided the homes of his daughter and a close friend.

The FBI swept in Monday and searched six sites in the Philadelphia area and Jacksonville, Fla., including Karen Weldon's lobbying firm and one of its clients, a Russian energy company, FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman said. The congressman's home and offices were not searched, she said.

"I have not done anything wrong and my daughter hasn't either," Weldon said at a news conference late Monday afternoon. "I would absolutely never use my position to help anyone in an unusual way."

Federal investigators are looking into whether Weldon used his influence to help Solutions North America secure lobbying contracts worth $1 million from foreign clients, two people familiar with the inquiry have told The Associated Press.

The company is run by Karen Weldon and Charles P. Sexton Jr., whose home was searched by the FBI. Sexton is a close friend and adviser to the lawmaker.

Weldon called the timing of the raids suspect.

The 10-term congressman from the Philadelphia suburbs, who is vice chairman of the House Armed Services committee, is locked in a tight race with Democrat Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral.

"What I find ironic, if there is an investigation, is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election," Weldon said. "This incident was 2 1/2 years ago."

Karen Weldon, 32, previously worked for Boeing Co., which has a helicopter plant just outside Weldon's district. Her attorney, Joseph Fioravanti, did not return a telephone message on Monday.

Sexton did not return a message left Monday at his home.

The FBI also searched two Jacksonville-area properties of Itera International Energy Corp., including its headquarters, Weierman said.

The Russian natural gas firm was paying Solutions $500,000 a year for public-relations help, according to a 2004 Los Angeles Times article. Around the same time, Weldon gathered 30 colleagues for a dinner in Washington honoring Itera's chairman, the newspaper reported.

FBI Raids Lobbyists' Homes, Office (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — FBI agents conducted raids in two states Monday as part of an investigation into whether Rep. Curt Weldon used his influence to steer business to a lobbying firm owned by his daughter and a one-time campaign aide, Justice Department officials and others familiar with the investigation said.

Federal investigators are trying to determine whether the Pennsylvania Republican helped secure almost $1 million in contracts for a firm known as Solutions North America, run by his daughter, Karen, and a prominent Philadelphia-area Republican, Charles P. Sexton Jr. Sexton once served as the 10-term congressman's campaign finance chief.

The raids are another political setback for the Republican Party as it struggles to maintain control of Congress. Weldon, who represents a suburban Philadelphia district, is locked in a closely contested campaign with a retired Navy vice admiral.

The news of the probe comes as the FBI is looking into salacious messages sent to House pages by Florida Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned his seat.

The FBI on Monday searched four locations in Pennsylvania, including the homes and office of Karen Weldon and Sexton. Also searched was the Jacksonville, Fla., headquarters of Itera International Energy Corp., the U.S. arm of a diversified Russian-based oil and gas firm.

The FBI also searched the law office of Philadelphia attorney John Gallagher, a longtime Weldon friend and supporter who did legal work for the consulting firm, said people familiar with the probe who requested anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. The FBI did not raid Weldon's home or office.

Speaking to reporters in Pennsylvania Monday, Weldon called the investigation politically motivated. "I've never helped my daughter get anything," he said. "My kids are qualified on their own."

An attorney for Weldon questioned the timing of the disclosure of the probe, which appears to stem from an investigation on Weldon that ran in the Los Angeles Times. "I think it is very suspicious that 2 1/2 years after the Los Angeles Times broke the story, that the FBI is now getting around to looking at it three weeks before the election," said William B. Canfield.

Canfield said the House Ethics Committee reviewed the case and the matter was resolved "in a way that was satisfactory to everyone."

In 2004, The Times disclosed that Solutions North America won contracts from companies or individuals that Weldon tried to help. The beneficiaries included two struggling Russian firms and a Serbian family linked to accused war criminal Slobodan Milosevic.

An FBI spokeswoman, Debra Weierman, confirmed Monday that agents had conducted six searches as part of an investigation but declined further comment.

Legal experts said that an agreement between a member of Congress to take official action in exchange for cash or other benefits — even if the gifts are not received by the lawmaker — could constitute bribery. But such allegations are difficult to prove and require evidence of a quid pro quo.

Weldon is a leading voice in Washington on the affairs of former Eastern bloc nations. He is also vice chairman of the powerful House Armed Services Committee and has been able to spread federal contracts over his district and region.

But his hold on his seat is precarious. The district voted Democratic in the last two presidential elections.

He is facing a stiff challenge from Navy veteran Joe Sestak, who has tried to tie his opponent to what he calls the failures of the Bush administration, including the war in Iraq.

The latest independent poll showed the race in a statistical dead heat.

Sexton, reached by phone Monday, declined comment. In an interview with The Times on Saturday, Sexton said he had not heard of any investigation. "The allegations are preposterous that there was any wrongdoing on the part of Mr. Weldon and his daughter or me," he said.

Karen Weldon, now 32, was inexperienced in international consulting when she and Sexton set up their business. She had previously spent six years working for Boeing Co., in what she described as "learning and training programs."

Their first client was Itera International. At the time, the congressman was trying to help improve the company's image with U.S. officials after questions had been raised about how the firm acquired gas fields in post-Soviet Russia. Weldon went to bat for Itera with federal agencies.

Itera agreed to pay his daughter's firm $500,000 a year around the same time that Weldon was extolling the company and helping to round up 30 congressional colleagues for a dinner honoring the firm's chairman.

Gallagher, Weldon's friend, introduced Solutions to its second client, a fledgling Russian aerospace manufacturer named Saratov Aviation Plant that wanted to sell its products in the United States. Weldon and his daughter journeyed to Saratov to look at the company's flying-saucer technology. Weldon pushed the Navy to look at the saucer. His daughter's firm ended up with a $20,000-a-month contract with Saratov. Karen Weldon's firm has since parted ways with Saratov.

Weldon introduced his daughter to her third client, two wealthy Serbian brothers, Dragomir and Bogoljub Karic who had been linked to Milosevic. Weldon sought to win U.S. visas for the men both before and after their family foundation hired his daughter's firm for $240,000 a year.

FBI Raid Deals New Blow To Republicans (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, October 17, 2006

Republican control of Congress was further endangered on Monday after the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided the home of the daughter of a long-term Republican congressman facing a tough re-election fight.

The FBI operation took place at the home of Karen Weldon, the daughter of congressman Curt Weldon, a 10-term Pennsylvania Republican lawmaker who serves as vice-chairman of the House homeland security committee.

Several US media reported that the agency was investigating whether Mr Weldon had illegally steered contracts to his daughter and Charles Sexton, her business partner and friend of the congressman. Debra Weierman, an FBI spokeswoman, declined to comment on the investigation, but confirmed the FBI had executed search warrants at six locations in Pennsylvania and Florida.

Mr Weldon, who faces a fierce electoral challenge from retired navy admiral Joe Sestak, is one of many Republican incumbents in previously safe constituencies who face tough re-election bids because of voter dissatisfaction with Republicans over the war in Iraq and scandals in Congress.

Already reeling from increasing voter concerns about the Iraq war – which has claimed the lives of 2,749 soldiers and seen almost 21,000 US military casualties – Republicans have more recently been dogged by the revelation that Mark Foley, a Republican congressman, sent overly friendly e-mails to page boys in the House.

The Republican leadership has also come under fire following allegations they allowed Mr Foley to remain in Congress in spite of warnings about his activities.

A recent poll by the Center for Opinion Research at Franklin & Marshall College in Pennsylvania found that Mr Sestak, a previously unknown political opponent, had a slight lead over Mr Weldon ahead of the November 7 elections.

The poll also found 49 per cent of voters in his district believed it was time for a change, compared with only 37 per cent who favoured his re-election.

Mr Weldon on Monday denied any wrongdoing. “I’ve never helped my daughter get anything,” he was quoted as saying by the Associated Press. “My kids are qualified on their own.”

Russell Caso, Mr Weldon’s spokesman, said the FBI had not told the congressman he was the subject of any investigation.

FBI Raids Four Homes, Two Offices In Weldon Probe (PHI)

By John Shiffman, Mitch Lipka And Patrick Kerkstra

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 17, 2006

FBI agents investigating U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon (R., Pa.) conducted six raids this morning - including at the homes of his daughter and a longtime friend.

In all, agents executed four search warrants in the Philadelphia area and two in Jacksonville, Fla., officials said.

In Center City, agents searched the law office of John Gallagher, a Weldon friend who has conducted extensive business in Russia and former Soviet Republics.

In Media, agents searched the offices of the public relations firm formed by Weldon's longtime friend Charles P. Sexton Jr., and the congressman's daughter, Karen.

Sexton and Karen Weldon formed Solutions North America in 2002, and won $1 million in contracts from two Russian energy firms and a Serbian family with ties to Slobodan Milosevic.

FBI agents in Jacksonville, Fla., raided the office of one of the Russian energy firms, Itera, and a private residence whose connection to the investigation was not disclosed.

The Philadelphia raids began early this morning. Shortly before noon, FBI agents left Karen Weldon's three-story brick house on Queen Street in Philadelphia carrying armfuls of boxes.

A government car pulled into the alley to the back door of the house and loaded boxes into it. Three agents standing in an alley - members of the FBI's public corruption squad - declined to identify themselves.

"I can confirm that we conducted a number of searches regarding an ongoing investigation," said FBI agent Jerri Williams, a spokeswoman in Philadelphia. "Details regarding those investigations cannot be provided because the accompanying affidavit is sealed."

In Delaware County, FBI agents had blocked off Kelli Lane leading to Sexton's Springfield home, and were removing at least one box and a bag of material from his home late this morning. Sexton is a longtime ally of Weldon's and has been a power in Delaware County GOP politics for more than three decades.

The raids came three days after news broke that the FBI was investigating whether the Delaware County congressman used his influence to help his daughter, a registered lobbyist, win consulting contracts.

At an event earlier today at Philadelphia International Airport to discuss airport noise, Weldon said the investigation was politically motivated - blaming a complaint filed by Melanie Sloan, director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

"She is the only one I know of who went to the Justice Department and asked for an investigation," Weldon said. "I know that because I have her letter."

He added, "I haven't helped get my daughter anything."

Weldon, who is involved in a tight race for reelection, has said that he has done nothing wrong.

The $1 million contract under investigation was first reported in 2004 by the Los Angeles Times. Sources said the FBI and Justice Department investigation was based on the Times story.

The Inquirer reported in 2004 that Weldon had lobbied federal officials on behalf of Itera, the huge and controversial Russian natural gas company. Weldon also complained to Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser, about Itera's treatment by the U.S. Trade and Development Agency.

Itera paid $500,000 to Karen Weldon and Sexton's firm. The contract was signed Sept. 30, 2002, six days after the congressman helped arrange a dinner at the Library of Congress to honor Itera and Igor Makarov, the firm's chief executive officer.

About noon today, a group of 17 protesters arrived outside Weldon's district office in Upper Darby, carrying signs and the kind of foam hands usually seen at sporting events to proclaim "Number One." But these rose-colored hands said "Caught Red-Handed."

"This is the first time I've come out and done something like this," said Judy Voet of Rose Valley. "This Congress is just so corrupt."

Most of the protesters were Democrats, but they said they were not involved in the campaign of Weldon's opponent, Joe Sestak, and they included at least one Republican, Chuck Ries of Havertown.

"I don't know what to believe anymore, they lie so much," said Ries, holding a sign linking Weldon to current and former Republican colleagues Tom DeLay, Mark Foley and Bob Ney - all of whom have been embroiled in career-ending scandals.

Homes Raided In Rep. Weldon Influence Probe (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And R. Jeffrey Smith, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

FBI Looks at Business Run By Daughter, Political Ally

Federal agents raided the homes of Rep. Curt Weldon's daughter and one of his closest political supporters yesterday as part of an investigation into whether the veteran Republican congressman used his influence to benefit himself and his daughter's lobbying firm, according to sources familiar with the investigation.

The investigation focuses on actions the Pennsylvania congressman took that may have aided clients of the business created by his daughter, Karen Weldon, and longtime Pennsylvania political ally Charles Sexton, according to three of the sources.

A grand jury, impaneled in Washington in May, has obtained evidence gathered over at least four months through wiretaps of Washington area cellphone numbers and has scrutinized whether Weldon received anything of value, according to the sources. They spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the investigation.

The investigation focuses on Weldon's support of the Russian-managed Itera International Energy Corp., one of the world's largest oil and gas firms, while that company paid fees to Solutions North America, the company that Karen Weldon and Sexton operate.

The congressman, for example, intervened on Itera's behalf when U.S. officials canceled a federal grant to the company. He also encouraged U.S. companies to do business with Itera at a time when its reputation had been sullied by accusations of Russian corruption.

Weldon said in a prepared statement that he had done nothing wrong and would cooperate in the investigation "100 percent." Michael Puppio, a campaign spokesman, said Weldon hoped that "reliance on leaks would cease and the media would rely on facts that are verifiable."

Weldon said that the House ethics committee looked into the allegations in 2004 "and found that I had engaged in no wrongdoing." He said he was "extremely disappointed that we are discussing this topic three weeks before an election that could determine control of Congress."

Yesterday's raids of six locations in Pennsylvania and Florida were moved up in part because of leaks about the investigation late last week, according to two of the sources. Top federal prosecutors supervising the inquiry concluded early this month that they were progressing significantly on another front in the investigation and did not want to make their work public too soon by conducting searches, especially so close to the Nov. 7 elections.

McClatchy Newspapers reported Saturday that the FBI had recommended that Justice Department officials investigate Rep. Weldon's actions, leading to yesterday's searches.

Debra Weierman, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Washington field office, confirmed that the locations included the homes of Karen Weldon and Sexton; the suburban Philadelphia offices of Solutions North America; and the downtown Philadelphia offices of John Gallagher, a lawyer who represented Russian companies linked to Itera.

Two other sites searched were the U.S. headquarters of Itera International in Jacksonville, Fla., and a Jacksonville home, the sources said.

Prosecutors are usually loath to conduct raids against a public official so close to an election. But some involved in the investigation debated whether holding off could also appear to have been influenced by the election, sources said.

Weldon faces a difficult reelection campaign against a retired vice admiral, Democrat Joseph A. Sestak Jr., and has fallen behind in some polls. With 10 terms under his belt, Weldon is a House veteran but has not faced a real challenge in years.

His district gave Democratic presidential candidate John F. Kerry 53 percent of the vote in 2004. Sestak has painted him as out of touch with his district.

Karen Weldon and Sexton registered to lobby for Itera on Sept. 13, 2002, stating that they wanted to help the firm sell gas and oil products to the United States. The registration was terminated two years later. But Senate records do not list any lobbying payments to the pair from Itera.

Rep. Weldon said that he never knew who his daughter's clients were. "I've never helped my daughter get anything. My kids are qualified on their own," he said.

Weldon assailed the news reports as politically motivated. He blamed a 2004 complaint filed by the liberal-leaning Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which is led by Melanie Sloan, a former prosecutor who also has been a Democratic staff member on the House Judiciary Committee.

That complaint was based on a lengthy 2004 report by the Los Angeles Times that described the meteoric rise of Solutions North America and its relationship to Itera, which has long been dogged by international controversy over its obscured ownership.

The company, formed in 1992, made huge profits as an intermediary in natural gas sales between the state-controlled Russian company Gazprom and former Soviet republics. It eventually purchased some of Gazprom's gas fields and other assets for nominal sums, estimated by critics to be billions of dollars below their real value, and became a rival.

Oil and gas traders and Russian experts have long suggested that Itera's real owners are former senior Gazprom executives and that the company was established in the United States as a vehicle to transfer money out of Russia and into their pockets. The company could not be reached to comment yesterday, but it has previously denied that claim.

Itera drew attention for cutting off natural gas to Georgia shortly before the winter of 2002, when it tried to collect a $90 million debt from the Georgian government during a flare-up of tensions with the Moscow government. Weldon helped mediate the dispute, persuading the company to supply the gas.

The Philadelphia Inquirer and the Los Angeles Times reported that Itera's representatives signed a $500,000 contract in 2002 with Solutions North America. That year, Rep. Weldon complained to the U.S. Trade and Development Agency about its cancellation of a grant to Itera to explore a gas field in Siberia.

"Itera is a great source for American companies to be involved in joint projects," he said during a visit to the company's offices in 2002.

At a January 2003 opening of Itera's U.S. headquarters, Weldon said: "I can think of no other company that represents what Russia is today and offers for the future."

Four people listed in corporate records as Itera officers or directors wrote checks totaling $8,000 to Weldon's campaign on April 20, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, a Web site that tracks campaign contributions.

Research director Lucy Shackelford and staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Searches Carried Out In Influence Inquiry (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 — Federal agents executed search warrants on Monday at the homes of Representative Curt Weldon's daughter and a longtime political associate in an investigation into whether Mr. Weldon, a Pennsylvania Republican, improperly aided their efforts to obtain lobbying and public relations contracts, law enforcement officials said.

F.B.I. agents searched four homes and other places in the vicinity of Philadelphia and two sites near Jacksonville, Fla. Debbie Weierman, a spokeswoman for the bureau's Washington office, confirmed the searches but would not say why they were conducted. Affidavits citing reasons for the searches were sealed.

Mr. Weldon's residence and his Congressional office were not searched, but other law enforcement officials said the lawmaker was the subject of an intensifying corruption inquiry.

Mr. Weldon was first elected to his district, the Seventh, on the outskirts of Philadelphia in 1984 and is vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. He is in a close re-election race against Joe Sestak, a former three-star admiral and national security aide in the Clinton White House.

Mr. Weldon was quoted by The Associated Press at a campaign appearance on Monday as saying that the investigation was politically motivated and that the disclosure of the inquiry, in news accounts in recent days, was suspect.

"What I find ironic, if there is an investigation," Mr. Weldon was quoted as saying, "is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election."

Law enforcement officials said the investigation into Mr. Weldon had been under way for several months. They said the government had not confirmed the existence of the investigation or conducted the searches until after news organizations learned of them. McClatchy Newspapers first reported the inquiry on Saturday, and it is not known how it got the information.

On Monday, a spokesman for Mr. Weldon's campaign, Pete Peterson, said he had no comment on the matter and referred calls to Mr. Weldon's office in Washington. Mr. Weldon's campaign manager, Michael Puppio Jr., and his chief of staff in Washington, Russ Caso, did not return calls seeking comment.

Mr. Weldon has at times disagreed with the Bush administration. He maintained that a secret military unit known as Able Danger had used sophisticated data mining to tie several of the September 2001 hijackers to Al Qaeda more than a year before the attacks, but a report by the Pentagon disputed that contention.

The searches for financial records, internal documents and computer messages took place at the home of Mr. Weldon's daughter, Karen, and at the home of Charles P. Sexton Jr., Ms. Weldon's business partner and a friend of her father.

A search was also conducted at the office of Solutions North America Inc., a firm run by Ms. Weldon and Mr. Sexton, in Media, Pa.

One of the searches in Florida was at the office of a Russian natural gas company, the Itera International Energy Corporation, which has hired Solutions North America for public relations assistance in the United States.

The precise accusations of wrongdoing that led to the inquiry involving Mr. Weldon are not known. In general, officials said, investigators are trying to determine whether Mr. Weldon misused his official position to help his daughter's company obtain lobbying contracts from foreign clients and helped steer contracts to favored firms.

Mr. Weldon said Monday that he had not given his daughter any special assistance and that the House ethics committee had looked into her contracts after they were the subject of an article in The Los Angeles Times in February 2004. He said he had cooperated with the inquiry and had turned over 150 pages of documents and answered the panel's questions.

FBI Ups Ante On Weldon (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

FBI agents raided the home of Karen Weldon, the daughter of Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), as well as five other locations Monday, signaling an intensifying federal probe into the veteran GOP lawmaker's dealings with her lobbying firm and a Russian business tycoon.

Of the locations in Pennsylvania and Jacksonville, Fla., searched by the FBI, one was the Jacksonville office of Itera International Energy Corp., the U.S. arm of a Russian company run by Igor Makarov.

Karen Weldon's firm, Solutions North America, received a $500,000 public relations contract to represent Itera in September 2002, including $170,000 in up-front money.

The contract was inked just days before the elder Weldon rounded up 30 Members to attend attend a dinner at the Library of Congress in honor of Makarov. Members of the Russian Duma attended the Sept. 24, 2002, event as well.

And despite the fact that the U.S. Trade and Development Agency had withdrawn an $868,000 grant to Itera several months earlier, Weldon praised Makarov and Itera in a Sept. 26, 2002, speech on the House floor. Weldon said Makarov had offered to open up his company — which had been criticized for a series of financial transactions with Russian natural gas giant Gazprom — to foreign scrutiny. Weldon called Makarov's announcement "absolutely refreshing" and said he had to "applaud" the move.

The 44-year-old Makarov was a member of the former Soviet Union's national bicycling team, according to the Itera Web site. Makarov "started his business in the late 1980's and received excellent managing experience from a small production and trading company to a large international corporation," the Web site stated.

Neither Karen Weldon, her attorney nor Itera returned calls seeking comment for this article.

Investigators also searched the Springfield, Pa., home of Charles Sexton, Karen Weldon's business partner in Solutions North America and a former finance chairman for Weldon's Congressional campaigns. Sexton, chairman of the Delaware County Republican Party — the party operation that has long been a backbone of Weldon's support — did not return calls seeking comment.

Weldon told reporters Monday that Sexton would take a leave from serving as an adviser to his re-election committee. Weldon is in the fight of his political life, facing a strong and well-funded challenge by Democrat Joe Sestak.

The Pennsylvania office of Solutions North America also was targeted in the search, as was a law office in Pennsylvania, a law-enforcement official said.

The Justice Department is looking into whether $1 million in payments to Karen Weldon's company were linked to official actions taken by the elder Weldon. Justice Department prosecutors filed sealed affidavits in Florida and Pennsylvania federal courts to support the FBI searches, law enforcement sources said.

FBI officials in Washington declined to comment on Monday's raids, saying they were part of an ongoing investigation.

Weldon, who has denied allegations of wrongdoing in relation to his daughter's firm since they were first raised in a February 2004 Los Angeles Times article, suggested on Monday that Democrats and the liberal watchdog group Citizens for Ethics and Responsibility in Washington were behind the Justice Department probe.

Weldon offered no proof to substantiate those claims, although he said CREW had written to Justice earlier this year seeking a probe and claimed he had a copy of that letter.

"What I find ironic, if there is an investigation, is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election," Weldon said at an appearance in Media, Pa., according to The Associated Press. "This incident was two and a half years ago."

Following the initial news reports in February 2004 about the Weldons' activities, the House ethics committee began an "informal investigation" into Weldon's ties to his daughter's company. That inquiry was first reported by Roll Call.

But the committee got bogged down in a partisan battle over ethics rules and committee staffing for the first half of the 109th Congress, and any results of its probe were never released publicly.

McClatchy Newspapers reported last week about the existence of the FBI investigation, and federal agents acted quickly to obtain search warrants once the initial news report was published, in order to protect potential evidence needed in the investigation, according to several law-enforcement sources.

According to McClatchy, "the FBI only over the last few months obtained evidence suggesting that the [C]ongressman may have broken the law."

Karen Weldon, 31, and Sexton, 69, also had other clients beyond Itera with ties to the Congressman.

The Los Angeles Times reported that Solutions North America had been paid $240,000 to represent a Serbian family that has ties to Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic, who was on trial for war crimes when he died earlier this year.

In January 2003, Weldon and his daughter visited Russia together, including the Saratov Aviation factory. After they returned to the United States, Saratov retained Solutions North America, paying the firm $20,000 per month to represent it.

At around the same time, Weldon — who chairs the tactical air and land forces subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee — began pushing an unmanned airborne drone made by Saratov to U.S. Navy officials. Karen Weldon also met with at least one Navy official regarding the Saratov drone program without disclosing her relationship with the firm, according to The Philadelphia Inquirer.

According to media reports, SNA also had fee arrangements with both Itera and Saratov that included reward payments for federal contracts, which are illegal under federal law.

FBI Targets Weldon In Influence-peddling Probe (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

FBI agents raided the homes of Rep. Curt Weldon's daughter and a longtime political friend yesterday as part of an investigation into whether the Pennsylvania Republican used his influence to steer $1 million in foreign business to his lobbyist daughter.

Armed with search warrants, agents from the FBI's offices in Washington and Philadelphia descended on four locations in the Philadelphia area, including Karen Weldon's home in the Queen Village section, and two locations in Jacksonville, Fla.

Among the houses raided was the Springfield, Pa., residence of Charles P. Sexton Jr., Miss Weldon's business partner and the congressman's close friend. The agents also searched the offices of Solutions North America Inc. (SNA) in Media, Pa., the lobbying and consulting business operated by Miss Weldon, 31, and Mr. Sexton, 69.

Mr. Weldon's home and offices were not targeted in the raids.

"What I find ironic, if there is an investigation, is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election," Mr. Weldon told reporters yesterday during a campaign appearance in Media.

Denying any wrongdoing by himself or his daughter, Mr. Weldon called the investigation politically motivated and challenged the timing of the raids.

"I've never helped my daughter get anything," he said. "My kids are qualified on their own."

Federal law-enforcement authorities said the FBI is investigating whether Mr. Weldon used his political influence as a 10-term congressman and senior member of the House Armed Services and Homeland Security committees to help his daughter's firm secure at least three lobbying and consulting contracts.

Last week, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee mailed fliers to voters in the 7th District, where Mr. Weldon is in a tight race with Democratic challenger Joe Sestak, accusing Miss Weldon of getting help from her father on lobbying projects.

Records show that Miss Weldon and Mr. Sexton, former chairman of the Springfield Republican Party, started SNA in September 2002. Three of the company's clients -- Itera International Energy Corp. and Saratov Aviation, both in Russia, and Dragomir and Bogoljub Karic, residents of Serbia -- reportedly have ties to Mr. Weldon.

The authorities said Mr. Weldon led a congressional delegation to Russia in 2002, where he visited with Itera International officials just before the firm signed with SNA. Two days after a $500,000 contract with the firm was signed, the authorities said, Mr. Weldon co-hosted an event at the Library of Congress honoring Itera International's chairman.

In January 2003, Itera International opened U.S. offices in Jacksonville, paying for Mr. Weldon to attend the opening.

The authorities also said Mr. Weldon and his daughter visited Saratov Aviation in January 2003, after which the firm signed a $20,000-a-month contract with SNA.

Yesterday, Mr. Weldon also questioned the need for an FBI investigation, saying the House ethics committee looked into the contracts awarded to his daughter's company soon after the Los Angeles Times reported on them in February 2004.

FBI: Weldon Under Investigation (NORRISTH)

By By: WILLIAM BENDER

Norristown (PA) Times-Herald, October 17, 2006

As U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon was proclaiming his innocence Monday morning in Media, FBI agents were raiding the home of his daughter and the leader of the Springfield Republican Party as part of an investigation into whether Weldon used his influence to help the pair obtain nearly $1 million worth of overseas lobbying and consulting contracts.

Starting about 9 a.m., agents began descending on a total of six locations, including Karen Weldon's home in the Queen Village section of Philadelphia, Charles Sexton's Springfield rancher on Kelli Lane and the office of their company, Solutions North America, in Media.

"I don't know anything about an investigation. I have no idea, no clue," Weldon, apparently unaware of the raids, told reporters at a 10:15 a.m. press conference about an airspace redesign plan at Philadelphia International Airport. "I have not done anything wrong."

Federal agents searched two locations in Jacksonville, Fla., one of them the headquarters of Itera energy group, FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman confirmed.

The Russian-based Itera International Energy Corp. signed a $500,000 contract with Solutions North America on Sept. 30, 2002, six days after Weldon introduced a House resolution to encourage U.S. "cooperation with the Russian Federation on energy development issues" and hosted a Library of Congress dinner to honor the company's chairman. The contract included a $170,000 up-front payment and a 10 percent "finder's fee" for any sales Solutions generated, according to published reports.

The FBI also searched the Philadelphia office of attorney John Gallagher, according to a law enforcement official.

DOJ_NMG_0082117

Gallagher introduced Sexton to another Solutions client, Saratov Aviation Plant. Weldon visited the Russian company in 2003, reportedly with his daughter, and later brought its experimental aircraft to the Navy's attention.

News of the investigation throws Weldon's re-election campaign into disarray as he tries to stave off hard-charging Democrat Joseph Sestak, a retired Navy admiral who is running evenly with the 10-term incumbent in the 7th District according to a Keystone Poll conducted late last month. Sexton, a longtime political ally of Weldon's, who was handling the bulk of his fund-raising, immediately stepped down Monday as a senior adviser to the campaign.

The congressman's staff had insisted Friday evening that "there is no investigation" because they had not been contacted by the Justice Department or the FBI. Weldon spokesman Michael Puppio said Saturday that their attorneys were considering filing a defamation lawsuit against McClatchy Newspapers, which broke the story Friday night.

Weldon said Monday he believed the FBI raids were linked to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) and the left-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW).

Days before the story broke, a DCCC-funded mailer began circulating the district, accusing Weldon, vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, of using his position to "help his lobbyist daughter win defense contracts potentially worth millions for her clients."

"In Washington, politics is a family affair, and Curt Weldon sure knew how to steer our tax dollars into his family's pockets," the flier reads. DCCC spokeswoman Jen Psaki denied any connection between the mailing and reports of the investigation, calling Weldon "paranoid."

At a hastily arranged press conference late Monday afternoon outside his campaign headquarters on Baltimore Pike, Weldon repeatedly denied that he had helped his daughter attain any contracts.

"What bothers me as a father is to see somebody say she's inexperienced," Weldon said of Karen Weldon, now 32 years old. "I'll put my daughter up against anyone, anyplace in terms of her capability. She's a very competent young lady and I stand behind her 100 percent."

Weldon, of Thornbury, said he would "fully cooperate" with the investigation while he asked voters to see through what his campaign said was the work of "left wing liberal activists" - specifically CREW's executive director, Melanie Sloan.

"I'm not here to point fingers, but that article, that mass mailing was done on Wednesday, went to every house in my district. Maybe it was a coincidence," he said. "But I'm also aware that the person who filed the one complaint against me with the Justice Department, Melanie Sloan, was a key staffer for (U.S. Rep.) John Conyers, who stands to become the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, assuming the Democrats will win control of the Congress.

"I think it doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out that this district could swing control of the Congress," he continued. "Melanie Sloan filed the complaint; I have a copy of it, and on her board she has one of my opponent's biggest single contributor(s) - a fellow by the name of Dan Berger."

In April 2004, CREW asked the Justice Department to investigate Weldon's role in how Solutions landed contracts with Itera, Saratov and the Serbian Karic Foundation.

Sloan said Saturday her group has heard nothing from the department since. Sestak did not declare his candidacy in the 7th District race until February.

Berger, a Philadelphia attorney and prominent Democratic fund-raiser, is a CREW board member whose law firm, Berger and Montague, is one of Sestak's largest campaign contributors. CREW spokeswoman Naomi Seligman Steiner said her group did not influence the timing of the FBI investigation.

"We knew when everyone else knew," Steiner said, referring to the McClatchy report that was posted online Friday night. "If he's looking to blame anyone," she said of Weldon, "he should blame himself."

Asked Monday morning why a Justice Department under a Republican administration would play a role in a Democratic scheme to undermine his campaign, Weldon said: "The bureaucracy, it's not Democrat or Republican."

Three weeks before Election Day, the investigation plays into the Democrats' theme that 12 years of Republican control has created a "culture of corruption" in Washington. It follows the recent resignation of U.S. Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., for sending sexually explicit messages to former congressional pages and a guilty plea from U.S. Rep. Robert Ney, R-Ohio, on corruption charges related to the Jack Abramoff scandal.

Sestak spokesman Ryan Rudominer called the developments "very troubling" but otherwise declined to comment.

After the Los Angeles Times first reported in 2004 on Weldon's ties to Solutions clients, the congressman voluntarily provided the House Ethics Committee with the relevant documentation. He has refused to share that documentation with the Daily Times.

DOJ_NMG_0082118

Weldon said Monday that the committee asked some follow-questions and eventually gave him a "written letter closing the case." Asked if the letter cleared him of the current allegations, he responded: "I didn't say clearing, I said closing the case. I'll use their exact terminology."

Weldon said he spoke to committee Chairman Doc Hastings on Sunday and Hastings said he "was not aware of any contact between the ethics committee and the Justice Department."

The congressman refused to comment on the "substance of what the investigation might be about," other than to say he has not received a target letter or been contacted by the FBI or Justice Department. He has retained attorney William Winning, and his campaign said it would provide no further comment due to the ongoing investigation.

Karen Weldon could not be reached for comment Monday.

Sexton and Solutions attorney Joseph Fioravanti did not return phone calls. Gallagher, the Philadelphia attorney whose office was raided, said Saturday that federal investigators hadn't contacted him. "It sounds pretty outrageous," Gallagher said, when told about reports of an investigation.

"We look forward to getting back to the issues of this campaign, although this obviously makes it very difficult," Weldon said. "And to the constituents out there who've supported me for 30 years, all I can say is I hope you'll bear with me through this process.

"It is a difficult one, I would not have wished this on anyone, and three weeks before the election, that makes the campaign that much more difficult. But, you know, life goes on and we will survive."

Editorial: FBI Raid Spurs More Questions Than Answers (DCDN)

Delaware County (PA) Daily News, October 17, 2006

Is U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon a crook? That was the question on everyone's lips Monday as word spread that the FBI had raided the homes of his daughter, Karen; a key political confidante, Springfield GOP leader Charles Sexton; a Philadelphia attorney and a Florida business.

The feds are investigating the role of the 10-term incumbent 7th District Republican from Thornbury in the creation of an international consulting firm run by Karen Weldon and Sexton - and how it quickly won some $1 million in contracts from foreign entities tied to the congressman.

Weldon and all those involved (who could be reached for, or were willing to, comment) deny any wrongdoing. And they have since the matter first became public in 2004.

Word of the probe first surfaced Friday with a story by McClatchy Newspapers. Weldon's staff immediately denied that there was any investigation at all.

"There is no investigation," said Weldon spokesman John Tomaszewski. "There is no formal investigation and there is no inquiry. There's nothing. This is nonsense, ludicrous."

Weldon himself was repeating that line at an unrelated press conference Monday morning, even as the FBI was executing its search warrants and carting away documents.

As of this morning, there are many questions and few answers. But this much is known:

- In 2002 Karen Weldon was a 29-year-old with an undergraduate degree in education and a graduate degree in information systems who was previously employed at Boeing Helicopters, one of her dad's biggest benefactors. She and Sexton, a wealthy businessman and one of the biggest power brokers in the Delaware County Republican machine, formed Solutions North America Inc. in Media.

- The very same month, the firm won a $500,000 a year contract with a Russian natural gas company boosted by the congressman. Six days before, Curt Weldon had hosted a soiree in the Library of Congress to introduce it to his colleagues.

- Solutions North America was awarded $240,000 to promote the good works of a pair of rich Serbian brothers who were barred from entering the United States because of their relationship with accused mass murderer Slobodan Milosevic. Curt Weldon was one of their leading proponents in Congress.

- After Solutions North America won a $20,000 a month contract with a Russian aerospace manufacturer (plus 10 percent of any new business it generated), the congressman began trying to drum up interest in the technology with the U.S. Navy. The finder's fee provision of the contract was later declared illegal.

Rep. Weldon insists that he turned over the entire matter to the House Ethics Committee, which found no cause of action. But the notoriously weak-kneed committee has declined to publicly confirm that account, and Weldon has declined to release any records supporting his claim.

The story was embraced by a left-leaning government watchdog group called Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), which called Weldon's actions "possibly criminal" and asked the U.S. Justice Department two years ago to investigate. Until this weekend, there was no indication that the feds were complying with that request.

That hasn't stopped Weldon from claiming that politics is behind the investigation - and the fact that it became public three weeks before the toughest election day in his career. Still, there is no indication that his Democrat opponent, retired Navy Adm. Joe Sestak, or his allies have anything to do with the probe, or the leak about its existence.

One might point at the fact that the Justice Department has been controlled by the Republican Party for the last six years to refute Weldon's protestations of partisanship. But in reality, investigations of sitting members of Congress are kept out of the hands of political appointees in Washington and are handled by by-the-book public corruption professionals. Those folks don't play around.

In all likelihood, Monday's search warrants were executed because word of the probe had leaked over the weekend. Agents usually act in cases like this to preserve evidence that could potentially be destroyed. Cartons of documents were removed from the target sites Monday, and no one who knows what the FBI has is talking.

In all, the situation is eerily reminiscent of developments during the 2003 re-election campaign of Philadelphia Mayor John Street. An FBI bug was found in the ceiling of his office weeks before the mayor faced a strong challenge from Republican Sam Katz. Street and his allies - citing the Republicans in charge of the Justice Department - cried politics and won re-election handily. It probably helped that Street was a Democrat.

So, the question remains: Is Curt Weldon a crook? The bottom line is, nobody knows. And, unfortunately, voters will have to make their decision on Nov. 7 before any firm determination can be made.

Doolittle's Lawyers Talking To Justice Department (SACBEE)

By David Whitney, Bee Washington Bureau

The Sacramento Bee, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - Rep. John Doolittle acknowledged Monday that his lawyer, whom he has paid more than $38,000 in the last two months, is talking with the Justice Department about the congressman's relationship with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The Washington Post and other papers, citing unnamed sources, have said the Roseville Republican and Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., are under investigation in the Abramoff matter.

Doolittle's office in a statement late Monday, again insisted that the congressman is not under investigation.

Instead, it characterized the meetings as an effort to clear the congressman's name.

"The congressman's attorney has had several conversations with the Justice Department which we believe have been helpful toward clearing the congressman's name," said Laura Blackann.

"The congressman's attorney has committed to the Justice Department that in order to preserve the integrity of the ongoing investigation, details of their interactions will remain private," she said. "To date, the congressman has not been contacted or questioned by the Justice Department and has no reason to believe that he is the target of an investigation."

Blackann said Doolittle "instructed his attorney to establish contact with the Justice Department to further express the congressman's willingness to be helpful and satisfy the Justice Department that the congressman has done nothing wrong."

The new disclosures have added fuel to the campaign of Democratic challenger Charlie Brown, who has tried to tie Doolittle to the "culture of corruption" in Washington, D.C., arising from the Abramoff scandal and the bribery conviction of Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-San Diego.

For a complete story, see Tuesday's Bee. About the writer:

The Bee's David Whitney can be reached at (202) 383-0004 or dwhitney@mcclatchydc.com.

Doolittle Paid Lawyer To Talk To Agency (AP-Y)

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

Republican Rep. John Doolittle of California paid an attorney more than $38,000 in recent months to talk to the Justice Department in connection with the Jack Abramoff lobbying investigation, new campaign finance reports show.

A spokeswoman said the money was spent after Doolittle asked his attorney, David Barger, to contact the Justice Department "to further express the congressman's willingness to be helpful and satisfy the Justice Department that the congressman has done nothing wrong."

DOJ_NMG_0082120

In a statement, spokeswoman Laura Blackann said Doolittle has not been contacted by prosecutors in the ongoing congressional corruption probe stemming from the conviction of GOP lobbyist Abramoff. Doolittle "has no reason to believe that he is the target of an investigation," she said.

The payments to Barger's Virginia law firm, Williams Mullen, show up in Doolittle's third-quarter Federal Election Commission fundraising report, filed Sunday.

Doolittle, a conservative eight-term incumbent and member of the House GOP leadership, has numerous ties to Abramoff, whom he has described as a good friend. Doolittle accepted campaign cash from Abramoff, helped his tribal clients in dealings with the Interior Department, and helped the lobbyist win a contract from the Northern Mariana Islands by endorsing a sympathetic island politician.

Doolittle's wife, Julie Doolittle, was paid a retainer by Abramoff for event planning work from 2002 to 2004.

The ties between Doolittle and Abramoff have caught the interest of government prosecutors, The Associated Press has reported. More than two years ago Julie Doolittle was subpoenaed for documents in connection with the probe.

Doolittle has denied any wrongdoing and refused to get rid of the $14,000 in campaign donations he got from Abramoff, who is cooperating with the government.

Nonetheless in January, shortly after Abramoff pleaded guilty to wire fraud and tax evasion, Doolittle hired Barger to advise him in the matter. At the time Barger was paid a $10,000 retainer, and earlier this year Doolittle reported paying his firm an additional $1,274.

The new campaign finance report, covering July 1-Sept. 30, shows four separate payments to Williams Mullen totaling $38,378.48. They are labeled only "legal fees."

In her statement Blackann noted that Doolittle wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales earlier this year offering his cooperation. Subsequently he asked Barger to contact the department.

"The congressman's attorney has had several conversations with the Justice Department which we believe have been helpful toward clearing the congressman's name," Blackann's statement said. She said the parties have agreed to keep the talks confidential.

The campaign finance report also shows Doolittle paying $13,000 in legal fees to a second law firm, Wiley Rein & Fielding LLP, that he has used regularly for years.

Doolittle is favored to win re-election in his heavily Republican northern California district, but is facing a spirited challenge from Democrat Charlie Brown, a retired Air Force lieutenant colonel who has sought to make an issue of Doolittle's ties to Abramoff.

Doolittle has also generated controversy by paying his wife for fundraising. He pays her a 15 percent commission on each sum she raises, rather than the flat fee recommended by some industry professionals. He reported paying her $6,200 in the most recent quarter.

Five Years After Killing Of Prosecutor, A Stumped FBI Asks The Public For Help (WP)

By Blaine Harden, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

SEATTLE -- Alone in the basement of his house and sitting in front his computer monitor, Thomas C. Wales was shot to death here five years ago. An assistant U.S. attorney, he specialized in prosecuting white-collar crime and was an ardent advocate of gun control.

The shooter stood in Wales's back yard at 10:40 p.m., fired several times through a window and disappeared. It may have been the first time in U.S. history that a federal prosecutor was killed in the line of duty.

Thomas C. Wales was an assistant U.S. attorney. (Courtesy Of The Thomas C. Wales Foundation - Courtesy Of The Thomas C. Wales Foundation)

But after interviewing more than 4,000 people in all 50 states and half a dozen countries, after chasing down about 1,800 silver gun barrels of a kind that ballistics experts say was affixed to the shooter's pistol and after abruptly transferring control of the investigation out of the Seattle office of the FBI, law enforcement officials still cannot say for certain whether Wales was killed because he was a prosecutor.

Instead, to mark the fifth anniversary of the crime, an FBI task force leader insisted last week that the case has not gone cold, and authorities released for the first time a composite sketch of a "person of some interest" who was seen wandering around Wales's neighborhood on Seattle's Queen Anne Hill before the killing.

For reasons not explained, the existence of the wandering stranger -- whose presence had been reported to police weeks before the Oct. 11, 2001, killing -- did not find its way to the FBI task force until about three years after Wales was shot.

Having failed over the past few years to find that man while keeping the hunt quiet, the FBI recently handed out a two-year-old sketch and asked for the public's help in finding a slim white man in his early 40s with black hair, tobacco-stained teeth and perhaps a ponytail.

The bureau also asked for help in finding a person who mailed a curiously literate letter this January from Las Vegas. Using crisp, crime-novel prose that echoes the smart-guy style of Elmore Leonard, the writer confessed to killing Wales in a murder-for-hire deal.

"OK, so I was broke and between jobs," the letter begins. "I got an anonymous call offering [dollar figure redacted by the FBI] to shoot the guy, so I drove to Seattle to do the job."

An FBI behavioral analyst said that while the murder scenario described in the letter was "made up," the writer is "relatively well-educated and well-read" and could be the killer or could know him.

Finally, the FBI asked for help in tracking down about 1,800 more silver pistol barrels of the kind that was screwed into the Makarov pistol used to shoot Wales. The bureau says that about 3,600 of the barrels are known to have been sold in the United States, but it has found only about half of them.

"We will not give up," Robert Jordan, special agent in charge of the FBI office in Portland, Ore., said at a news conference in the federal courthouse in downtown Seattle.

Jordan stressed, using the same words twice, that the Wales case "remains a very significant investigation."

That emphasis comes on the heels of what appears to have been a manpower dispute in the inquiry. In May, an FBI supervisor in Seattle reduced by two the number of agents assigned to the case. In June, after reports of squabbling inside the bureau, the case was shifted to the FBI's Portland office and beefed up with more investigators.

An important thread -- one that investigators declined to talk about last week -- is the nearly five-year-old inquiry into the activities of a Seattle-based commercial airline pilot who has been described in local newspapers as the prime suspect.

Thomas C. Wales was an assistant U.S. attorney. (Courtesy Of The Thomas C. Wales Foundation - Courtesy Of The Thomas C. Wales Foundation)

In an apparently preemptive media offensive that was published in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer on the morning of the FBI news conference, the pilot -- whose name has not been made public because he has not been charged -- complained through his attorney about the aggressive behavior of law enforcement authorities.

"This is Richard Jewell all over again," Larry Setchell, the lawyer, told the newspaper, alluding to the man who was falsely accused of the bombing at the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta.

Setchell declined to comment, except to confirm the accuracy of the details concerning his client that were published in the Seattle newspaper.

The most curious of those details is the presence of the pilot in Las Vegas in January when the murder-for-hire letter was mailed.

Setchell said that the pilot was there by coincidence, on a layover, and that he plans to turn over handwriting samples to the FBI in the coming week to show that he did not write the letter.

Since the killing, the pilot's home reportedly has been searched three times, and federal agents have seized his cars and many of his belongings. US Airways reportedly grounded the pilot for several weeks after it was notified that he was a subject of interest in the inquiry.

Early in 2001, before the killing, the pilot was one of several people Wales investigated in connection with illegally modifying a surplus military helicopter for civilian use. The charges were dropped, but only after the pilot spent more than $100,000 in legal fees, Setchell told the Post-Intelligencer.

Setchell said that the pilot felt "profound frustration" over the investigation but that he did not blame Wales.

Asked at the news conference about the status of the investigation against the pilot, the FBI's Jordan said only: "When the investigation reaches the point where we have probable cause to arrest someone, we speak with an indictment."

Betonsports, Prosecutors Strike Tentative Deal, Lawyers Say (BLOOM)

By Andrew Harris And Benjamin Israel

Bloomberg, October 17, 2006

Oct. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Betonsports Plc., the British Internet bookmaker indicted in the U.S. for illegal gambling, has reached a preliminary deal with prosecutors to end a civil suit seeking to ban the company from doing business in the U.S.

U.S. District Judge Carol Jackson in St. Louis granted the parties one week to complete what Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Fagan said was a 21-page accord resolving a civil suit filed against the company in July by the Justice Department.

``My impression is there are no substantive disagreements," Fagan told Jackson today. A temporary order barring Betonsports from doing business in the U.S. has been in place since July 17. Neither side disclosed terms of the preliminary agreement in court.

On July 17, prosecutors also unsealed a 22-count indictment charging Betonsports founder Gary Kaplan, former Chief Executive Officer David Carruthers and nine others with racketeering and violating federal interstate gambling laws. In 2003, the company's Web site, Betonsports.com, had 100,000 active players who placed 33 million wagers worth more than $1.6 billion, the U.S. has said.

Carruthers, 48, was arrested in July as he changed planes at a Texas airport. He pleaded not guilty and is currently under house arrest in St. Louis. Kaplan is still at large. Six other defendants have pleaded innocent.

Banning Payments

President George W. Bush on Friday signed legislation making it illegal for credit card companies to collect payments for transactions with online gambling sites. Gambling on the Internet has become a $12 billion-a-year business that's growing rapidly offshore.

Betonsports attorney Jeffrey Demerath told Jackson today that difficulty in assembling the company's board of directors for a review of the proposal was the primary obstacle to completing the accord.

``We received it Thursday afternoon," Demerath told the judge. ``We just haven't had the time to get everyone together."

Outside the courtroom, Demerath declined to comment on the status of the criminal case against Betonsports. He doesn't represent the individual defendants.

The civil case is U.S. v. Betonsports Plc., 06cv1064, in the Eastern District of Missouri (St. Louis).

Former FDA Head Is Charged Over Stock Holdings (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

The former head of the Food and Drug Administration will plead guilty to two misdemeanors for failing to properly disclose stock ownership and violating conflict-of-interest rules while he was at the agency.

Lester Crawford, who resigned in September 2005, two months after the Senate confirmed him as commissioner, was charged by the Justice Department with failing to fully reveal in government disclosure forms holdings in companies regulated by the FDA. The U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia filed the charges yesterday.

While Dr. Crawford no longer works in government, the situation may spark broader questions about procedures for vetting stock options and shares held by high-ranking officials. The matter also arises at a time when the FDA faces heightened scrutiny from Congress.

The companies named in the charges -- shares of which were owned by Dr. Crawford and/or his wife during years when he served at a high level in the FDA -- include soft-drink and snacks company PepsiCo Inc.; Kimberly-Clark Corp., which sells some medical devices; Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and food distributor Sysco Corp. Dr. Crawford also held stock options in Embrex Inc., an agricultural biotechnology company on whose board he once served. He exercised some of the options while at the FDA, the Justice Department said.

The Justice Department also charged Dr. Crawford with conflict of interest, because he chaired an FDA working group on obesity issues while he owned shares in PepsiCo and Sysco, companies which had business that could be affected by the panel's findings.

While Dr. Crawford served on the working group, he and his wife owned 1,400 shares of PepsiCo, with a value of at least $62,000, and 2,500 shares of Sysco, with a value of at least $78,000, according to the Justice Department. The panel's work included recommending that manufacturers change food labels to more accurately reflect actual serving sizes.

Barbara Van Gelder, Dr. Crawford's attorney, said he plans to plead guilty to two misdemeanors. One stems from the omissions in his financial-disclosure forms, the other from the conflict-of-interest charge.

The penalty will be decided by a judge, but Ms. Van Gelder said fines and probation are typical in such situations. The issues stemmed from confusion and mistakes and weren't deliberate, she said. "At certain times of his career at the FDA, there were omissions that were inadvertent," she said. "He will take responsibility for the omissions." She said Dr. Crawford cooperated with the Justice Department.

A spokeswoman for the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services, which is also investigating the circumstances of Dr. Crawford's resignation, declined to comment on its status. Spokeswomen for the FDA and HHS also declined to comment. Dr. Crawford didn't return a call.

DOJ_NMG_0082123

Lawmakers will debate the FDA's handling of drug safety and other issues next year, when agency-funding legislation goes before Congress. Democrats may use the Crawford incident to gain political traction for arguments that Republicans have been too sympathetic to the industry. New York Democratic Rep. Maurice Hinchey said the Crawford matter underscores that the FDA is "in need of a serious overhaul." The agency has said it is reviewing a recent report that criticized its handling of drug safety and has already made some changes.

Write to Anna Wilde Mathews at anna.mathews@wsj.com1

Former F.D.A. Chief Is Charged With Conflict (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

Lester M. Crawford, former chief of the Food and Drug Administration, was charged yesterday with conflict of interest and lying about stock he and his wife owned in companies the agency regulates.

Dr. Crawford, who resigned abruptly in September 2005, just two months after his nomination had been approved by the Senate, is expected to plead guilty in federal court in Washington today, said his lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder.

Each of the two charges filed against Dr. Crawford, 68, is a misdemeanor punishable by up to a year in jail, but Ms. Van Gelder said she expected him to be fined and placed on probation.

"It's his responsibility," she said, "and he accepts it."

Senior employees of the food and drug agency are prohibited from owning shares in companies the agency regulates, and when Dr. Crawford became a deputy commissioner in 2002, the government's charging document says, ethics officials at the Department of Health and Human Services told him that he and his wife would have to sell stock in a dozen regulated companies. Those companies included several large pharmaceutical and medical device concerns, among them Johnson & Johnson, Merck, Pfizer, Medtronic and Boston Scientific.

Dr. Crawford and his wife, Catherine, sold their holdings in nine companies, the government says, but retained shares in three others: the food giants Sysco and Pepsico, and Kimberly-Clark, a maker of consumer health care and other products.

In addition, it says, Mrs. Crawford held shares in another regulated company, Wal-Mart, but her husband did not list those holdings in his 2002 financial disclosure.

Prosecutors also say that Dr. Crawford, a veterinarian and pharmacologist, owned options to buy 41,500 shares in Embrex, an F.D.A.-regulated poultry biotechnology company where he formerly served as a director. He exercised some of those options in 2003 and 2004, earning $8,150 in one transaction and $20,627 in another. He correctly reported those transaction on his federal tax returns but did not list them in disclosure filings at the time or disclose the remaining, unexecuted options he held in the company, the charges say.

The government noted that during a period when the Crawfords held shares in Pepsico, a soft drink and snack food company, he was chairman of an F.D.A. Obesity Working Group that among other tasks was reviewing calorie content labeling for soft drinks. At the time, prosecutors said, the couple held 1,400 shares of Pepsico worth at least $62,000, as well as 2,500 shares of Sysco, which specializes in supplying food to restaurants and institutions, worth at least $78,000.

When Dr. Crawford became acting commissioner of the agency in 2004, reviewers at the Department of Health and Human Services, the F.D.A.'s parent, again raised questions about his ownership of Sysco and Kimberly-Clark shares. Responding to that query, he wrote in an e-mail message to an ethics official at the department that "Sysco and Kimberly-Clark have in fact been sold."

"In truth and in fact, as Crawford then knew, Crawford and/or his wife held shares" in both Sysco and Kimberly-Clark "throughout 2003 and 2004," according to the charging document.

Dr. Crawford, now a senior staff member at the Washington lobbying and communications firm Policy Directions, could not be reached for comment. But his lawyer, Ms. Van Gelder, said the fact that the charges were misdemeanors reflected Dr. Crawford's having amended his financial forms after his departure, making a full disclosure.

"One of the things I hope comes out is that he sold the Mercks and the pharmaceuticals," Ms. Van Gelder said. "The Syscos and Kimberly-Clark, one wouldn't ordinarily think, 'I've got to divest myself.' You wouldn't think Wal-Mart is in the same boat as Merck."

Dr. Crawford's rocky 18-month tenure as acting commissioner and then commissioner was marked by a series of controversies, including the withdrawal of the painkiller Vioxx from the market and an internal battle over whether the agency would approve the emergency contraceptive Plan B for over-the-counter sale.

DOJ_NMG_0082124

Though his sudden resignation last fall so soon after his confirmation appeared unusual, he offered no detailed explanation. The office of Daniel R. Levinson, inspector general of Health and Human Services, told Congress, however, that it was investigating the circumstances of the commissioner's departure.

Records obtained through the Freedom of Information Act several weeks later revealed that the department's ethics office had questioned Dr. Crawford's broker in August 2005, the month before he quit.

A spokesman for Sysco said yesterday that the company had not been aware that Dr. Crawford was a shareholder.

"We were totally unaware of it, and we really didn't have any real regulatory matters before the agency beyond routine matters," said the spokesman, John M. Palizza.

A spokesman for Pepsico said compliance with government regulations concerning conflict of interest was clearly an individual responsibility. He referred additional questions to Dr. Crawford.

Former FDA Chief Illegally Held Stocks (WP)

By Marc Kaufman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Lester M. Crawford, who resigned mysteriously last fall just two months after being confirmed as commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, will plead guilty today to charges that he hid his ownership of stock in food and drug companies that his agency regulated, his lawyer said.

The Justice Department charged Crawford yesterday with two misdemeanors for withholding the financial information, which included his ownership of shares in food and drink manufacturers Pepsico Inc. and Sysco Corp. and the drug company Embrex Inc.

The complaint, called a criminal "information," accused Crawford, who held numerous senior FDA and Agriculture Department jobs in his many years in government, of conflict of interest and filing false financial disclosure reports.

Barbara Van Gelder, Crawford's lawyer, said he "is going to plead guilty to two misdemeanors tomorrow afternoon, and he is going to admit his financial disclosures had errors and omissions, mostly with his wife's continued ownership of stocks," the Associated Press reported. "At the end of the day, he owned these stocks, and he will admit he owned them while he was at the FDA, and he will take responsibility for that."

Crawford failed to disclose $28,000 he gained from stock options in Embrex, an agriculture biotechnology company, the complaint said. Crawford was a member of Embrex's board of directors from 1992 to 2002.

The Justice Department document said a government ethics official told Crawford in 2002 that he had to sell shares the couple owned in 12 companies considered to be "significantly regulated organizations" -- companies that regularly had business before the FDA.

The prosecutors wrote that the Crawfords sold many of their shares but kept ownership in three companies. When asked in 2004 about two of them, Crawford replied in a December e-mail that "Sysco and Kimberly-Clark have in fact been sold." Actually, the court papers state, Crawford knew that he or his wife still held shares in both companies.

Crawford chaired the FDA's Obesity Working Group, which made recommendations affecting food and soft drink makers, at a time when he and his wife owned stock in Pepsico and Sysco, the court papers said.

The complaint said Crawford made some of his false statements on yearly financial disclosure forms and others on his financial disclosure statement to the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee -- which was considering his nomination to become permanent FDA commissioner.

Crawford's short tenure as commissioner was best known for his August 2005 decision to postpone action on the "morning after" contraceptive Plan B. He had earlier told the Senate that the agency would act on the application, and Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) allowed a vote on his nomination as a result.

Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey (D-N.Y.), who helped initiate an investigation into Crawford's departure by the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services, said that further digging into Crawford's finances should and will continue.

"By blatantly ignoring the law on financial holdings and conflicts of interest, Lester Crawford used his position as the head of the FDA to send all the wrong signals to other FDA employees and the American public," Hinchey said in a statement.

Crawford, trained as a veterinarian and pharmacologist, had previously served as deputy FDA commissioner and acting commissioner. The agency, which regulates almost one-quarter of the U.S. economy, has had a confirmed commissioner for less than two years since the Bush administration came into office.

McLaughlin To Face Corruption Charges (WNBC)

WNBC-TV, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082125

Assemblyman Expected To Surrender Tuesday

NEW YORK -- Corruption charges were expected to be filed against a top Queens political leader.

NewsChannel 4's Jonathan Dienst reported that Queens assemblyman Brian McLaughlin is expected in federal court on Tuesday. The expected corruption charges relate to McLaughlin's work as one of the city's power brokers -- his years as an elected leader and also as one of the city's top union leaders.

The charges could cap a multi-year corruption investigation by the city's Department of Investigation, the FBI and Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office. Sources said McLaughlin is expected to surrender in the morning, and federal prosecutors are expected to announce corruption charges against him.

McLaughlin has denied any wrongdoing, NewsChannel 4 reported. McLaughlin, a longtime Democratic assemblyman, has announced that he would not be seeking another term.

In March, Department of Investigation detectives and FBI agents raided McLaughlin's district office in Queens, and they also seized documents from the West 16th Street offices of the Central Labor Council. Soon after the raids, McLaughlin resigned as the head of the umbrella union organization.

Investigators had been focusing as to whether McLaughlin was helping certain street lighting companies in a possible bid-rigging scheme. Investigators wanted to know whether he asked for cash and/or gifts from individuals or companies. There were also questions raised about expenses he submitted as an assemblyman, and how he was able to pay for a vacation home on Long Island's north shore.

Labor Leader Is Expected To Face U.S. Corruption Charges (NYT)

By Andy Newman And William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

The union leader Brian M. McLaughlin, the head of the country's largest municipal labor council and a powerful force in New York City politics for more than a decade, is expected to surrender on federal corruption charges today, two law enforcement officials said last night.

Mr. McLaughlin, 54, the president of the New York City Central Labor Council and a seven-term Democratic state assemblyman from Queens, has been under investigation in a possible scheme to rig bids on multimillion-dollar city contracts for streetlights, officials have said.

Investigators were also looking at whether he received improper payments from electrical contractors.

Details of the charges were unavailable last night, but an official, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing, said that they would be announced at a news conference today.

Neither Mr. McLaughlin nor his lawyer could be reached by phone last night. Mr. McLaughlin has consistently denied wrongdoing.

The official said that Mr. McLaughlin would probably be the only person charged today but that the investigation, by the F.B.I., the federal Labor Department, the city's Department of Investigation and the United States attorney's office in Manhattan, was continuing.

A spokesman for the F.B.I. and a spokeswoman for the United States attorney in Manhattan declined to comment last night.

Mr. McLaughlin's group, which represents a million workers in 400 union locals, has been a prominent supporter of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, lending its weight both to Mr. Bloomberg's re-election bid last year and to the mayor's ill-fated plan for a football stadium on the West Side of Manhattan.

The F.B.I. raided Mr. McLaughlin's union office in March, as well as his Assembly district office in Flushing. In August, Mr. McLaughlin went on paid leave from his union post, which he has held for 10 years. Although he had publicly entertained the notion of running for mayor himself not long ago, he announced in January that he would not run for re-election to the Assembly this year, in order to devote more time to the labor movement. Mr. McLaughlin, a former electrician, was also the longtime director of the street lamps division of the city's main union of electrical workers.

In March, law enforcement officials said they were looking into whether Mr. McLaughlin played a role in a scheme in which contractors were thought to have divvied up the work of putting up traffic and street lights in the city. They also said that contractors may have given Mr. McLaughlin use of an American Express card.

The city's streetlight contracts were bid on every three years, and each year the same companies won the contracts, law enforcement officials have said.

One firm alone, Petrocelli Electric Company, has been awarded more than $90 million of the $150 million the city has paid for new lights since 1999. Investigators have also raided Petrocelli's headquarters.

A spokesman for Petrocelli Electric said in March that the company's lawyers had been told by officials at the United States attorney's office that neither the company or any of its officers or employees were under criminal investigation.

A telephone message seeking comment left with the company's answering service late last night was not returned.

The inquiry into the streetlight contracts goes back to at least 2001, law enforcement officials have said.

After Mr. McLaughlin's offices were raided in March, city officials acknowledged that Mr. Bloomberg knew Mr. McLaughlin was a target of an investigation even before the mayor accepted the labor council's support, but said that he did not know the details of the investigation.

Mr. McLaughlin worked intensely with officials from more than a dozen unions to line up the council's endorsement of Mr. Bloomberg.

A spokesman for Mr. Bloomberg declined to comment last night on Mr. McLaughlin.

For years, Mr. McLaughlin led the annual Labor Day Parade and led the union campaign — successful so far — to keep Wal-Mart out of New York City.

He has been courted by business leaders, bishops and real estate developers and was a major figure in last year's transit strike. Labor leaders said he restored the Central Labor Council's influence and prestige after years of decline.

Murdered Teen's Family Wants FBI Probe (LCJ)

By Jim Adams

Louisville Courier-Journal, October 17, 2006

The father of Jessica Melissa Currin, an 18-year-old Mayfield woman murdered in the Western Kentucky town in 2000, rallied with about 15 supporters at noon Monday in downtown Louisville to call for the FBI to investigate her unsolved killing.

The group, joined by the Rev. Louis Coleman, stood in a cold rain for more than an hour — first outside the Gene Snyder U.S. Courthouse at Sixth Street and Broadway, and then the nearby Romano Mazzoli Federal Building, 600 Martin Luther King Jr. Place – carrying signs demanding "Justice for Jessica."

Joe Currin, the father of the young woman, also was joined by Alton McDonald, of Tacoma, Wash., a representative of the Rev. Al Sharpton's National Action Network.

The murder was the subject of a story in Sunday's Courier-Journal, which catalogued mistakes police have made in the investigation.

Jessica Currin had been dead for about 48 hours when her body — strangled, beaten, stabbed and burned — was found on Aug. 1, 2000, on the back lawn of Mayfield Middle School.

The investigation for its first three years was headed by the Mayfield Police Department, but the Mayfield department's mishandling of evidence caused the dismissal of criminal charges against three people in 2003. The Mayfield department then turned the case over to Kentucky State Police.

The office of the Kentucky attorney general has recently taken over the role of prosecutor in the case, and is assisting state police in investigating the murder.

McDonald Monday delivered a letter to the FBI offices in Louisville yesterday which alleged that Mayfield police "intentionally and deliberately mishandled Jessica's murder, tampered with evidence and conspired to cover up her murder." McDonald also said at the rally that he believes the murder was a hate crime.

A spokesman for the FBI office in Louisville was not immediately available to respond to McDonald's letter.

Joe Currin said at the rally, "As long as I am alive and as long as I'm healthy enough, I will continue until we get justice."

Pellicano Resists Effort To Delay Trial (LAT)

By Chuck Philips And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

The private eye, accused of racketeering and wiretapping, refuses to join prosecutors and five co-defendants in waiting until next September.

The long-awaited racketeering and wiretapping trial of indicted Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano and six others is likely to be postponed again for months if federal prosecutors and defense attorneys can scale one significant hurdle: Pellicano.

Though attorneys for the government and five of Pellicano's co-defendants have agreed to delay the trial date until September 2007, Pellicano has so far resisted, eager to move forward with the case after spending years behind bars.

"Either take me to trial or let me out," Pellicano said in a telephone interview Saturday from the Metropolitan Detention Center in downtown Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0082127

If U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer agrees with Pellicano, the central figure in the case, the trial would continue as scheduled in February or perhaps on a date far short of the one-year delay now agreed to by the government and all but one other defendant.

The proposed delay was outlined in a stipulation jointly filed by prosecutors and defense attorneys Monday, the deadline for filing substantive pretrial motions in the case. The deadline was set in anticipation of a trial beginning Feb. 13.

According to the stipulation, the delay was necessary for defense attorneys to review the voluminous evidence, including 150,000 pages of documents and 443 recorded conversations, already turned over in the case.

"Counsel for defendants and for the government have … determined that the length of the requested continuance is necessary to accommodate for conflicts in counsel's schedules and to permit defense counsel to complete their necessary trial preparation," the stipulation reads.

The agreement was signed by attorneys for all of the defendants except Pellicano and Daniel Nicherie, who is representing himself, and, like Pellicano, remains in custody. Neither Nicherie nor anyone assisting in his defense could be reached for comment.

In response to Monday's stipulation, Pellicano's attorney, Steven Gruel, filed court papers asking that his client's case move forward without the other defendants because Pellicano was "ready for trial" and was entitled to a speedy resolution of the charges against him.

"Here, a one-year delay from the stipulation date to the proposed trial date renders it unreasonable," Gruel wrote.

He said the delay was particularly unreasonable because the government has opposed releasing Pellicano on bail pending trial.

Pellicano, 61, has been locked up without bail since his indictment in February. His incarceration came as he was about to complete a 30-month sentence at a federal prison in Bakersfield after pleading guilty to charges of storing hand grenades and plastic explosives in his Sunset Strip offices.

Fischer has repeatedly made it clear that she wants the high-profile case to move forward as quickly as possible. But she has acknowledged that the case's complexity will dictate how fast the trial can proceed and whether delays are warranted in the interest of justice.

Under federal law, defendants have a right to trial within 70 days of their arraignment, though exceptions can be made in cases that are particularly complex with multiple defendants, complicated evidence or other factors. Pellicano and all six co-defendants have previously waived their rights to speedy trial.

Since their indictment early this year, Pellicano and his co-defendants have maintained that they are innocent of the grand jury charges that they used wiretaps and confidential police records to give the private eye's clients the upper hand in lawsuits and business disputes.

Pellicano has been particularly dismissive of the government's allegations, repeatedly denying that the FBI and U.S. attorney's office have any real evidence that he broke the law.

"These prosecutors have been working on this investigation for four years now and have come up with nothing," Pellicano said in a recent interview.

Pellicano said authorities approached him again during the summer to discuss a possible plea bargain. But, he said, he rejected their offer as he has numerous times before.

"Why do they keep coming to me and asking me to settle?" he asked, rhetorically. "I'll tell you why: Because I'm innocent. And I'm ready for my day in court."

Assistant U.S. Atty. Daniel Saunders declined to comment about Pellicano's remarks, as did Gruel, Pellicano's attorney.

*

chuck.philips@latimes.com
greg.krikorian@latimes.com

Coin Dealer Trial Begins In Ohio Scandal (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Seewer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

(AP) - TOLEDO, Ohio-Less than a month before Election Day, a politically connected coin dealer accused of embezzling from a state investment in rare coins went on trial Monday in a scandal that has rocked Ohio's Republican Party.

Tom Noe, 52, is accused of stealing more than $2 million from a fund for injured workers and spending it on his business and renovating his home in the Florida Keys.

"He needed money. He needed it desperately," prosecutor John Weglian said in opening statements.

DOJ_NMG_0082128

Noe, once a member of state boards that oversee the Ohio Turnpike and Ohio's public universities, was a top GOP fundraiser who gave more than $105,000 to Republicans, including President Bush and Gov. Bob Taft during the 2004 campaign.

He is charged with corrupt activity, theft, money laundering and forgery. If convicted, he could get up to 10 years in prison on the corrupt activity charge alone.

Defense attorney William Wilkinson said Noe's contract with the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation allowed him to borrow money from the investment fund or loan it to others.

"You can't steal something from the owner of property if they give you permission to use it," Wilkinson said.

Federal prosecutors have not said whether any of the coin money was used for political contributions. If the state money had been funneled to campaigns, authorities could have sought a stiffer penalty.

The scandal has raised Democrats' hopes of retaking the governor's office from the GOP, which has dominated the state since 1990. Democratic Rep. Ted Strickland has held a double-digit lead in the polls over Republican nominee Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state.

The state invested $50 million with Noe from 1998 to 2001, but Weglian said he spent only a fraction of that figure on coins.

Prosecutors said Noe kept two sets of financial records - one for the workers' comp agency and one for his own business. When state officials wanted to check on the status of the coins Noe told them he had bought, he created false documents and borrowed coins from other dealers to trick investigators, Weglian said.

"If Tom Noe wasn't a thief, he wouldn't have had two sets of books," Weglian said.

Wilkinson said the workers' comp agency gave Noe wide authority to manage the investment and that he spent millions buying other collectibles such as historical documents and rare paintings. He also said the workers' comp fund will end up showing a profit because of Noe's investments in collectibles.

In a different case, Noe pleaded guilty earlier this year to funneling $45,000 to Bush's re-election campaign and was sentenced last month to more than two years in federal prison. He will not begin that sentence until after the state charges are resolved.

Investigations into the coin investments led to separate ethics charges against Gov. Bob Taft, who pleaded no contest last year to failing to report golf outings and other gifts.

The trial is expected to last at least six weeks, through the Nov. 7 election.

Ralphs To Pay $70 Million, In Strike Settlement (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

A federal judge today approved the Ralphs grocery chain's guilty plea to criminal charges that it illegally rehired locked-out workers during the Southern California supermarket labor dispute almost three years ago.

Under the agreement, Ralphs will pay $20 million in fines and $50 million into a fund to reimburse workers and their union.

Ralphs also agreed to cooperate with the government in its ongoing investigation of the role corporate executives played in the scheme, which involved using fake names and Social Security numbers to hide the identities of workers illegally rehired during the dispute.

U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson said the company's pledge to cooperate was a key factor in his decision to approve the agreement. The government is investigating the actions of "a number of Ralphs employees," the judge said, and the plea deal doesn't restrict the government's probe.

Ralphs has agreed to waive attorney client privilege, giving investigators access to interviews and memos from the company's internal investigation of the scheme, Assistant U.S. Atty. Adam Braun said.

Braun declined to comment on how high up the company's chain of command the probe could lead.

According to the plea agreement, "Ralphs' vice president of human resources, at least one group vice president and a number of zone managers encouraged, condoned, permitted or directed the rehiring of locked-out employees under false names and Social Security numbers during the lockout."

A Ralphs spokesman declined to comment on the investigation.

The government has said that it won't prosecute rank-and-file workers who were illegally hired as long as they cooperate with investigators.

Anderson signed off on the plea bargain over the objections of a handful of Ralphs workers who appeared in court to protest that their employer was getting off too lightly.

DOJ_NMG_0082129

"This plea agreement is neither fair nor equitable," said Michael Ward, a 20-year veteran of Ralphs and Alpha Beta. "They are being allowed to settle for dimes on the dollar."

Other employees spoke in favor of the agreement.

"Would I like more? Of course I would. Nothing's perfect," said Faye Gibson, a 30-year Ralphs employee. "It's a been a long time. We really need a sense of closure."

Anderson approved the appointment of a so-called special master to oversee the $50 million restitution fund. Most of the money from the fund will be paid to Ralphs employees who were locked out during the strike and applied for restitution.

Union officials estimated that some workers could receive as much as $3,000 from the settlement.

Money from the fund will also be used to reimburse the grocery workers union, the United Food and Commercial Workers, for benefits paid to workers during the 4½-month dispute.

Although he approved the plea agreement, Anderson postponed formal sentencing until Nov. 1 while loose ends are tied up.

In addition to paying the fine and restitution, the deal calls for Ralphs to be placed on three years' probation and establish court-supervised training programs for its workers.

Ralphs agreed June 30 to plead guilty to five felony charges included in a 53-count grand jury indictment returned against the company in December.

Ralphs was charged with violating federal laws by secretly rehiring about 1,000 locked out workers during the dispute, which lasted from October 2003 until February 2004 and involved Ralphs and rival Southern California supermarket chains Vons and Albertsons.

Ralphs' parent company, Cincinnati-based Kroger Co., was not charged in the case.

In Shadows Of Net, War On Child Porn Rages (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, October 17, 2006

As pedophiles swarm the Internet, an unprecedented war against child pornography is intensifying.

Internet service providers such as AOL are using sophisticated technology to identify porn sites. Credit card companies are tracking purchases. More police detectives are posing as minors online.

“We have hit the tipping point,” says Michelle Collins, director of the child exploitation unit at the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children. She says high-profile cases such as that of John Mark Karr, the former suspect in the JonBenét Ramsey slaying, have made the public realize that pornographic pictures of children are crime-scene photos. Karr was freed from a California jail this month after 5-year-old charges of possessing child porn were thrown out when police said that evidence had disappeared.

“There is a lot of unprecedented activity. It's just meeting the escalating problem,” says Drew Oosterbaan, chief of the Justice Department's child exploitation section. In the past four months:

•President Bush signed a bill to increase the number of prosecutors, computer forensic examiners and federal-state task forces assigned to child porn. It tripled to $150,000 the maximum penalty for downloading child porn and allows adults photographed when they were kids to sue those who buy, sell or distribute the photos.

•The National Center for Missing & Exploited Children launched a victim identification lab to share pornographic photos — with graphic details obscured — with police agencies nationwide. The goal: Find victims by identifying background elements in a picture that will lead to the location of abuse.

•Five Internet service providers, criticized by such lawmakers as Democratic Rep. Bart Stupak of Michigan for not doing enough, announced they will build a database. The companies — AOL, Yahoo, Microsoft, Earthlink and United Online — will give each picture a signature and then scan their sites for matches.

•The national center has begun giving daily notices of every reported porn site to Internet service providers registered with its CyberTipline. If police are not investigating the site, a company can close it or block subscriber access.

•Credit card firms representing 87% of the U.S. market have formed a coalition to let police and the national center know about porn sites their customers use. The aim: End the profit by 2008 by making arrests and closing pornographers' accounts.

•Public service ads that teach kids and parents how to recognize a pedophile's online lures are being funded by, among others, the Justice Department and MySpace.com, a website popular with teens.

A study by the University of New Hampshire found that 34% of kids 10-17 saw unwanted sexual material online in the past year, up from 25% five years ago.

Despite all the activity, those on the front lines say they are losing the war against child pornography.

DOJ_NMG_0082130

“The images are propagating faster than we can police. It's far worse than people realize,” says Wyoming police investigator Flint Waters. He co-chairs the technology committee of the Internet Crimes Against Children program, a network of 46 regional task forces.

In the past 24 months, Waters says, the task forces have identified 6.5 million pornographic pictures of children online, up from 3,600 three years ago. Forty percent originated in the USA.

“We're constantly playing catch-up,” says Waters, who has developed software that identifies the location of porn distributors. “The funding hasn't kept up with the problem. If you quadruple my funding, I still couldn't keep up.”

A key reason is that much child porn isn't about money but pedophilia, the sexual attraction to kids. Many images are traded free like baseball cards.

“It's an extension of child molestation — another sick feature,” says inspector Jane Wilcox of the Toronto Sex Crimes Unit, which worked with the U.S. Justice Department to bust a porn ring in March that included a Sunday school teacher, a soccer referee, a mailman and a computer software engineer. In a chat room they used, a man broadcast a live video of himself molesting an 11-month-old baby.

Few victims report the abuse. Of more than 800 online child-porn victims identified by the national center, Collins says only about 30 blew the whistle. She says some are too young to describe what happened. Others are afraid. More than a third, 36%, were abused by a parent, 10% to 15% by another relative and 30% by other people they know. About 10% are enticed by strangers to post photos; 5% do it unasked.

Pedophiles can be treated but not cured, says Fred Berlin of the Johns Hopkins Sexual Disorders Clinic. He says many want treatment, but few get it in prison or after their release. Berlin says some child porn users don't realize they may be committing a federal offense that could send them to prison and require them to register as a sex offender. “The Internet blurs the distinction between reality and fantasy,” he says.

The Internet's seeming anonymity lures otherwise law-abiding men to child porn, says Patrick Carnes, author of In the Shadows of the Net: Breaking Free of Compulsive Online Sexual Behavior. He calls the Internet the “crack cocaine” of sex addiction: “It moves people into areas they would not otherwise go.”

Carnes says users may be emotionally immature. “At heart, they're still 14,” he says. Online, he says, they find others who share their interests and, feeling validated, soon become heavy viewers.

More than 99% of those arrested for possessing child porn are men, according to a 2005 study funded by the Justice Department. Most, 83%, had images of prepubescent kids; 80% had pictures of sexual penetration.

Another reason online child porn is difficult to stop is that predators are adept at avoiding detection.

Police are “right to feel outgunned. It's not only a matter of resources but of skill,” says Philip Jenkins, author of Beyond Tolerance: Child Pornography on the Internet. He says child pornographers started using the Internet in the early 1980s, a 20-year head start on police, and they know how to cover their cybertracks.

Some pedophiles use private Internet radio stations and chat groups to trade ideas on evading detection. If credit card companies close their accounts, some move to alternate online payment services.

They set up “modeling” sites featuring scantily clad young girls in seductive poses and contend that such sites are legal because they do not show genitalia, but people operating such sites have been prosecuted. Sheila Sellinger of Indiana pleaded guilty this year to selling pornographic images of a 10-year-old girl. She got an 11-year prison sentence.

Predators entice kids with gifts and compliments to post provocative pictures of themselves online.

“The seduction was slow. Each request only went a bit further than the last,” Justin Berry, 19, told a congressional panel in April. When he was 13, he testified, men he met online asked him to film himself with his shirt off. He did so with his webcam, and they sent him money and gifts in the mail.

For five years, he ran a porn site viewed by more than a thousand men who paid him to strip naked, masturbate and have sex with female prostitutes on camera. At least two men have been charged, including Gregory Mitchell, who was sentenced in July to 150 years in prison.

Prosecution can be challenging. Sometimes evidence is lacking, because few Internet companies keep information on users' e-mail and website visits for long. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has asked companies to retain such data, but some have balked over questions of cost and customers' privacy.

Some pornographers use web-hosting or domain registry companies to set up sites. Unlike Internet service providers, they are not required to report porn to police. Some pornographers are based overseas. Most countries don't consider possessing child porn a crime, and 122 have no laws against distributing it online, according to the International Centre for Missing & Exploited Children in Alexandria, Va.

DOJ_NMG_0082131

Organized crime is involved in some of those global operations, says Carlos Ortiz, a former assistant U.S. attorney in Newark who tracked down a Florida company called Connections USA that was processing $1 million a month in credit card purchases of child porn and sending the money to a company in Belarus. The investigation led to more than 1,200 arrests.

"I'm really worried. It's tough to find a technical fix," says investigator Waters, who is trying to refine his software so it can track an image's distribution.

Hours spent looking at disturbing images are "brutal," he says. To cheer him, his wife hung a photo in his office of a man dressed as Santa Claus holding their two kids. Shortly after the picture was taken, Waters discovered the man trying to lure teen girls online.

"We're always faced with problems that are bigger than we can address," says Justice Department's Drew Oosterbaan. He says the department is trying to use existing resources more effectively. "Is it enough? Probably not."

Still, a growth in arrests provides hope, says David Finkelhor, director of the Crimes Against Children Research Center at the University of New Hampshire. "As more people get caught, others may get very nervous, and we may see a slowdown in traffic."

Business Group Wants More Money To Fight Intellectual Piracy (CONGDAILY)

By Bill Swindell, CongressDaily

CongressDaily, October 17, 2006

A business coalition is aiming to secure during the lame-duck session more federal funding to crack down on piracy of U.S. products and counterfeit goods.

The Coalition Against Counterfeiting and Piracy, which represents moviemakers, auto parts manufacturers and pharmaceutical companies, has waged a campaign to lobby for more funding to stem the flow of fake goods into the United States. However, in the aftermath of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, lawmakers have focused primarily on beefing up security against acts of terrorism.

"Obviously, we are competing against terrorism, and that is most important. I always say priorities one through 10 are always terrorism and homeland security. But I hope to think that intellectual property rights is a distant eleventh. It's extremely important," said Michael Zaneis, executive director for the technology and e-commerce department at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Zaneis noted that counterfeiting and piracy has a huge economic impact on business, resulting in $250 billion in sales losses each year.

Appropriators this year have responded to such pleas. The House fiscal 2007 Science-State-Justice Appropriations bill would provide for at least $13 million for intellectual property rights enforcement, with directions that the FBI increase the number of prosecutors and agents working such cases. The Senate version of the bill would provide $6 million for such efforts.

The Senate bill also would create a unit at FBI headquarters that would house at least five full-time agents to work those cases and two additional agents for each of the agency's 18 computer hacking and intellectual property units scattered across the country.

"We like the House language, but want to get the specificity of the Senate language to make sure the money is used for these exact purposes," Zaneis said.

The coalition also is advocating passage of legislation sponsored by Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and ranking member Max Baucus, D-Mont., that would overhaul the Bureau of Customs and Border Protection. The measure would create a new intellectual property rights division within the Homeland Security Department that would coordinate anti-piracy efforts throughout the country, for example, providing staff to help confirm whether seizures at such high-traffic areas as the ports of Newark and Long Beach, Calif., are indeed counterfeit items.

Lobbyists were unsuccessful in advocating inclusion of the provisions in the recently passed port security bill. "They are spread out to some extent. We need to get them where they need to be," Zaneis said.

Victims' Families Sentenced To Silence (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

Judge allows relatives of five who were killed to attend the trial only if they remain composed.

Day after day, the aging Ukrainian couple has stepped into a federal courtroom in downtown Los Angeles to endure a severe test of wills: listening to the details of their son Alexander's killing while containing their emotions.

DOJ_NMG_0082132

They sit stoically in the front, Elisabeth Umansky with her jaw set and hands clasped, her husband Ruven with his head back, peering through his bifocals. When a key witness tells of pulling a rope tight around Alexander's neck and of a plastic bag being sucked into his nostrils, Elisabeth lets out a deep sigh, closes her eyes and folds forward. Ruven squeezes her shoulder.

But they stay put, taking in every detail as if to recover lost moments with their son.

The couple and five other relatives of the victims had to fight to win the right to attend the trial of the two men accused of kidnapping and murdering their son and four other Los Angeles business people.

Iouri Mikhel and Jurijus Kadamovas are accused of luring the five victims to their upscale San Fernando Valley homes in 2001 and 2002, holding them for ransom, killing them and dumping their bodies in a reservoir in the Sierra foothills. Prosecutors say the conspiracy was, in part, directed by organized crime figures in Russia. The defendants face the death penalty.

Before the trial began Sept. 6, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian banned the victims' relatives from court, both because they might be called as witnesses later and because the presence of tearful and emotional relatives could prejudice the jury against the defendant.

The Umanskys and other relatives begged Tevrizian to reconsider. "We have been patient and cooperative, and the possibility of not attending this trial brings us inexplicable pain," they wrote in a letter. "Please allow us to ease a bit of suffering and have questions looming over us answered."

Prosecutors appealed the ruling and won, arguing that a 2004 congressional act gave victims and family members explicit rights to attend trials.

The issue is particularly relevant because last week, the U.S. Supreme Court took up a case that also involves courtroom expressions by a victim's relatives. The case stems from a 1995 murder conviction in San Jose, which was overturned by an appeals court because three relatives of the victim wore buttons with small photos of him in court.

In the Los Angeles case, Tevrizian has admonished family members to remain composed.

That became a particularly wrenching test in recent days as Ainar Altmanis took the stand and laid out a step-by-step account of the abductions and deaths. His testimony is expected to continue today.

Altmanis is the U.S. attorney's key witness in the trial, having admitted to taking part in the murder conspiracy. He entered into a plea agreement in 2002 to avoid the death sentence in exchange for life in prison. The defense is expected to attack his credibility and attempt to pin the murders on him alone.

As he spoke last week, the victims' families took in every word they could endure. They convulsed and squinted hard to hold back the tears. When it was too much to bear, they left the room and shuffled back in later. And they watched the man accused of masterminding all of this, Mikhel, 41, gaze around, sometimes at them, with arched eyebrows and an unreadable expression.

The Umanskys sat stone-faced through most of the testimony. Their son Alexander, 35, owned a car electronics business and, according to prosecutors, was lured to Kadamovas' home in Sherman Oaks in December 2001 with the prospect of installing high-end electronic equipment in Mikhel's Range Rover.

Holding a pistol with a silencer and a stun gun, they seized him the moment he came through the door, handcuffed him and tied his legs to a chair with flex ties, Altmanis testified. Eventually he was told to contact his family to get a ransom of $234,000. Over four days, Ruven and Elisabeth and their other son, Michael, collected money from relatives and managed to transfer it to an account in the United Arab Emirates. Then the calls just stopped.

They called the FBI, which eventually traced the money to the defendants, prosecutors alleged. But the Umanskys did not learn of Alexander's fate until his body was dredged from the frigid depths of the New Melones Reservoir three months later.

Now in court, they heard Altmanis' account of what happened: How terrified and pale Alexander was, and how he was killed even as the defendants promised to keep him alive to get the last payments.

"There was this voice of Mikhel so sharp and so fast like a thundercloud, telling Umansky to open his mouth," Altmanis said.

The Umanskys' faces tightened in agony, and Ruven put his arm around his wife. Mikhel's jaw muscles flexed as he stared at his onetime friend. Altmanis continued: Mikhel shoved plastic bags in his mouth and pulled another bag tight over his head, as Kadamovas held his nostrils shut. When that didn't work, he said, Mikhel and Altmanis wrapped a rope around his neck and pulled with all their might.

Even after all that, it looked as though Alexander was still breathing, Altmanis testified.

"Mikhel said, 'No, it happens sometimes. He still has air in his body.' So he kicked him and the air went out and the motion stopped."

DOJ_NMG_0082133

Nancy Muscatel's husband met a similar fate in October 2001. Meyer Muscatel, a Sherman Oaks real estate developer, didn't come home from work one night, and for five months his wife had no idea what happened. Now, she said, she needed to hear the details of his final days.

"It's like needing to go through it with him," she said. "And be there in a way … so he wouldn't be alone."

According to prosecutors, he had been lured into captivity by the prospect of a real estate deal and spent two days tied to a chair at Mikhel's Encino home.

Altmanis said he often guarded Muscatel and at one point made himself a ham sandwich and offered one to his captive.

"He smelled it and asked what it was," Altmanis testified. "He said he didn't eat it because he ate only kosher."

In the second row, Nancy Muscatel's eyes welled up — with mingled pride and longing, she would say later — and she squeezed them closed.

Altmanis testified that Mikhel realized Muscatel didn't have much money, and they couldn't get to the money he did have. He was of no use anymore.

When Altmanis went back to the house the next morning, he testified, the defendants were strangling Muscatel.

As he described the killing, Nancy Muscatel began to shake. Her two adult daughters bent over and wept in silence.

"Mikhel was pressing with knees on Muscatel's shoulders," Altmanis continued. "The bag was over Muscatel's head. He was clogging the ends of the bag so the air would not get inside."

Nancy Muscatel stood quietly, walked out of the courtroom and returned several minutes later to hear of her husband's body being thrown off the Parrotts Ferry Bridge.

But at the end of the day, Nancy Muscatel clung to the image of her husband refusing to eat the ham sandwich. "He wasn't going to give in," she said. "He wasn't going to compromise his values. That was Meyer."

*

joe.mozingo@latimes.com

Criminal Records Erased By Courts Live To Tell Tales (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

In 41 states, people accused or convicted of crimes have the legal right to rewrite history. They can have their criminal records expunged, and in theory that means that all traces of their encounters with the justice system will disappear.

But enormous commercial databases are fast undoing the societal bargain of expungement, one that used to give people who had committed minor crimes a clean slate and a fresh start.

Most states seal at least some records of juvenile offenses. Many states also allow adults arrested for or convicted of minor crimes like possessing marijuana, shoplifting or disorderly conduct to ask a judge, sometimes after a certain amount of time has passed without further trouble, to expunge their records. If the judge agrees, the records are destroyed or sealed.

But real expungement is becoming significantly harder to accomplish in the electronic age. Records once held only in paper form by law enforcement agencies, courts and corrections departments are now routinely digitized and sold in bulk to the private sector. Some commercial databases now contain more than 100 million criminal records. They are updated only fitfully, and expunged records now often turn up in criminal background checks ordered by employers and landlords.

Thomas A. Wilder, the district clerk for Tarrant County in Fort Worth, said he had received harsh criticism for refusing, on principle, to sell criminal history records in bulk.

“How the hell do I expunge anything,” Mr. Wilder asked, “if I sell tapes and disks all over the country?”

Private database companies say they are diligent in updating their records to reflect the later expungement of criminal records. But lawyers, judges and experts in criminal justice say it is common for people to lose jobs and housing over information in databases that courts have ordered expunged.

These critics say that even the biggest vendors do not always update their records promptly and thoroughly and that many smaller ones use outdated, incomplete and sometimes inaccurate data.

Lida Rodriguez-Taseff, a lawyer in Miami, tells her clients that expungement is a waste of time. “To tell someone their record is gone is essentially to lie to them,” Ms. Rodriguez-Taseff said. “In an electronic age, people should understand that once they have been convicted or arrested that will never go away.”

Judge Stanford Blake, whose court often enters expungement orders, said his inability to make them effective had left him feeling frustrated and helpless.

“It’s a horrible situation,” said Judge Blake, the administrative judge of the criminal division of the Eleventh Circuit Court in Miami. “It’s the ultimate Big Brother, always watching you.”

DOJ_NMG_0082134

The rise in the availability of criminal histories has been accompanied by a surge in demand for them. Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, criminal background checks have become routine in many employment applications.

"Something like 80 percent of large- or medium-sized employers now do background checks," said Debbie A. Mukamal, the director of the Prisoner Reentry Institute at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York. "Employers need to know about job-related convictions to make a nuanced, responsible decision so that they can protect themselves and the public and give people a fair shot at employment."

But the current system, Ms. Mukamal added, is not working. "It's unfettered," she said. "It's not regulated. There's misinformation."

ChoicePoint, one of the larger database companies, performed nine million background checks last year, said Matt Furman, a spokesman. The company's error rate is very small, Mr. Furman said. "One out of every thousand background checks has led to a consumer contact" disputing or complaining about the information provided, he said, "and one of a thousand contacts results in a change."

There have been only a few lawsuits taking issue with the information provided to employers in background checks.

In one, filed in June in federal court in Brooklyn, Victor Guevares sued a company that had offered him a job and a database company that he says caused the offer to be withdrawn.

Mr. Guevares, now 33, was convicted of disorderly conduct more than a decade ago. New York considers that a violation like a traffic infraction rather than a crime and bars database companies from reporting such offenses to employers.

But Acxiom, a database company, reported the disorderly conduct charges to the Tyco Healthcare Group, which had offered Mr. Guevares a job in 2004. Tyco promptly withdrew the offer, one that would have doubled Mr. Guevares's salary, to $46,000. It based its decision, his lawsuit says, on its mistaken understanding that he had committed a misdemeanor and had lied on his application about whether he had ever been "convicted of any crime which was not expunged or sealed by a court."

Mr. Guevares, a gregarious man with a shaved head and big brown eyes, said that losing the job, which would have propelled his family into the middle class, devastated him. "I've never been arrested," he said. "I've never been locked up. I've never done jail time."

In court papers, both companies denied wrongdoing, and Tyco has sued Acxiom for breach of contract.

Catherine H. O'Neill, a lawyer with the Legal Action Center, which represents Mr. Guevares, said Acxiom deserved much of the blame.

"They should not have been vacuuming up this information in the first place," Ms. O'Neill said.

A lawyer for Acxiom and a spokesman for Tyco declined to comment.

There is often plenty of fault to go around. Even within the government, various agencies often fail to coordinate their records.

"The problem often arises," said Ms. Rodriguez-Taseff, the Miami lawyer, "because so many agencies have access to criminal records — the department of corrections, the police, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement and the courts. Even though you have an expunged record, oftentimes a policing agency or a corrections facility allows private entities to gain access to it."

Some state laws place the burden on employers, on the apparent theory that the problem is not the availability of information but the use to which it is put. Illinois, for instance, prohibits prospective employers from asking about or making decisions based on expunged or sealed criminal histories.

A Minnesota man who agreed to talk about his experiences in exchange for anonymity said an expunged 1992 felony conviction — he declined to say for what — and erroneous information about a crime he did not commit have kept him from obtaining work for six months.

He said the database companies he contacted had been responsive if not especially fast in clearing up the problem. Some told him they updated their records annually. "I don't think the consumer reporting agencies mean to be" reporting inaccurate or sealed information, he said. "They just need to get new CD's."

In November 2005, a Florida woman obtained a court order expunging records concerning her arrest in a domestic dispute the previous spring. The judge ordered the state and local police, the county sheriff and the court clerk to "expunge all information concerning indicia of arrest or criminal history."

But when the woman tried to buy a condominium this summer, the arrest nonetheless popped up in a routine background check. The deal fell through.

"It's going to haunt her for the rest of her life," said a relative of the woman, who shared court and Internet search records in exchange for a promise not to identify her or her family. "They're using public records at a given point in time and they're not updating them, and they're ruining people's lives."

DOJ_NMG_0082135

Margaret Colgate Love, the nation's pardon attorney for most of the 1990's and the author of a new book called "Relief from the Collateral Consequences of a Criminal Conviction," said problems like these were rooted in the nature of expungement.

"It does reveal," Ms. Love said, "how perilous it is to build a public policy on a lie."

State Investigates Spending By Suspended Mayor (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Investigators from the Maryland State Prosecutor's office searched the home of the suspended mayor of Forest Heights yesterday, adding a criminal probe to the catalogue of palace intrigues that have roiled the tiny Prince George's County town for more than a year.

The investigation centers on spending by Mayor Myles Spires Jr., town officials familiar with the investigation said. Among the specific areas of interest, they said, are two disbursements of about $3,333 in public funds -- one to Spires and one to the nondenominational Internet church Abundant Life Ministries, of which he is bishop.

Until a few years ago in Forest Heights, a town of fewer than 1,000 homes tucked between Indian Head Highway and the District border, a single mayor governed for more than two decades. Spires was in office fewer than eight months when the Town Council suspended him Sept. 7.

The rapid collapse of his administration is particularly unsettling, officials and residents said, because he was appointed to restore integrity after Joyce Beck was driven from office by the council in January amid allegations that she knocked a former council member to the ground and slammed a door on a police officer's arm. Assault charges against Beck were dismissed.

"It's quite embarrassing," said Larry Stoner, the acting mayor.

Spires referred questions to his attorney, Timothy F. Maloney, who denied any misconduct and declined to address the specific allegations. "Mr. Spires is cooperating with the office of the state prosecutors," Maloney said. "He's confident that he's acted appropriately as mayor."

The state prosecutor, Robert A. Rohrbaugh, declined to comment on the search, saying he is prevented from discussing any aspect of any pending investigation. His office has the power to investigate ethics and election law violations, bribery and misconduct by public officials.

Though brief, Spires's tenure was turbulent: A residents group hired a private detective to dig into his background, and angry residents hurled accusations at packed town meetings. The relationship between him and the council has become so bitter and suspicious that after he was suspended, the locks were changed on the door to the mayor's office.

Several days later, when Spires returned to town hall to retrieve his computer, he tried to remove the door from its hinges, said Stoner and Town Council President Andrea McCutcheon, both of whom were present. McCutcheon said she took Spires for coffee, and Stoner removed the computer while they were out. The town later turned the computer over to the prosecutor's office.

Spires has filed a legal challenge to his suspension, McCutcheon said, alleging in part that the council improperly voted on it during a closed session. The council plans to meet tomorrow night to reaffirm the suspension in public session.

In a Sept. 7 letter to Stoner, McCutcheon detailed several instances in which she said Spires had spent town money improperly -- without, for example, seeking competitive bids or without required approvals.

The two disbursements for $3,333 were drawn from a line item in the budget, "Funding Administration," that McCutcheon said Spires created. According to budget documents, the line item is to pay "costs associated with grants acquisition and grants administration, public relations and other miscellaneous costs."

In the letter to Stoner, McCutcheon, a former police dispatcher, wrote that Spires sought the payments as an advance for mileage, meals and lodging. She said in an interview that he did not later provide any receipts. In town hall, it has been widely noted that the amount of each payment, issued in July and August, is equal to one month's portion of the total line item -- a sum that considerably exceeded the annual $2,600 stipend Spires received as mayor. The budget covered the fiscal year starting July 1.

"He got in here and really threw everyone for a loop," McCutcheon said.

Hit-run Deaths See 20% Increase (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, October 17, 2006

The number of pedestrians killed by hit-and-run drivers has jumped 20% since 2000 and is at its highest level in a decade, a USA TODAY analysis shows.

DOJ_NMG_0082136

The increase compounds the problems of investigating hit-and-run cases, which investigators say are among the most difficult crimes to solve because they often happen at night with no witnesses.

"Even if you're lucky enough to get the car, you can't always get the driver," says Richard Ashton of the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

Of the 4,881 pedestrians killed last year, 974 died in hit-and-runs, National Highway Traffic Safety Administration records show. The total number of pedestrians killed nationwide increased by about 2% since 2000, but hit-and-run deaths increased at almost 10 times that pace, the USA TODAY analysis found.

"It's an outrageous statistic," says Peter Kissinger, CEO of the AAA Foundation for Traffic Safety. He says that although the increase is difficult to explain, likely factors include more cars sharing the road with more pedestrians, and increasingly distracted and aggressive drivers.

"I think it's a sad commentary on our society," Kissinger says.

No national tally exists showing how many hit-and-run cases are solved. In many investigations in which drivers are later found, they tell police that they fled out of fear or because they had been drinking and wanted to avoid legal trouble, says Lt. Doug Dodson, a spokesman for the Florida Highway Patrol.

"By the time we find them, a lot of them are really eaten up with guilt," Dodson says.

The last time the USA had so many hit-and-run deaths was in 1996, when there were 982, records show. More than 5,400 pedestrians were killed that year.

Some of the crashes are deliberate attempts to hurt or kill. But in many others, drivers have done nothing wrong until they flee, says Michael Payne, a Fort Myers, Fla., investigator.

"Quite often, it's simply an accident," he says. "But people get scared."

Recent victims include Mary Kelley, 77, killed as she crossed the street March 2 in Fort Myers Beach, Fla., on her way home from dinner. The driver, Jeanne Rose Dunn, didn't stop and didn't report the crash until the next day, prosecutors allege.

Dunn would not comment because she is charged with a felony for leaving the scene of the crash. She told investigators that she thought a rock had hit her windshield, according to a police report, and that she did not realize what happened until she heard about Kelley's death on the radio.

The crash haunts Kelley's children. "I wonder what's in somebody's mind that they could just hit someone and drive away," says her son Kevin Kelley.

CIVIL LAW:

Bankruptcy Cases Down In Wake Of New Law (MH)

By Patrick Danner

The Miami Herald, October 17, 2006

A year after sweeping reforms to U.S. bankruptcy law took effect, the number of people seeking protection from their creditors is down. Way down.

Fewer than 5,200 South Floridians filed for bankruptcy in the past year -- less than half the number who filed in just the two weeks before the law took effect Oct. 17. The question is why.

Banks and credit card companies say the law has succeeded in making it harder for people to seek bankruptcy protection. But bankruptcy lawyers and trustees say the numbers are down now because some people rushed to court before the reforms, and because others believe -- wrongly -- that they can no longer file for bankruptcy.

"My biggest impression of what the new law has done is, it has baselessly scared people from filing for bankruptcy," said Timothy Kingcade, a Miami bankruptcy lawyer who says his business has been cut in half.

The laws were changed after an eight-year campaign by financial-service companies to cut down on credit card users who piled up debt and then wiggled out of repaying by filing for bankruptcy.

Under the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, a 500-page piece of legislation signed by President Bush in April 2005, debtors who can repay part of their debt are no longer allowed to simply wipe the slate clean.

They must complete a detailed "means test" to see if they are eligible for Chapter 7. They also must receive credit counseling before entering bankruptcy and take a financial-management course before exiting.

That reduces the opportunity for people to "game the system," said Wayne Abernathy, an executive director with the American Bankers Association. Instead, he said, more people go to a bank to work out problems instead of straight to bankruptcy court.

DOJ_NMG_0082137

But critics argue the new law translates into steeper legal fees, reams of paperwork and a more time-consuming process for debtors, such as Camiellia Smith.

Smith lost her hospital job, got sick and was hit with a foreclosure action on her Miami home, she said. Out-of-pocket costs to repair damage to her home from two hurricanes left her filing for Chapter 13 this month.

Smith wasn't pleased that she had to spend $50 to take a credit counseling course.

"Waste of time and waste of money," she said, adding she had to borrow cash to pay for the course. ``They didn't help me with anything. All they told me was my expenses were more than I make. A blind man could [see] that."

Critics also say the reforms have so far failed in the goal of directing more debtors from Chapter 7 liquidation into Chapter 13 reorganization, where they would repay some or all of their debts. The percentage of Chapter 13 cases in the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of Florida this year is relatively unchanged from most past years.

Under the new law, a single person in Florida earning more than $35,833 who files for Chapter 7 is means-tested to see if the case should be dismissed or converted to Chapter 13. For a family of four in Florida, the figure is just under $60,000.

But virtually all Chapter 7 filers fall below those income thresholds, according to trustees Alan Goldberg and Joel Tabas.

"It's been almost meaningless," Tabas said of the means testing.

Bankruptcy professionals say the vast majority of bankruptcy filers do so because of some catastrophic event, such as job loss, divorce, home foreclosure or major illness.

Bankruptcy attorneys say they now have to do background checks on the assets and liabilities of clients because the law requires them to attest to the information.

"It's a lot more work, no doubt about it," said attorney Richard Birkenwald from North Miami Beach. 'We can't just take our clients' word."

A survey of 714 bankruptcy attorneys this month found more than three-fourths said the time they spend on preparing a filing has increased by at least half. Less than 1 percent said the law has "mostly improved the results." The survey was done by the National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys.

Not everyone is complaining, however.

"If someone threatens me with bankruptcy and I know they have to go into Chapter 13, I say, go ahead," said Mike Goldberg, a Fort Lauderdale bankruptcy lawyer who represents creditors. ``It's a much more arduous process for them. It gives me a little bit more negotiating leverage."

Pembroke Pines lawyer Gerard Kouri Jr., who represents carmakers' finance units, said before the reforms, Chapter 13 debtors with an outstanding car loan could return the vehicle or negotiate a reduced amount to pay back. Now, for the most part, they either have to give back the car or continue payments in full.

"They have given my clients some of benefits that I used to have to fight for in the past," Kouri said.

One resulting drawback for him: He's now getting less work.

Overall, the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of Florida is on pace to handle fewer than 6,500 consumer bankruptcy petitions this year, down from 35,332 in 2005 and 25,914 in 2004. But the number of cases has ticked up slightly during the year.

"The present is a time of great uncertainty," noted a congressional report on the new law this summer. ``The picture should become clearer in 2007."

Bankruptcy's New Era (WP)

By Kathleen Day, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Filings Down Since Law Passed

Sharon Moore says life "felt like a whirlwind" after her seven-month-old restaurant in Portland, Maine, failed in February.

The 38-year-old single mother said she struggled to find work and keep up payments on a small-business loan and other debts that totaled more than $18,000. Late fees and other penalties sent her finances spiraling out of control.

In July, after working two jobs still didn't make ends meet, she filed for Chapter 13 bankruptcy protection. Under a court-sanctioned plan, her escalating penalty charges are halted, but she must make a fixed payment on her debt each month for the next five years. She can keep her house and car and, by the end, she says, will just about have repaid her obligations. Best of all, she says, "the creditor calls have stopped, and I can breathe again."

Moore is one of an estimated 450,000 people who have sought court protection from creditors since a new law took effect one year ago today that made filing for personal bankruptcy harder and more expensive. While that number may seem high, it is down by about 1 million from the average in the preceding four years.

Lawmakers, consumer advocates and industry executives say that much of the sudden drop in filings after Oct. 17, 2005, can be explained by the fact that 600,000 people filed in the two weeks before the law took effect, a scramble that was 10 times the normal level of filing over 10 business days in recent years.

But the filing rate for the first half of 2006, about 10,000 a week, is well below what could be attributed to last year's mad dash, surprising the lawmakers who wrote the legislation and the industry executives who lobbied for it. "So far, I think it is too soon to make firm judgments," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), one of the bill's chief architects.

The legislation, the most significant change to the nation's bankruptcy laws since 1978, was the culmination of a decade-long push by the credit card and auto-financing industries to make it harder for consumers to wipe out debts through bankruptcy. The new law toughened the rules with the intent of steering more debtors into a form of bankruptcy that requires people to repay more of their debts.

Typically, people file for one of two types of bankruptcy: Chapter 7 or Chapter 13. Under Chapter 7 bankruptcy, people can seek cancellation of most of their debts after some of their assets are sold to help creditors. Under Chapter 13, debtors must repay debts under a court-supervised repayment plan, as Moore is doing.

Industry executives had argued that about 10 percent of debtors filing each year for Chapter 7 under the old law, or about 100,000 people, abused the system because they could repay a large portion of their obligations and therefore should be required to do so under Chapter 13. Consumer groups and several lawmakers, mostly Democrats, argued that the number of Chapter 7 filers who misused the system is closer to 3 percent but that, in any case, the new legislation does little to weed them out.

The new law requires people seeking bankruptcy protection to pay higher filing fees and attend mandatory credit-counseling sessions with an accredited firm before and after they file. The goal is to discourage people from filing if they don't have to, and if they do, to pay off as much of their debt as possible.

Ed Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association, which fought hard for the bill, agrees that it's too soon to know the bill's impact but says the first year seems promising. "It seems to be wringing out people who abused the system, and those who really needed to file can do so," he said.

But projections about the long-term trend for bankruptcy filings vary widely. One major credit industry company privately estimates that consumer bankruptcy filings will top 1 million in 2007. The estimate was provided to The Washington Post on the condition that the company not be named because the projection is not public information. That estimate is still far below the 1.5 million in annual filings in the years before the law, though the company also predicts a "slow rate of return to historic levels."

Total filings have started to creep up. Two weeks ago, they hit a weekly rate of 15,000 -- halfway to the 30,000 level that was typical before the new law.

Filings such as Moore's under Chapter 13 may indicate a shift. While the number of total filings is down, the portion that are under Chapter 13 has risen significantly in the last year, accounting for about 40 percent of personal filings, up from 30 percent before the new law took effect.

"It's just too early to draw any grand conclusions," said Samuel J. Gerdano, executive director of the American Bankruptcy Institute, a nonprofit, nonpartisan research group. He said one reason that lower-than-expected filings have persisted is that people might be afraid or misinformed. He has heard of anecdotal evidence that some debt collectors are incorrectly telling consumers that the new bill bars bankruptcies or makes it nearly impossible to file, though no one has studied the matter.

"It's very possible there's consumer misunderstanding about the extent bankruptcy protection's available and at what cost and at what hassle," Gerdano said.

The National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys, which has opposed the law from its inception, said a survey of its members shows the new law is "failing on an across-the-board basis," adding little except paperwork and expense.

One part of the law that is being closely watched is a requirement that people seek credit counseling from a nonprofit agency approved by the Justice Department. The Internal Revenue Service earlier this year said it would seek to revoke the tax-exempt status of at least 41 of the nation's largest credit counseling agencies, which account for 40 percent of the industry's revenue, saying the firms appear to be primarily interested in making a profit rather than helping debt-burdened consumers.

The section of the Justice Department that oversees the nation's bankruptcy system is the U.S. Trustee Program. Its budget comes from the fees people and businesses pay to file for bankruptcy, and so far, it's approved 150 credit agencies to provide counseling.

Privately, program officials have expressed dual concerns that if bankruptcies return to former levels, there will be a critical shortage of approved counseling agencies. At the same time, if bankruptcies stay unexpectedly rare, the program may find itself short of operating funds.

DOJ_NMG_0082139

Trustee Program spokeswoman Jane Limprecht would only say the program has adequate funding and that there will be sufficient counseling if filings increase.

The National Foundation for Consumer Counseling, which represents many nonprofit firms, yesterday released a survey of its members that found that the industry has been able to handle the volume so far. But the survey also found that a firm's average cost of counseling a person is $50 but that on average it can collect only $40 to pay those costs.

Chapter 13 Filings Grow In Gulf Region (USAT)

By Kathy Chu And Barbara Hansen

USA Today, October 17, 2006

A year after a stricter federal bankruptcy law took effect, a growing number of filers in states hit by Hurricane Katrina are having to repay their debts rather than being able to eliminate them.

A big reason is that lenders are increasingly cracking down on past-due mortgage payments in the storm-ravaged Gulf region, consumer bankruptcy attorneys say. The tougher bankruptcy law, which took effect a year ago today, made it harder for people to file for Chapter 7, which erases most debts. Instead, some debtors have been forced to file under Chapter 13, which usually requires a debt-repayment plan.

After Katrina, most mortgage lenders agreed to postpone collecting overdue payments and foreclosing on homes in the Gulf region, at the urging of state regulators. But many lenders resumed collections this summer.

Homeowners in the Katrina region “are behind on their mortgage payments, the insurance companies aren't paying up and they're trying to keep their homes,” says Brad Botes, a lawyer whose firm has offices in the Gulf.

Botes adds that foreclosures are moving forward in the region, leading homeowners to file under Chapter 13.

Throughout the USA, bankruptcy filings are gradually rising again, after soaring before the law took effect and plunging afterward. But they're still nowhere near the levels of prior years.

Compared with the rest of the USA, Chapter 13 filings have grown especially fast in the Gulf region in recent months. In Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, Chapter 13 filings surpassed Chapter 7 filings in the first nine months of 2006, according to LexisNexis CourtLink data.

Botes and other consumer bankruptcy lawyers say that in the states hit by Katrina, many homeowners are filing Chapter 13 to ward off foreclosures on their homes. Chapter 13 usually lets homeowners pay their past-due mortgage debt over three to five years.

The high rate of Chapter 13 filings is likely “minimizing” the number of foreclosures in the Gulf as consumers try to save their properties, says Rick Sharga of RealtyTrac, which tracks foreclosures.

Nationally, one reason Chapter 13 bankruptcies are rising could be that consumers who wanted to file Chapter 7 did so before the tougher rules took effect last October, says Sam Gerdano of the American Bankruptcy Institute, a non-partisan research group.

Laura Fisher of the American Bankers Association says she thinks some people may be opting for Chapter 13 because the law now discourages them from “using the system as a financial planning tool” to avoid repaying their debts.

6 States Stand Up To Divest From Sudan (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, October 17, 2006

A courtroom battle over an Illinois law requiring state pension funds to sell any investments linked to Sudan is shaping up later this month as a critical test for a grass-roots movement seeking to pressure the regime behind the Darfur genocide.

Illinois is one of six states that over the past year have passed laws requiring their pension funds to divest themselves of stakes in companies that do business in Sudan, a central African nation that has been consumed by warfare almost continuously since it became independent in 1956.

Under U.S. sanctions in place since 1997, U.S. companies are largely barred from doing business in Sudan because of the government's complicity in the ongoing slaughter in its western Darfur region. The Illinois law requires more than 600 pension funds, most covering retired police and firefighters, to sell any holdings with links to Sudan.

“It's a moral imperative. … Our public monies should not support genocide. The impact of it? I don't know the impact. I'm taking a moral stand,” says state Sen. Jacqueline Collins, the Chicago Democrat who wrote the legislation.

Other human rights activists want to use divestment to discourage corporate activity in Sudan and ultimately cause Sudanese leaders to halt their support for the militias that are killing and raping in Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0082140

"Our end goal is to end the genocide. Divestment is just a means to that end," says Adam Sterling of the Sudan Divestment Task Force, which favors a "targeted" approach aimed at companies that provide revenue to the Sudanese government, fail to benefit the poor or lack a corporate policy on Sudan.

Among them: Chinese oil companies Sinopec and PetroChina, Swiss power giant ABB and German engineering firm Siemens.

The Illinois law takes a broader approach than that used by states such as California, one that even some human rights activists worry won't survive a court challenge. The business group that is suing Illinois over the law says it will hurt retirees' investment returns by narrowing the pension funds' options, without doing anything to stop the killing in Darfur.

The National Foreign Trade Council, a Washington-based pro-trade group whose membership includes the American subsidiaries of a few multinationals that are active in Sudan, argues that the U.S. Constitution prohibits states from making foreign policy in areas where the federal government already has acted.

In 1998, the group won a similar case involving state efforts to punish businesses with links to Myanmar's military junta. "Everyone knows this act is unconstitutional. It's not even a close call," says Bill Reinsch, NFTC president. "The Constitution says the president gets to make foreign policy, not the governor of Illinois."

Collins says the earlier case was "completely different." If the divestment law seriously crimps pension funds' investment options, the state's pension code should be amended to remove other limitations on the funds, she says.

The parties are expected to resume skirmishing in U.S. District Court in Chicago before the end of the month.

There is no argument, however, over the horrors of Darfur. More than 200,000 civilians have been killed and 2.5 million turned into refugees by three years of savage fighting between the Sudanese government and rebels in the dirt-poor western province.

President Bush last year agreed that the relentless government-sanctioned murders in Darfur constituted genocide. The U.S. in 2005 provided $510 million in humanitarian aid to Sudan.

An already horrifying environment of widespread rape, killing and mutilations has deteriorated since the May signing of a peace deal between the Sudanese government and one of the Darfur rebel groups. Fighting has continued between the government-backed Janjaweed militia and two other rebel armies. Government forces now are "indiscriminately bombing" civilian villages, according to Human Rights Watch.

Reinsch, who insists his group isn't indifferent to the civilian suffering, says well-intentioned gestures will hopelessly complicate global commerce. Global companies, with supply chains and customer rosters spread across multiple continents, also fear the state-by-state divestment campaign will spread. "It was Burma six years ago. It's Sudan today," says Reinsch. "Next year, it'll be Zimbabwe and the year after that Russia and then China."

Divestment campaigners say the genocide in Sudan represents more than a garden-variety human rights abuse. Supporters and opponents alike agree the divestment campaign is gathering steam, with legislative proposals expected in at least 15 states next year.

To John Prendergast of the Brussels-based International Crisis Group, a non-partisan group that monitors global hot spots, such grass-roots activism represents "American democracy at its best." The Sudanese government, deep in debt and desperate to avoid international isolation, is vulnerable to citizen protest.

"The Sudanese government doesn't want a scarlet letter on their shirt. They're not the Taliban," he says. "They want to be a fully integrated member of the global community. … (Divestment) immediately sets them apart. It says, 'There's something wrong with this country.' They don't want that."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Monitor Faults Detroit Police (DEN)

By Paul Egan

Detroit News, October 17, 2006

Report says department is still not complying with federal consent decree.

More than three years after the Justice Department and the city of Detroit signed consent decrees to improve the Detroit Police Department, only 15 percent of the patrol cars inspected have working video cameras required by the court orders, a federal monitor reported Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0082141

The Police Department continued to get poor marks in the monitor's latest quarterly report. The monitor examined 89 paragraphs and subparagraphs in the two consent decrees related to use of force and conditions of confinement and reported the department was in compliance with only four of them.

By signing the consent decrees in 2003, the city settled two federal lawsuits that accused the police of repeatedly violating the rights of suspects, prisoners and witnesses.

The longer it takes the department to comply, the longer it will be under the scrutiny and multimillion-dollar expense of a federal monitor. The Justice Department could also ask a federal judge to find the department in contempt and impose sanctions, though that is considered unlikely at this point.

The report also said supervisors are not randomly reviewing the videos recorded by the patrol car cameras as required. The report is by Kroll Inc., a New York City-based risk consulting company that was hired to monitor the Police Department's compliance with the court orders.

The report, filed Monday in U.S. District Court in Detroit, also hammers the department for failing to fill out required reports or filling them out incorrectly.

Commander Jamie Fields, the officer in charge of implementing the consent decrees for the department, said Monday the nature of the monitor's report makes the compliance look worse than it is.

The department is waiting for the monitor to approve lesson plans that will be used to train officers on new policies developed to comply with the consent decrees, Fields said. In many cases, the department has successfully developed and disseminated new policies but does not get credit for satisfying the relevant paragraphs of the decrees until it has also completed training and implementation, he said.

Soon, "it will be like downhill skiing," he said.

The report did say the force achieved a "significant milestone" by providing all officers with newly developed policies related to police lockups, but said the department will have to spend money improving the buildings holding the cells before full compliance is achieved.

On video cameras, the monitor said the department reported that 290 of its 543 scout cars are equipped with cameras but that an Aug. 3 inspection found only 15 percent of those inspected had working cameras.

Fields said the cameras are important because they protect the public and also protect officers from false accusations of brutality. Supervisors view the videos the cameras record but are not yet trained on a random screening process required by the decrees, he said.

The department recently received new cars and has not yet moved cameras to them from older squad cars, he said.

"No car is supposed to go out without a working camera," Fields said.

"Undoubtedly, some probably do on occasion."

Feds Sue City Over Voting Rights Of Spanish-speakers (PHDN)

By Dave Davies

Philadelphia Daily News, October 17, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department has accused Philadelphia of violating the voting rights of Spanish-speaking citizens, and is asking for federal election observers in the city through the end of 2009.

A federal lawsuit filed Friday charges that the city has failed to provide enough bilingual poll workers in Hispanic areas and adequately translate election materials into Spanish.

As a result, the suit alleges, "limited English-proficient Hispanic voters have had difficulty understanding the election process and have been prevented from voting."

Mayor Street's spokesman, Joe Grace, said the city already provides translators and voting materials in Spanish, and will "vigorously contest" the suit.

"The timing of this is a little questionable, coming three weeks before an election," Grace said. Asked if he thought the Republican White House was seeking to suppress Democratic votes in a key U.S. Senate race, Grace said, "The timing is suspect, and we'll leave it at that."

Grace noted that the suit didn't list any specific complaints about Philadelphia election materials or polling-place activity.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said she couldn't be more specific, but officials of the watchdog group Committee of Seventy said they'd provided some of the information that led to the suit.

"We think the city could be doing a much better job with non-English-speaking voters," said Seventy President Zack Stalberg. "It's a shame it had to come to a lawsuit, but if it yields better service, then we're happy with that."

DOJ_NMG_0082142

Committee of Seventy volunteers surveyed voters at 60 polling places in the city's Latino community in May, and found complaints about the adequacy and training of interpreters and related issues.

Chris Sheridan, Committee of Seventy policy director, said Justice Department officials were already looking at the issue in Philadelphia, prompted in part by the historically low turnout among Hispanic voters.

Asked if he was concerned that the timing might have partisan motivations, Stalberg said, "I haven't seen any evidence of that at all. The people we've talked to seemed like they were just trying to do their jobs."

The two sides are expected to appear at a court hearing this week.

FBI Reports Slide In Hate Crimes In U.S. (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

Hate crimes in the United States dropped last year by 6 percent, the FBI reported Monday, although violence against people based on their race accounted more than half of the reported incidents.

Police nationwide reported 7,163 hate crime incidents in 2005, targeting victims based on their race, ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation and disabilities. That was down from 2004, when the FBI reported 7,649 incidents.

The vast majority of hate crimes in both years were motivated by race, according the reports, which detailed the data based on so-called "single-bias" incidents. That means the crime was motivated by only one kind of bias against the victim, according to the FBI.

Race-based criminal activity accounted for 54.7 percent of hate crimes last year, up slightly from 52.9 percent in 2004, the FBI found. Another 17 percent of hate crimes in 2005 targeted victims for their religious beliefs, and 14.2 percent for their sexual orientation.

Victims were assaulted in more than half — 50.7 percent — of the hate crime cases against people. Six people were murdered and another three were raped in reported hate crimes last year. The rest of the victims, or 48.9 percent, were intimidated, the report shows. The FBI also looked at hate crime incidents that targeted property, with 81.3 percent of cases resulting in damage, destruction or vandalism.

Sixty percent of the known offenders in 2005 were white, and 20 percent were black, the report showed.

The data was collected from police agencies across the country, representing city, county, state, tribal and federal law enforcement agencies.

Most Hate Crimes Spurred By Racial Bias, FBI Says (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

More than half of the hate crimes reported last year by police agencies nationwide were motivated by racial bias and many involved intimidation, according to a report released yesterday by the FBI.

The report, by the FBI's Uniform Crime Reporting Program, said that 55 percent of the 7,163 reported single-bias incidents last year were motivated by racial bias -- an increase of one percentage point. The overall number represents a 6 percent drop from 7,649 in 2004.

Religious bias triggered 17 percent of incidents cited in the report, followed by 14 percent for sexual-orientation bias and 13.2 percent by an ethnicity or national-origin bias. Less than 1 percent involved bias against a disability.

The report also noted that of 5,190 hate-crime offenses classified as crimes against people in 2005, intimidation accounted for 48.9 percent of them, followed by simple assaults at 30.2 percent and aggravated assaults at 20.5 percent.

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) yesterday called the 2005 report "clearly incomplete," saying it did not include hate-crime data from two of the largest cities in America: New York and Phoenix. It called the report "a setback to the progress the bureau has made in the program over the past 15 years."

"New York City, which has been a model for police agencies on response to hate violence over the years, and Phoenix should provide their hate-crime data to the FBI as quickly as possible and take steps to ensure timely, full participation in the future," said Deborah M. Lauter, ADL director of civil rights.

"It is also disappointing that thousands of smaller police departments across the country also did not participate in this data-collection effort."

The FBI did not comment on the report.

During 2005, the FBI said the 7,163 criminal incidents involved 8,380 offenses and were reported by city, county, state, federal and tribal law-enforcement agencies nationwide.

DOJ_NMG_0082143

A hate crime, also known as a bias crime, is a criminal offense committed against a person, property or society that is motivated, in whole or in part, by the offender's bias against a race, religion, disability, sexual orientation or ethnicity/national origin.

Virginia reported 295 hate crime incidents last year, down from 307 in 2004; followed by Maryland with 195, down from 245 in 2004; and the District with 48, down from 49 in 2004.

The 2005 report also said:

•Of the 3,109 hate-crime offenses classified as crimes against property, 53.6 percent were directed at persons, 9.8 percent were against businesses or financial institutions, 8.9 percent were against government and 6.8 percent were against religious organizations.

•A total of 20.9 percent of the reported hate crimes were directed at other, multiple or unknown victim types. Damage/destruction/vandalism was the most frequently reported crime against property, accounting for 81.3 percent of the total.

According to the report, of the 6,804 known offenders reported in 2005, 60.5 percent were white and 19.9 percent were black. The race was unknown for 12.3 percent and other races accounted for the remaining known offenders.

It also said that the majority -- about 30 percent -- of hate-crime incidents in 2005 occurred in or near residences or homes.

NAACP To Monitor Elections Following Primary Problems (AP)

By Alex Dominguez, The Associated Press

AP, October 17, 2006

BALTIMORE (AP) — The NAACP will monitor voting in Ohio and nine other states next month, sending observers to polling places, taking citizen complaints and notifying the Justice Department of any serious problems, the civil rights organization announced Monday.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People planned to have hundreds of volunteers monitoring the election in Ohio, Maryland, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Pennsylvania and Texas, said Bruce Gordon, president of the Baltimore-based organization.

The NAACP said the states were chosen because of pivotal elections, concentrations of black voters, or a history of polling problems.

Gordon said the organization intends to be proactive "to ensure that Nov. 7 comes and goes smoothly and that every citizen across this country, and particularly in the state of Maryland, who has an interest in voting, in fact is able to vote."

Maryland's primary election last month was riddled with problems that caused precincts to open late or other delays, prompting court action in some areas to extend voting hours.

Results of an Associated Press-Pew poll released last week found only 30 percent of black voters surveyed nationwide were confident their votes would be counted.

The NAACP will run an election day voter command center at its headquarters and take calls from concerned citizens at (866) OUR-VOTE. The Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights and People for the American Way will work with the civil rights organization to monitor complaints of voting irregularities and advise voters, the NAACP said.

Gordon said the NAACP believes the best way for its members to vote is "to go to their polling places and cast their votes using whatever machines are on site" and that absentee balloting has normally not served the African-American community well.

While the civil rights group will monitor the election process, Gordon urged voters to head to the polls, "even if it requires extra effort."

"Civil rights activists went to extraordinary lengths to earn the right for black Americans to vote," Gordon said in a statement. "Some lost their lives. We owe it to them and ourselves to honor their sacrifice by voting, no matter what challenges we face."

___

On the Net:

NAACP: http://www.naacp.org

NAACP To Monitor Mich. Polls (DEN)

By Lisa Martino

Detroit News, October 17, 2006

10 states will have observers at next month's elections; Republicans also plan oversight.

The NAACP announced Monday that Michigan is among 10 states that will have observers at polling places during next month's election to take citizen complaints and let the Justice Department know about any serious problems.

The effort comes after numerous reports of problems with the Maryland voting system during the primary last month.

DOJ_NMG_0082144

Participating states were chosen using three factors: a high concentration of black voters, a history of polling problems or pivotal elections.

"While the NAACP will take steps to counter obstacles to voter participation, we are encouraging our communities to cast their votes, even if it requires extra effort," NAACP President Bruce Gordon said in a statement Monday.

Locally, in past election years the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People filed injunctions in federal court against individuals harassing people at the polls and challenging their right to vote by questioning their identification, criminal record or whether they paid child support.

"We're very pleased that NAACP national will be monitoring the elections. We in Detroit have been monitoring elections for the last several years," the Rev. Wendell Anthony, president of the Detroit branch of the NAACP, said Monday.

"Certainly, we in Detroit will be out. This is a very important election. People want to use it by any means necessary to suppress a result that may be against their interest, so, yes, we support (the monitoring effort) very strongly."

The Michigan Republican Party announced last week that it will monitor polling sites Nov. 7. Through RSVP, (Republicans Safeguarding Voter Rights Program), the Republican Party will use volunteers to serve as observers at polling places.

"Other states experience outright fraud, and Michigan is not immune to voting problems and irregularities," Saulius "Saul" Anuzis, party chairman, said in a statement last week.

"In 2004, there were hundreds of reported incidents of voter intimidation and illegal election practices by groups such as MoveOn.org, ACORN and PIRGM. Last year in the Detroit city elections, there were so many problems the FBI ended up involved."

The NAACP will also monitor polling locations in Maryland, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Texas.

"We're going to make certain everyone is going to get an opportunity to vote without any interference," said Dr. Eugene Rogers, president of the Northern Oakland County Branch of the NAACP.

NAACP To Watch Polling Places (BSUN)

By Kelly Brewington, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, October 17, 2006

Group will look for voting problems on Election Day in Md., 9 other states

With problems from Maryland's chaotic primary elections still being sorted out, NAACP President and CEO Bruce S. Gordon said yesterday that the civil rights organization will monitor polls in Maryland and nine other states on Election Day and report any voting irregularities to the U.S. Justice Department.

But Gordon also called on Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. to take steps before Nov. 7 to ensure a smooth and fair election by fixing the shortage of poll workers and the malfunctioning electronic voter check-in system.

"With all the concerns that were raised, we intend to be proactive and put necessary safeguards in place so that every citizen who wishes to vote has that right," Gordon said at the headquarters of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Baltimore.

The plan announced yesterday would continue recent election-monitoring efforts by the NAACP, in which volunteers have looked for irregularities.

During the 2004 presidential elections, the civil rights organization and its partners enlisted 25,000 volunteers to monitor precincts nationwide and to answer a toll-free voter assistance hot line. Nearly 5,000 of those volunteers were attorneys, prepared to challenge voting irregularities with lawsuits.

Last month, the NAACP's national office and some local branches received complaints from frustrated voters in Maryland's primary, prompting the group and the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights to seek a court order extending poll hours in some jurisdictions by an hour.

In a letter sent to Ehrlich, Gordon peppered the governor with numerous requests: verify that precincts have sufficient provisional ballots; update the check-in system; devise a contingency plan in case machines malfunction; hold additional demonstrations of new voting machines; ensure adequate numbers of election judges; maintain privacy for voters and educate voters on absentee ballots.

But Gordon questioned Ehrlich's recent recommendation that voters worried about the state's voting system vote by absentee ballot.

"Absentee voting normally has not served the African-American community very well," he said during yesterday's news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0082145

Gordon and Ehrlich discussed the matter by phone yesterday morning. By the afternoon, Ehrlich followed up with a letter saying he shares Gordon's concerns and that he has asked the State Board of Elections and the state elections administrator to develop a contingency plan and to upgrade the electronic check-in system.

Ehrlich said he would forward Gordon's letter to the chairman of the elections board, asking that the board respond within the week.

In his letter, the Republican governor blamed the Democratic-controlled General Assembly for "virtually eliminating accountability at the top level of the state's elections system," with legislation that prevents the governor from firing the elections administrator, a Democrat with whom Ehrlich has had bitter clashes.

Ehrlich also accused legislative leaders of failing to heed warnings from a voting commission he named this year.

"In their rush to gain every political advantage, the leadership of the General Assembly ignored these warnings and created the unstable elections system that we saw in the primary and still face in the General Election," Ehrlich wrote in his letter to Gordon.

With the fiercely contested campaign for governor in the final stretch, each major political party has blamed the other for the state's voting problems.

Ross Goldstein, deputy state elections administrator, would not comment on Ehrlich's letter, but defended the voting system. He said it makes voting more accessible and eliminates errors, though he added he would look forward to a discussion with the NAACP.

"We'd be happy to sit down and work with the NAACP and address their concerns," Goldstein said. "I think all of the concerns they have raised are things that we have taken a look at. We want people to feel comfortable coming to the polls and voting."

In an interview yesterday, however, Gordon expressed little confidence in the state's electronic voting system.

"We know the Diebold machines are unreliable," he said, referring to the manufacturer of the state's touch-screen voting equipment. "You have high-ranking officials in Maryland questioning the voting system. If they are concerned, well, we are certainly concerned."

The NAACP's monitoring effort, dubbed "election protection," is a partnership with the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and People for the American Way. Attorneys and volunteers from the groups will answer a toll-free election hot line (1-866-OUR-VOTE) set up at the NAACP's Baltimore headquarters.

In addition, volunteers will monitor the polls at targeted precincts in Baltimore City and Baltimore, Howard, Anne Arundel, Prince George's and Montgomery counties.

Beyond Maryland, the NAACP plans to post volunteers in Michigan, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Texas, Ohio, Georgia and Pennsylvania.

Gordon said the NAACP chose those states because the group has either received complaints about voting there in the past, or because voters are set to act on significant civil rights issues.

Michigan voters, for example, will vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to ban the use of race and gender in university admissions and government hiring. The NAACP has spoken out against the proposal.

Given the issues at hand, voter turnout is critical, Gordon said.

"Civil rights activists went to extraordinary lengths to earn the right for black Americans to vote," he said. "We owe it to them and ourselves to honor their sacrifice by voting, no matter what challenges we face."

Marvin L. "Doc" Cheatham, president of the NAACP's Baltimore branch, said he's most concerned about the ability of the city's board of elections, where he once served as president, to obtain an adequate number of election judges.

"No election board wants what happened during the primary to happen again," he said. "I think they are working hard. Nevertheless, we'll be here this Election Day from 6 in the morning until 11 at night."

kelly.brewington@baltsun.com

NAACP To Monitor Polls For Problems In 10 States (WT)

By Brian Debose, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

The NAACP yesterday said it will send monitors to polls in 10 states, including Maryland, where voting problems have been reported in recent years.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People conducts monitoring at the polls every midterm and presidential election year.

Bruce S. Gordon, the NAACP president and chief executive officer, said he was prompted to announce the group's program this year because of reputed wide-ranging voter irregularities in several Maryland counties, including Baltimore, where the organization is headquartered.

"In light of the problems in the state during last month's primary elections caused by malfunctioning computer equipment and human error, I am pleased to see that you have ordered backup paper ballots to avoid some of the problems with the touch-screen voting machines," Mr. Gordon wrote in a letter to Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican.

In the letter, Mr. Gordon commended Mr. Ehrlich for ordering that backup paper ballots be used to avoid any problems with the touch-screen voting machines.

He also requested the governor order the Board of Elections to hold statewide demonstrations of the new machines, ensure that the electronic registration rolls are updated, and make certain there are adequate numbers of trained election judges at the polls on time and for the entire day.

In addition, he asked that each precinct have a sufficient number of provisional ballots -- many ran out during the primaries -- and maintain privacy for voters, whether they vote using touch-screen or paper ballots.

The NAACP will run an Election Day voter command center at the Baltimore headquarters. Volunteers will observe targeted precincts in the Baltimore area and Prince Georges and Montgomery counties, where the majority of the irregularities occurred.

The voter command center will also be staffed with lawyers from the group's partnering organizations, including the liberal Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and People for the American Way, to monitor complaints of voter irregularities and to advise voters experiencing problems at the polls.

The groups will forward any major problems to the Justice Department for further investigation.

The other nine states were chosen because they have pivotal elections, high concentrations of black voters or a history of polling problems, including Gulf Coast states Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida and Texas.

The dispersal of residents from those states after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit last year prompted the NAACP to start a registration campaign to help evacuees register to vote in their new location or maintain their home-state registration.

The NAACP will also be monitoring elections in Michigan and Ohio, which had rampant complaints of insufficient voting machines, fewer polling places and polls opening late during the 2004 presidential election.

Georgia and Pennsylvania were selected randomly, said officials of the NAACP, which has established a toll-free number (1-866-OUR-VOTE) to report Election Day voting problems.

NAACP Will Monitor Polls For Voting Irregularities (WP)

By Rosalind S. Helderman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Volunteers for the NAACP will fan out at select polling stations across Maryland on Election Day to monitor balloting for problems similar to those that plagued the September primary.

The group said that poll watchers will observe precincts in Prince George's and Montgomery counties and in Baltimore and that lawyers will be available to document complaints from voters and, if necessary, forward reports of irregularities to the U.S. Justice Department. Maryland is one of 10 states the civil rights organization plans to monitor that day.

During September's primary, some polls in Maryland opened late because election judges or technicians did not show up. Also, an electronic registration system regularly crashed, and many poll workers had trouble submitting results electronically at the end of the day.

The NAACP called on Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) to take all necessary steps to protect voters from technical glitches with machines and mistakes made by inexperienced or poorly trained poll workers.

"While the NAACP will take steps to counter obstacles to voter participation, we are encouraging our communities to cast their votes, even if it requires extra effort," said Bruce S. Gordon, NAACP president and chief executive.

In turn, Ehrlich called on the state's Board of Elections to make certain the group's concerns are addressed.

"To ensure that every Marylander has access to a fair and accurate election system, the state Board of Elections must act expeditiously to address my concerns and those of the NAACP," he said.

In Prince George's, where election officials are still looking for hundreds of new poll workers for the election, Interim Elections Administrator Robert J. Antonetti Sr. urged the NAACP to send volunteers for training.

"Everyone loves to come and observe," he said. "Let them participate."

DOJ_NMG_0082147

John White, NAACP communications director, said the group is encouraging members to volunteer as judges even as it establishes its national monitoring program. Other states the group will monitor on Election Day are Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Texas, Michigan, Ohio, Georgia and Pennsylvania.

Barnes Sues Perdue Over Voter Letter Photo ID Information May Have Misinformed (AJC)

By Ernie Suggs, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 17, 2006

Former Gov. Roy Barnes has filed a lawsuit against his successor, Gov. Sonny Perdue, and the State Election Board for the mailing of 200,000 letters to registered Georgia voters that suggested a photo ID was needed to vote in the Nov. 7 general election.

The problem? The letters were sent out days after a judge ruled the law requiring a photo ID to be unconstitutional.

Barnes filed the civil suit Monday in Fulton Superior Court on behalf of a 60-year old disabled Atlanta woman, Rosalind Lake, who does not have a state-issued photo ID.

In the complaint, the governor and election board are charged with contempt for violating a court order that struck down the photo ID law. Barnes is asking the court to force the state to send out another letter informing registered voters that they do not need a photo ID to vote.

"The delivery of approximately 200,000 'Dear Georgia Voter' letters was a blatant action in which seriously incorrect information on voting was disseminated to a substantial number of Georgia voters," Barnes wrote in the motion filed Monday. "The events after this Court's order make clear that the violation was deliberate."

A hearing has been scheduled for 2 p.m. Friday in the chambers of Fulton Superior Court Judge T. Jackson Bedford.

"I hope this means there will be a full public airing of the Republican attempt to suppress voter participation," said David Worley, a Democrat-appointed member of the election board who had threatened to file a complaint with the U.S. Justice Department about the mailing of the letters.

On Sept. 19, Bedford ruled Georgia's voter ID law violated the state Constitution. At the time of the ruling, the election board was in the process of sending out 300,000 letters to registered voters who did not have a driver's license or photo ID.

The so-called "Dear Georgia Voter" letter was part of a voter education campaign designed to remind voters about the January legislation that required voters to show one of six forms of government-issued photo identification at the polls. But Barnes and others are contending that after Bedford's ruling, the mailing of letters should have been stopped.

Tex McIver, the Republican-appointed vice chairman of the election board, initially told the election board that all but 20,000 letters had been sent out before the Sept. 19 ruling. But, the secretary of state's election division later confirmed that nearly 200,000 letters were mailed after Sept. 19.

"We would suggest, because they couldn't have the law upheld, they were going to do indirectly what they couldn't do directly," said Jennifer Jordan, an attorney with Barnes' firm. "Which is basically to suppress the vote of the certain portion of the electorate. And using tax-payer money."

The board spent $55,000 to mail the 300,000 letters.

The election board has scheduled a special called meeting at 3 p.m. today. McIver said that at the meeting he will propose developing a public service announcement and a postcard mailer to send to voters to clear up any confusion that voters might have.

"Let's get rid of the issue," said McIver, who headed up the letter program. "I don't think the letter was confusing. But if people are confused, let's fix it."

Perdue did not comment on the motion.

"This situation obviously will not be decided by the courts until after the election," said Dan McLagan, a spokesman for Perdue. "In the meantime, the governor wants to encourage everyone who is registered to get out and vote."

Missouri State Supreme Court Strikes Down Voter ID Law (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kelly Wiese, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

(AP) - JEFFERSON CITY, Missouri-The Missouri Supreme Court on Monday struck down a new law requiring voters to show a photo identification at the polls, upholding a lower judge's decision.

Supporters of the ID requirement, mostly Republicans, said it was necessary to prevent voter fraud and increase confidence in the election process.

DOJ_NMG_0082148

Opponents, primarily Democrats, argued people impersonating others when voting is rare, and that the ID requirement would especially harm the poor, elderly and disabled who may be less likely to have a driver's license.

A lower judge ruled last month that the ID requirement was an unconstitutional infringement on the fundamental right to vote. The Supreme Court agreed in a 6-1 unsigned opinion.

The law required voters to present a photo identification card issued by Missouri or the federal government to cast a ballot starting with the November election.

The court found the requirement violated several provisions in the state constitution. The court said requiring otherwise legitimate voters to obtain an appropriate ID imposed too big a burden on their voting rights.

The law would have allowed those lacking such an ID this fall to cast a provisional ballot upon meeting certain conditions. In future elections, only the elderly, disabled and those with religious objections to carrying a photo ID could vote without one, and only by provisional ballot.

Provisional ballots are set apart from regular ballots, and election authorities later determine whether they should count by, among other things, checking whether their signatures match those on file and if they're in the right polling place.

Meanwhile, lawyers opposing the state of Georgia's photo ID law asked a judge to hold the state in contempt for misinforming more than 200,000 voters in a mass mailing that they had to provide some form of photo ID.

The mailing was sent after a court order blocked the law's enforcement for the November general election.

Attorneys are also asking the judge to force the state to send new letters to those voters.

In all, the State Board of Elections mailed more than 300,000 letters to registered voters, telling them they may need to show either a free Georgia voter identification card or one of six forms of photo ID to vote in person. The letter also reminded voters they could vote absentee without a photo ID.

Attorney Jennifer Auer Jordan, who is working with former Georgia Gov. Roy Barnes to oppose the photo ID law, said Monday the mailings were a direct and deliberate violation of the court's order.

Although time is short, she said, "We've got to do whatever we can do to make sure that everybody knows they have the right to vote and if they want to show up at the general election, they can," she said.

The board of elections has called a special meeting Tuesday to discuss the photo ID law.

Agents Take Jail Records (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, October 17, 2006

GULFPORT - The federal government removed boxes of jail records last week from the Harrison County Sheriff's Office for its investigation of an inmate's death and related allegations, U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said on Monday.

Lampton told the Sun Herald that the FBI and prosecutors from the Justice Department's civil rights criminal division took records last week from the sheriff's Gulfport offices at the Harrison County Courthouse and the Harrison County Adult Detention Center.

Lampton said there was no need to use search warrants because Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. and his new warden, Don Cabana, have been "100 percent cooperative." But, he said, "they can't be a part of the investigation."

"When we get to the bottom of everything, people can be secure or satisfied to know everything at that jail has been looked at, and anything that might have been done improperly has been corrected."

Removal of the recordsis the latest in a series of new developments in criminal matters surrounding the death of Jessie Lee Williams Jr. Williams, 40, died after a beating on Feb. 4 in the jail booking room. He was taken off life-support at a hospital within two days, and his death was later ruled a homicide.

Former corrections officer Regina Rhodes, 29, was to be sentenced Monday on guilty pleas to criminal accusations that she assaulted Williams and lied to cover it up. She accepted a plea agreement and became a government witness.

Court records show sentencing was delayed "in the interests of justice" until after the trial of former corrections officer Ryan Teel, 29. Prosecutors' motion to request a delay in Rhodes' sentencing suggests that Teel's trial, set for the Nov. 6 federal document, also may be continued.

Rhodes, who remains free on bond, faces up to 13 years, but she likely will receive a reduced sentence for cooperating with the federal investigation. She is bound by a plea agreement to testify at any future trial regarding any related case at state or federal levels.

Teel, accused of inflicting injuries resulting in death and lying about it, is charged with two counts: deprivation of rights under color of law and destruction, alteration or falsification of records in federal investigations. Deprivation of rights is punishable by any number of years to life in prison. The other count is punishable by up to 20 years.

DOJ_NMG_0082149

Prosecutors have not sought the death penalty, but Teel's attorney has referenced that possibility in a flurry of motions that request a change of venue, suppression of evidence including Williams' death certificate and subpoenas of media reports.

Teel remains in custody without bond.

An edited version of Rhodes' plea agreement, recently unsealed, identifies Teel as her occasional supervisor and claims Teel was the principal officer who assaulted Williams with unjustified use of force.

The edited version, first published in court records, had portions of the text blacked out and alleged that Rhodes' occasional supervisor and other corrections officers routinely used unnecessary force against inmates and presented "false, incomplete and misleading" reports to cover it up.

The unsealed version shows Teel's name in portions that previously were blacked out.

Teel and Rhodes are being prosecuted under federal statutes that apply to civil rights violations under color of law.

Payne would neither confirm nor deny that federal agents took jail records last week, but he did say he and his department are cooperating with the investigation.

Sources to the Sun Herald claim federal agents went in with search warrants and bolt cutters and loaded boxes of files and computers into the back of a truck.

Lampton said search warrants weren't necessary.

"You've heard the old saying, 'don't make a federal case out of it.' That is the truth," Lampton said. "The federal government doesn't take on every case, but when we do take on a case, you'd better watch out. The federal government may be slow, but we are thorough."

Supreme Court Turns Away Scouts Appeal (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a setback for the Boy Scouts, the Supreme Court turned away a free-speech challenge to a Berkeley policy that denies city-subsidized dock space to a Scouting group because it excludes gays and atheists.

The court's action lets stand rulings in California and elsewhere that have said cities, schools and colleges may deny public benefits to groups that refuse to comply with broad nondiscrimination rules involving religion and sex orientation.

Some conservative groups had joined the challenge to the Berkeley policy, saying that advocates of "traditional moral values" are being subjected to discrimination across the country by "politically correct" government officials.

The court's action sets no legal precedent, however, and the justices could well take up the issue in the future.

Six years ago, the high court came to the aid of the Boy Scouts of America when it ruled that a state cannot force a private group, such as the Scouts, to include openly gay men if doing so would violate its professed code of conduct. In that case, James Dale, a former scoutmaster, had sued the group after he was excluded upon acknowledging he was gay.

The New Jersey courts said the Scouts must abide by the state's anti-discrimination law.

The Supreme Court disagreed in a 5-4 decision in the case of Boys Scouts vs. Dale.

But in the wake of the Scouts' victory, some cities and school districts refused to permit Scouting groups to use their facilities on the same basis as they allowed other nonprofit organizations.

Lawyers for the Scouts then went back to court to challenge this exclusion as unconstitutional discrimination. So far, however, they have been rebuffed.

Harold Johnson, an attorney for the Pacific Legal Foundation, which presented the appeal, said he was disappointed the court refused to hear the case.

"We are confident that, eventually, the court will take a case addressing the underlying issues, because there are too many examples of government discrimination against Scouting and other belief-based organizations to ignore," he said in a statement.

For many years, Berkeley had given a rent-free berth in its marina to nonprofit community service organizations, including the Sea Scouts. An affiliate of the Boy Scouts, the group teaches sailing and seamanship to teenagers.

But the Berkeley City Council adopted a new policy that required groups that wanted a free berth to agree in writing that they would not discriminate against persons based on, among other factors, their race, religion, ethnicity or sexual orientation. The Scouts did not sign the agreement because Boy Scouts policy excludes gays and atheists.

Eugene Evans, an adult leader of the Sea Scouts, agreed to pay $500 a month to maintain the berth in the Berkeley marina, but he also led a lawsuit that challenged the policy as violating the group's rights to freedom of speech and the equal protection of the laws. He argued the Scouts were being treated as "second-class citizens" because their views on religion and homosexuality were disfavored by the government.

He lost decisively in the California courts.

DOJ_NMG_0082150

In March, the California Supreme Court upheld Berkeley's policy in a unanimous ruling. "Berkeley had not attempted to muzzle anyone's speech," said the state high court. "A government entity may constitutionally require a recipient of funding or subsidy to provide written, unambiguous assurances of compliance with a generally applicable nondiscrimination policy."

The Scouts hoped for a more sympathetic hearing from the Supreme Court. The Pacific Legal Foundation, which is based in Sacramento, said the California ruling "sets an ominous precedent" for Scouting groups. Former Atty. Gen. Edwin M. Meese III, U.S. Rep. Dan Lungren (R-Gold River) and other conservative lawyers backed the appeal and noted that some Christian groups have been denied recognition or funding on college campuses because they too exclude gays and atheists.

"Millions of Americans who believe in traditional moral and religious values are looking to this court to uphold the constitutional rights and equal treatment under the law," they said in a friend-of-the-court brief.

But in a one-line order, the court refused to hear the case of Evans vs. City of Berkeley.

Lawyers for Berkeley had argued that since Evans had appealed on his own, he did not truly speak for the Sea Scouts. Although the justices gave no explanation for refusing to hear the case, this could have figured in the decision.

Evans and the scouting group declined to comment on Monday.

53% Of Voters Say They Back Va. Same-Sex Marriage Ban (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

A majority of Virginians support a proposed constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage and civil unions, although voters split on the measure when presented with interpretations of its potential impact, according to a new Washington Post poll.

Fifty-three percent of likely voters said they would vote for the amendment, and 43 percent would oppose it, the poll found, indicating that three weeks before Election Day opponents still have a long way to go to make Virginia the first state in the country to defeat a same-sex marriage amendment.

The only part of the state to oppose the measure was Northern Virginia, where voters rejected it 55 percent to 42 percent, further evidence that the Washington suburbs have become a political and social world apart from the rest of Virginia. Respondents in the rest of the state backed the measure 58 percent to 38 percent, according to the survey, conducted over three days last week.

Despite the overall results, the poll provided some hope for opponents of the measure. Their chief argument is that the language of the amendment is too broad and would endanger contracts between unwed heterosexual couples. Supporters contend that the measure is limited to declaring that same-sex marriages would never be approved or recognized in Virginia.

When respondents were read the arguments on both sides of the question, enough voters showed a willingness to reconsider that the gap narrowed to a virtual tie -- 48 percent said they supported the measure and 47 percent opposed it, within the poll's margin of error of three percentage points.

"I really do think that we need an amendment like this that defines marriage," said Ross Williams, 50, a salesman from Annandale, who considers himself a Republican and a likely voter for Sen. George Allen (R) in his reelection bid Nov. 7. "But we don't need to pass something that we don't know what it's going to do. I wouldn't call myself an undecided voter yet . . . but I am going to read the wording and make up my mind about what it's going to do before I vote."

The poll also found that Virginians are virtually split over whether gay couples should be able to form civil unions, which would give them health insurance, inheritance benefits and other legal rights of married couples. The poll found that 48 percent believe gay couples should be allowed to engage in civil unions and 47 percent do not. The amendment would constitutionally ban civil unions between gay couples, although they are already illegal in Virginia.

"We've been seeing this for a long time now: When people read the entire question and think about what it means, they vote no," said Claire Guthrie Gastanaga, campaign director for the Commonwealth Coalition, the group organizing opposition to the amendment.

Victoria Cobb, executive director of the Family Foundation, said that she believed the amendment would pass and that voters understood that the ballot question was simply about defining marriage. She said an internal poll conducted by the group found strong support for the measure.

"We are very confident that Virginia is going to join the other 20 states that have passed constitutional amendments," she said. "Virginians know this is about marriage between one man and one woman, and we have complete confidence that when they step into the voting booth, they will vote for traditional marriage."

Several political scientists who have studied state ballot measures said the polling data from Virginia appeared to defy expectations, given the commonwealth's reputation as a conservative state.

DOJ_NMG_0082151

"This is quite a surprise," said Daniel A. Smith, an associate professor of political science at the University of Florida. "In an ostensibly conservative state like Virginia, you'd expect to see the numbers up around 60 or 70 percent."

The lower numbers in Virginia reflect a national trend of weakening support for state efforts to ban same-sex marriage, several experts said. Twenty states have passed similar measures since 1998, many with about 75 percent support. The lowest level of support an amendment received was 57 percent in Oregon in 2004.

But this year, poll results in several states with similar ballot measures show weaker support than in 2004, when 11 states passed constitutional amendments. Polls in Colorado and Wisconsin show results similar to Virginia's; poll results in South Dakota are mixed.

John C. Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum for Religion and Public Life, said the momentum for such amendments at the ballot box has been hurt by recent court cases that have upheld bans on same-sex marriages.

"Two things seem to be going on," Green said. "Opponents [of same sex marriage amendments] are much more organized than they were two years ago. And if you look at what judges have been doing over the past year . . . they've been supporting the definitions of traditional marriage. So some of the edge is off."

The constitutional amendment received its strongest support from Republicans, blacks and those who say they go to church more than once a month, reflecting national trends.

"My religion teaches that marriage is between a man and a woman, and quite frankly, that's all I need to help me understand how I need to vote," said Sandy Ledford, 57, a housewife from Botetourt County, in the state's rural southwest. "It's pretty simple for me."

"I'm not a homophobe," said Charles Wortham, 60, a dentist from Hanover County, outside Richmond. "My view is simply that marriage is there to establish a legal process for the procreation of children. It's Mother Nature. Same-sex couples can't naturally reproduce, so it doesn't seem like they should be able to marry like a traditional family."

Wortham said that he had heard the arguments raised by opponents regarding the measure's unintended consequences but that he didn't believe the claims. "I don't think any of that stuff is going to happen," he said.

The Washington Post poll is based on telephone interviews with 1,004 randomly selected Virginia likely voters and was conducted Oct. 10-12.

The poll results generally hewed to party lines: Seventy-five percent of Republicans back the amendment, and 59 percent of Democrats oppose it. Independents were nearly split, with 49 percent against it and 45 percent for it.

Seventy-three percent of people who also said they would vote to reelect Allen backed the amendment, and 23 percent said they'll vote against it. Two-thirds of those who support Allen but oppose the amendment are women.

Among those who said they would vote for Democrat James Webb for U.S. Senate, 67 percent opposed the measure and 31 percent supported it. Allen favors the amendment, and Webb is opposed because he thinks the language goes beyond prohibiting same-sex marriage. Webb believes marriage is between one man and one woman.

The only group to significantly cross party lines was blacks. In the poll, blacks supported Webb by 81 percent to 11 percent, but they favored the amendment 61 percent to 34 percent. "I don't believe in gay relationships; I just don't believe that they are right," said Aaron Moore, 26, from Chesapeake, who added that he follows the Pentecostal faith and will vote for Webb. "Even though I'm a Democrat, it's just something that I disagree with most Democrats on."

Whites supported the measure 51 percent to 45 percent, the poll found.

Opponents of the measure include Democrats, those who said they do not attend church often and political independents. "These kinds of rights, being able to get married, they should be open to everybody," said Beverly Gordon, 51, a teacher from Hampton. "Voting, access to schools, marriage -- these are all things that people should have equal ability to have."

Others said they were concerned about unintended consequences. The amendment "doesn't specify anywhere that it's talking only about homosexual couples," said Faye Talhame, 49, a real estate agent from Loudoun County. "This goes way too far. Who knows what it would do? Why do we want to pass such a thing?"

ANTITRUST:

U.S. Extends SRAM Antitrust Probe To Samsung (IDG)

By Ben Ames, IDG News Service, Boston Bureau

IDG News Service, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082152

Antitrust investigators with the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) have issued a subpoena to Samsung Semiconductor Inc., just hours after asking its competitors Mitsubishi Electric Corp. and Cypress Semiconductor Corp. for information about their sales practices in the SRAM (static RAM) chip market.

Toshiba, another major SRAM chip producer, declined to comment on whether it had also been subpoenaed. A spokeswoman referred questions to the company's Tokyo headquarters.

Samsung plans to comply with the request for information about sales and marketing practices throughout the industry, spokeswoman Chris Goodhart said in a statement.

"Samsung will cooperate fully with the Department of Justice on this matter," she said. "Samsung is committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior."

Samsung has already been charged with antitrust violations in a DOJ investigation of the DRAM (dynamic RAM) market. Justice Department lawyers found evidence that several DRAM chip makers manipulated prices while bidding for business with the U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Apple Computer Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co. and IBM Corp. Several DRAM makers have been ordered to pay fines as high as US$300 million and three Samsung executives were sentenced to time in prison.

SRAM chips can retain data as long as they have power, and are typically used as a memory buffer in devices such as computers and hard-disk drives, or to handle data in low-power devices like mobile phones.

Microsoft Sharing Security Data (SEAPI)

By Dan Richman, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 17, 2006

But software makers say it's still too little, too late

Striving to satisfy European antitrust officials, Microsoft Corp. said Monday that it has given security-software makers some of the data they want to make their products work with Microsoft's forthcoming operating system, Windows Vista.

But one of those companies, Cupertino, Calif.-based Symantec Corp., on Monday reacted to the release by repeating complaints it made at the end of last week: that it's not getting enough information fast enough.

"The operative question remains 'When?' " Symantec spokesman Cris Payden said. "When are we going to get what we need?"

Microsoft Director Adrien Robinson said the means of connecting outside software to Vista's Windows Security Center were uploaded Monday morning to a Web site accessible only by security-software developers.

The Security Center is a set of on-screen controls -- nicknamed the "digital dashboard" -- that customers will use to adjust and monitor their computer's security features.

Symantec's Paden said the company is inspecting the new Web site "to be sure it has everything we need to let our customers see our digital dashboard instead of Microsoft's."

Microsoft also said Monday that it plans to discuss with Symantec and McAfee Inc. changes they want made to Patch Guard, part of the 64-bit version of Vista that restricts who can alter the operating system's core, or kernel.

But Paden said Microsoft has yet to explain how Symantec's technology can access 64-bit Vista's kernel, or even to say when it will provide that explanation. The 64-bit version of Vista is expected to be popular among businesses, he said.

Microsoft's Robinson responded that the company plans to release more information within 30 to 45 days on the nature and extent of access it will allow to the kernel. She said it will provide that access after Vista for business ships and plans to continually update that package.

As to the developers' impatience, she said: "It requires efforts on both sides. The more they can engage with us, the faster we can get functionality out."

Microsoft's information sharing is an attempt to address the European Union's competitive concerns so it can release Vista on schedule in Europe.

Microsoft said Friday that the guidance it had received from the EU, and the changes it's making in response, have persuaded it to proceed with the product's worldwide release schedule.

"We tried to digest their feedback and take action, and then understand whether we thought that that would really put us in that position where we were in compliance with EU law, which we think we are," Microsoft Chief Executive Steve Ballmer said on the sidelines of a news conference Monday in Rome.

Vista is due out to business customers next month and to consumers in January. But the EU antitrust office has refused to back Microsoft's optimism that European concerns had been resolved.

"The jury is out," EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said Friday.

The EU and Microsoft have fought for years, and the 25-nation bloc levied a fine of $613 million on Microsoft in 2004.

McAfee didn't respond to repeated requests for comment Monday.

This report includes information from Bloomberg News and The Associated Press. P-I reporter Dan Richman can be reached at 206-448-8032 or danrichman@seattlepi.com.

HP Extends Tender Offer For Mercury (FT)

By Kevin Allison In San Francisco

Financial Times, October 17, 2006

Hewlett-Packard, the world's second-biggest computer maker, on Monday announced a further extension of its tender offer for Mercury Interactive, a business software group that was forced to de-list its shares earlier this year because of stock options backdating.

The move marked the third time HP has extended its tender offer, which values the software maker at $4.5bn. It came in spite of news that HP had locked up more than 90 per cent of Mercury's oustanding shares - far more than the amount needed to complete the company's biggest acquisition since its $19bn takeover of Compaq, a rival computer maker, in 2002.

One person familiar with the matter said Mercury's de-lisitng had complicated efforts to receive anti-trust approvals from regulators. The person said the delays were procedural and nature and were not expected to infuence the outcome of the tender offer.

HP declined to comment.

Katherine Egbert, an analyst at Jeffries & Co, said she was confident the deal was still on track. "I don't think anyone thinks it's at risk," she said. "HP want to compete more with IBM, and what they're missing is a substantial software business."

HP's tender offer values Mercury at $4.5bn, or $52 a share - a 33 per cent premium over the comapny's share price the day before the deal was announced in July.

Mercury's shares have traded on the over-the-counter market since January, when they were delisted from the Nasdaq stock market for non-compliance with filing requirements. Mercury has offered to pay $35m to settle backdating claims with the US Securities and Exchange Commission.

More than 100 companies are under investigation in the widening scandal over stock options backdating, which has recently claimed the jobs of several top executives, including William McGuire, the chief executive of UnitedHealth, one of the biggest US health insurers. Amnon Landan, Mercury's former chief executive, and two other top managers were forced out in November 2005 because of the scandal.

E.On Lawsuit Claims Acciona Misled SEC On Interest In Endesa (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

E.On AG said it filed a lawsuit in New York to clarify a situation about Endesa SA shares held by Spanish energy-and-construction company Acciona SA.

E.On, a German energy company, has accused Acciona of making misleading statements to the Securities and Exchange Commission about its strategic targets in buying a 10% stake in Endesa. Acciona denied the charges.

E.On has offered €37 billion, or about $46 billion, to take over Endesa, or €35 a share. It had bid €25.40 a share but increased its offer after Acciona bought a 10% stake in the Spanish utility to become its biggest shareholder.

E.On's lawsuit says information Acciona filed to the SEC was "false, inexact and incomplete" among other things, because "Acciona has contracts with third parties who intend to block E.On's bid." An E.On spokeswoman said it is unclear how many Endesa shares Acciona controls and whether Acciona has agreements with third parties on further share purchases.

Acciona said the New York court decided to request more information about the case but declined to grant the injunction by which E.On had sought to block any further stake buildup in Endesa by Acciona.

Silverman Testifies On Walter Forbes' Role In Cendant Merger (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 17, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. — The retrial of former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes took a new twist Monday when Henry Silverman, the hard-driving founder of HFS, testified about his decision to merge HFS in 1997 with Forbes' firm, CUC International, to form Cendant.

Following the merger, in April 1998, Cendant disclosed that CUC executives had overstated their company's revenue by hundreds of millions of dollars.

The disclosure shocked investors, who went on a selling spree, wiping out $14 billion, or half the company's market capitalization, in one day.

DOJ_NMG_0082154

Nine years have passed since the revelation of the fraud. Several former CUC executives pleaded guilty to manipulating the company's earnings and have cooperated with prosecutors. E. Kirk Shelton, the former chief operating officer, was convicted by a jury in 2005 and sentenced to 10 years in jail.

But Forbes, 63, has fought the government to a draw. His previous two trials have ended in hung juries.

This third trial, which began last week in federal court here, promised to be a replay of the last two until Silverman took the witness stand Monday.

Before the CUC blow-up, Silverman, 66, was known as a take-no-prisoners CEO who always delivered earnings to Wall Street. He told jurors that after he and Forbes agreed to merge their companies in 1997, they went on a "road show" to convince investors that the match-up would increase shareholder value.

Forbes, he said, did most of the talking about the merged company's strategic vision.

"I was blown away," Silverman said. "I thought it was incredibly compelling. It was a complex subject, one in which Walter Forbes displayed quite a lot of knowledge. It was a very impressive performance."

A few months after agreeing to merge the companies, Silverman testified, Forbes told him he was "depressed and unhappy" about the direction the merger was taking. Silverman drove from Manhattan up to Connecticut, where Forbes' business was based, to find out what the problem was. At the coffee shop of a nearby hotel, Forbes complained that Silverman's team was acting as though HFS was buying CUC.

In a previous trial, Forbes testified about the same meeting. But on Monday, Silverman disclosed for the first time that the defendant was particularly concerned about the fate of one employee in CUC's accounting department, Anne Pember. Forbes allegedly told Silverman that Pember was "kind of the glue that keeps the company together" and that if she left, lots of other people would follow.

Pember, who pleaded guilty and testified against Shelton two years ago, said last week that she had very little direct contact with Forbes. It wasn't until the merger with HFS took place that Forbes insisted she stay on to help with certain accounting issues, she testified.

Later this week, the government is expected to call CUC's former CFO, Cosmo Corigliano, to testify. Corigliano has pleaded guilty and is the only CUC executive to allege that Forbes was directly involved in the fraud.

Oshkosh Truck To Buy JLG Industries For $3 Billion (NYT/AP)

The New York Times-AP, October 17, 2006

MILWAUKEE (AP) -- Military and commercial vehicle maker Oshkosh Truck Corp. on Monday said it is buying JLG Industries Inc., a maker of aerial work platforms and booms, for about $3 billion in cash.

Oshkosh chairman, president and CEO Robert G. Bohn said the deal continues Oshkosh's transformation into a global specialty vehicle maker.

"We will have the size and the scale to be more competitive in the market, and we will be generating a significant amount of cash, cash that we will use to rapidly pay down our debt," Bohn said in a conference call Monday.

The deal, which has been approved by the boards of both companies and still requires the approval from JLG shareholders and antitrust regulators, is expected to close in early December.

The company agreed to pay $28 per share for JLG, which represents a 35 percent premium over the stock's Friday closing price of $20.75. According to the New York Stock Exchange, JLG has 106.7 million shares outstanding.

Oshkosh will also assume more than $200 million in JLG debt as part of the deal.

JLG shares climbed $6.78, or nearly 33 percent, to $27.53 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange while Oshkosh shares sank $3.02, or 5.4 percent, to $52.52.

Oshkosh, which plans to finance the purchase with a $3.5 billion line of credit from Bank of America, expects the deal to add "modestly" to per-share earnings in fiscal 2007.

JLG, based in McConnellsburg, Pa., had $2.3 billion in revenues this fiscal year, with sales estimated to grow between 20 and 25 percent next year, Oshkosh said. The company is the top provider of aerial platforms in North America and Europe.

Oshkosh already has 9,400 employees and will be adding JLG's 4,000, it said. JLG, which makes the Manlift and Toucan brands of aerial work platforms and Caterpillar-branded telehandlers, has manufacturing plants in the U.S., Belgium and France. Aerial work platforms lift workers so they can perform tasks at heights they could not otherwise reach while telehandlers are similar to cranes that lift building materials.

There will be no cuts to factory jobs, said Charles L. Szews, Oshkosh executive vice president and chief financial officer. Oshkosh also expects key officers of JLG to remain, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082155

Bohn said the company estimates annual growth between 3 percent and 6 percent through 2010, with JLG eventually making up 40 percent of sales and income. The integration of JLG should take between 18 and 24 months, Oshkosh said.

Bohn said he was excited about "the opportunity to grow this business on a global basis and to share the best practices between the two companies."

JLG chairman, president and CEO William M. Lasky said the company expects an easy transition into Oshkosh. JLG was not for sale when Oshkosh approached them, he said.

"To be honest, I was hoping to find a reason why I didn't think it would be a good fit for JLG. Unfortunately, that didn't last very long when I looked at the success and track record of Oshkosh," Lasky said.

Also this year, Oshkosh announced cash deals to buy AK Specialty Vehicles from medical device maker HealthTronics Inc. for $140 million and Iowa Mold Tooling Co., a maker of general mechanics, for $131 million.

Macquarie Wins Battle For Thames Water (FT)

By Lina Saigol And Rebecca Bream

Financial Times, October 17, 2006

Macquarie, the Australian bank, on Monday night won the hotly contested auction for Thames Water, the UK's biggest water company, which is being sold by RWE, the German utility group, in a deal valued at £8bn.

Macquarie's European infrastructure fund is leading a consortium called Kemble Water, which bid the highest price for Thames.

It beat three other serious bidders in the auction, including Qatar Investment Authority, which had teamed up with UBS's global infrastructure fund.

The Thames deal, which includes £3.2bn of debt, is subject to approval by RWE's supervisory board at a weekend meeting. If approved, the sale is due to close by early December.

The deal marks the biggest buy-out in the UK this year.

Terra Firma, the private equity group headed by Guy Hands, had also bid for the asset, as had Alinta, the Australian energy group. Alinta was planning to launch a A$5bn (£2bn) share issue to fund the deal if it won.

Final fully financed bids were submitted for Thames on Saturday. The deal comes days after Macquarie sold its stake in South East Water to funds linked to Westpac, a rival Australian banking group, to remove a potential regulatory barrier to its bid for Thames.

RWE had been running a dual-track process on Thames to assess whether it should sell the company or float it.

Goldman Sachs had been appointed to carry out the sale, while Deutsche Bank had been handling a potential initial public offering.

RWE bought Thames, which has more than 13m customers across London and the south-east of England, for £4.3bn in 2000. The German utility is understood to have booked a profit of about €500m on the sale of the business. RWE, headed by Harry Roels, admitted its foray into water had not been a success.

The German utility said this year that it was selling Thames to concentrate on the higher-growth energy business. The company has repeatedly failed to meet targets set by Ofwat, the water regulator, on leakage.

In July Ofwat ordered Thames to pay an extra £150m to replace old water mains.

RWE is also selling American Water, its US business, through an IPO scheduled for next year.

UK water assets have been attracting high valuations from infrastructure bidders, including pension funds, because they offer stable returns that can match the funds' liabilities.

Stocks in these companies have risen sharply on the back of takeover speculation.

AWG, which owns Anglian Water, is also in play, having received a £2.2bn bid from Osprey, a consortium comprising Australian and Canadian infrastructure and pension funds.

The losing bidders for Thames may turn their sights on AWG. However, Osprey has already increased its offer for the water group in an attempt to see off any possible counterbid.

Steeling Jobs (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

"For decades, U.S. auto companies did not intervene in steel trade cases. We do so now because further relief is unjustified -- and it is undermining American manufacturing competitiveness."

DOJ_NMG_0082156

For the sake of the American economy, we hope that statement gets someone's attention at the International Trade Commission (ITC) today. It's from the six largest automobile manufacturers in the U.S. -- General Motors, Toyota, DaimlerChrysler, Ford, Honda and Nissan.

On the table before the ITC today is whether the anti-dumping duties imposed in 1993 on "corrosion-resistant steel" should be lifted. This steel is crucial to making cars. Pushing back against the automakers, steelmakers are expected to argue, as they did 13 years ago, that they need the duties to repel unfair foreign competition and avoid harm.

Well, times change, and it's time to lift these duties on steel. This isn't 1993.

It's hard to overstate the importance of access to corrosion-resistant steel for American manufacturing. Auto makers need it for exterior body panels, doors, hoods, roofs and fenders -- in other words, to produce a car. It is used in making auto parts, construction materials, appliances and consumer hardware. Metal fabricators, many of them small family-owned operations scattered across the American heartland, depend on it. From corporate America to Mom and Pop operations, the U.S. needs this steel to stay in business. The automakers will testify on the side of the foreign companies accused of dumping, but in fact they're testifying for the U.S. economy.

Under U.S. trade law, the duties can't be lifted unless it can be shown that the petitioning industry -- steel -- is no longer exposed to harm from competition. The protectionists at the U.S. Commerce Department haven't helped matters by releasing a report claiming that without the duties "dumping" would resume. But as the nation's steel users are arguing, that report drew its conclusions from market circumstances in 1993. There's little doubt that the dynamics of the global steel market are entirely different than they were 13 years ago.

For starters, since 1993 the U.S. government has absorbed two-thirds of Big Steel's pension "legacy" costs ($9 billion), which was one of the biggest barriers to the industry's consolidation. Data showing a 70% increase in prices for corrosion-resistant steel in 2004-2006, compared with the 2000-2003 period, suggest that the reorganized U.S. industry has strong pricing power. Big Steel is also turning in impressive profitability numbers, easily outstripping the 5.5% profit-on-sales average reported by the Census Bureau for durable-goods manufacturers as a whole in the first half of 2006.

Pricing power and profitability are a direct consequence of the supply restraints caused by anti-dumping duties. Those duties, which can range from 2% to 40%, are also assigned retroactively; so foreign sellers of steel to the U.S. -- which have to collect the duty as part of their price -- never know what their final financial exposure will be. This discourages many foreign companies from even thinking about shipping steel to the U.S. And with global demand for steel strong, why bother? Meanwhile, U.S. users of steel find reliable supplies at globally competitive prices hard to come by. U.S. mills have been known to refuse quotes and limit order size.

Big Steel, which employs 130,000, might want to consider the consequences of squeezing its own customers. U.S. car makers and the auto-parts industry support 2.4 million jobs, and the auto sector buys about half of all U.S. shipments of corrosion-resistant steel. If these businesses move off-shore, U.S. steel will have to compete without the protection of the ITC.

The auto industry says it already buys "the overwhelming majority of [its] steel from U.S. steel mills and will continue to do so irrespective of the outcome of this dispute." But that may not be the case if companies that need steel move their manufacturing businesses off-shore. As Josephine Cooper, Toyota group vice president says, "There is no longer an economic basis for keeping these duties. The steel industry benefits from unnecessary protection while the duties hurt a much wider sector of the U.S. economy."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Judge To Decide On Setting Deadlines For Everglades Restoration (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

Lawyers for the state Department of Environmental Protection and South Florida water managers urged a federal judge Monday not to issue an order imposing deadlines for Everglades restoration work, contending it is both illegal and unnecessary.

Charles Demonaco, attorney for the state agency, told U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno that a federal court has no business imposing its will on how a state follows its own laws. Demonaco said a cleanup plan meeting court approval for the Everglades is already enshrined in state law, making a court order unneeded.

"There is a long-term plan that is in effect," Demonaco said at a hearing. "A federal court would be intruding in the daily activities of a state. That would be an unlawful order."

DOJ_NMG_0082157

But Dexter Lehtinen, attorney for the Miccosukee Tribe of Indians of Florida, said court orders are the only way to ensure that Florida agencies continue to meet the terms of a settlement reached over a decade ago to restore the Everglades and reduce phosphorus-laden runoff from continuing to damage the ecosystem.

Lehtinen, a former U.S. attorney, said without such court supervision Florida officials could modify their restoration plan unilaterally. The Miscosukees consider the Everglades their ancestral home and have joined the case to ensure enforcement of water quality goals.

"It's a question of ordering them to do what they have promised you they would do," Lehtinen told Moreno. "The long-term plan means nothing without your court order."

Moreno appeared skeptical of claims by the state and South Florida Water Management District that he should do nothing but "monitor" compliance, noting that the state's power to act alone was "a big hole" in dealing with any future violations of the original cleanup settlement.

"They just don't want an order. I'm not understanding quite why they don't," Moreno said.

Edward Geldermann, a U.S. Justice Department attorney representing the federal side of the agreement, said because the state is doing a great deal of work as promised a new court order from Moreno would be "unnecessary." But Geldermann stopped short of saying Moreno had no authority to do so.

The hearing marked the latest skirmish in the implementation of a multbillion-dollar plan by the state and federal governments to restore the Everglades. Moreno must decide what to do in response to a 108-page report by a special master he appointed, who found in July that there have been water quality violations of the court agreement.

The state's position is essentially that everything that can be done is being done and that Moreno need only keep a close watch on how work proceeds. The cornerstone of the project is construction of huge filtering marshes intended to keep phosphorus-laden runoff from farms, towns and other sources from getting into the Everglades.

Moreno did not indicate when he would rule.

ConocoPhillips Will Pay More Than $2.3 Million For Dalco Spill (SEAPI)

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 17, 2006

In a settlement reached Monday with the U.S. Justice Department, ConocoPhillips will pay more than $2.3 million in costs and penalties for a 2004 incident that spilled more than 1,000 gallons of crude oil in Puget Sound's Dalco Passage.

The agreement with the company, and its wholly owned subsidiary, Polar Tankers, was reached following an extensive investigation by the U.S Coast Guard and the state Ecology Department following the Oct. 13, 2004 spill. The investigation found that the tanker Polar Texas released the oil as it took on ballast while departing Commencement Bay.

The spill went unnoticed until the following morning when the captain of a tug boat reported oil in the water south of Vashon and Maury islands. Although state law requires the offending vessel to report and participate in the cleanup, the Polar Texas did neither, the Coast Guard said yesterday in a press release.

The $2,233,293.94 in pollution removal costs under the federal Oil Pollution Act of 1990 represents 100 percent of all costs the federal government incurred during cleanup operations in Dalco Passage. The federal and state government's claims against ConocoPhillips for injuries to natural resources, however, have not been resolved and are not included in the total.

ConocoPhillips, however, also will pay an $80,000 civil penalty under the federal Clean Water Act. Last Friday, the state Ecology Department settled a $540,000 claim against the oil corporation under state law.

"Today's settlement with ConocoPhillips sends a strong signal to the tank vessel industry that those who spill oil and pollute the pristine waters of Puget Sound will be held fully financially accountable," said Coast Guard Capt. Steve Metruck, Captain of the Port for Puget Sound.

The spill spread patches of oily sheen as far south as the Tacoma Narrows and as far north as Eagle Harbor. The sheen touched more than 15 miles of shore along Colvos Passage, the Narrows and Quartermaster Harbor and left a filmy coating along six miles of southern Vashon and Maury islands.

At its height, the response and cleanup involved nearly 300 people, 10 oil-skimming vessels, 24,000 feet of boom, three helicopters and other boats and equipment, the Coast Guard said.

An estimated 59 tons of oily debris were recovered from shoreline cleanup, as well as nearly 7,000 gallons of oily water from skimming operations.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

DOJ_NMG_0082158

Money-laundering Scheme Puts Lawyer Through The Ringer (SEAPI)

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 16, 2006

Apparently meant to be a money-laundering scheme, the purchase of this Laundromat didn't wash with federal drug investigators.

Medina lawyer Stephen Plowman, who represented a cocaine trafficker, pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court to a financial reporting crime after helping his client buy the Queen Anne Maytag Laundry.

Plowman, 51, admitted he received more than $100,000 in cash from his client to buy the Laundromat for him in June 2005 and failed to file a currency transaction report, federal prosecutors said.

The Internal Revenue Service requires reporting of cash payments of more than $10,000 received in a trade or business. Willful failure to do so is a felony.

Federal prosecutors said Plowman's client, Carlos Ford, wanted the Laundromat to launder drug proceeds. After buying the business, Ford has been convicted of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and was sentenced last month to 10 years in prison.

Under a plea agreement, Plowman admitted that he had failed to file the required currency transaction report on more than one occasion.

Prosecutors said Plowman received close to $120,000 in cash from Ford's cocaine trafficking, using $100,000 for part of the purchase price of the Laundromat and using the rest for Laundromat expenses and for his fee.

Plowman also received two cashier's checks totaling about $56,000 from Ford for the purchase. He paid $160,000 in cash and check for the Laundromat but wrote a purchase agreement that listed a sales price of $60,000 in an attempt to hide the drug money.

The guilty plea by the lawyer "sends a strong message that no one is above the law," said Rodney Benson, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in Seattle.

Plowman will be sentenced Jan. 27. The prospective sentencing guideline for his crime is 18 to 24 months imprisonment, with a maximum sentence of 10 years.

More headlines and info from Queen Anne.

Clogged Sinuses? Sign In, Please (HARTC)

By Hilary Waldman, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, October 16, 2006

Cold Medicine Goes Behind The Counter

In the two weeks since a federal law put more than a dozen popular cold and sinus pills behind the drugstore counter, the Arrow Pharmacy in Hartford has not sold a single box of Sudafed.

It may be that it's not really cold season yet, pharmacist Eddie Martucci speculated.

Or it may be that customers are put off by a new law that requires them to show a photo ID and sign a logbook before purchasing products that contain pseudoephedrine, the key ingredient in many popular nasal decongestants.

It's a "pain," said Angelo DeFazio, owner of the Arrow Pharmacy on Farmington Avenue.

The behind-the-counter rule, which started Oct. 1, is designed to make it harder for criminals to buy large quantities of legal pseudoephedrine and to use it to produce the illegal drug methamphetamine. The logbook must be made available to agents of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, who are authorized to inspect pharmacies to enforce all U.S. drug laws.

The law, part of the federal Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act and included in the anti-terrorist Patriot Act, is designed to keep popular nasal decongestants available without a prescription, while curbing their use to make illegal drugs.

Using large quantities of cold medicine, household drain cleaner, ordinary batteries, and recipes available on the Internet, it has been easy for drug abusers to produce large quantities of crystal meth in home laboratories.

On the upside, DeFazio said, the law allows pharmacists to monitor pseudoephedrine sales and to warn people with problems such as heart conditions that they probably should not be taking the drug. He said, despite the hassles, that he supports the law.

"It's well worth it," DeFazio said. "We've had some of these illegal meth labs in some very obscure little towns."

Beyond the hassle factor, some pharmacists suspect consumers may be buying the wrong cold medicine. Some pharmacists say sales of Sudafed and its generic equivalents are down because customers are confused by a look-alike product called "Sudafed PE" - which does not have pseudoephedrine and is still available on open drugstore shelves.

With only look-alikes on the shelves, some people are accidentally settling for cold products that don't work as well as those behind the counter, said Alan Rosenthal, a pharmacist at Suburban Pharmacy on North Main Street in West Hartford.

DOJ_NMG_0082159

In a pharmaceutical journal article published last summer, two University of Florida pharmacists said the alternative product, Sudafed PE, or its generic equivalent, is not effective. The "PE" stands for phenylephrine, a compound that is not sufficiently absorbed into the blood stream to make it effective as an oral nasal decongestant, pharmacists Leslie Hendeles and Rancy C. Hatton said in the journal article.

Pfizer, the maker of Sudafed and Sudafed PE has said that the alternative drug does work and that customers who prefer the original are free to ask for it at the pharmacy counter.

Rosenthal said some of his customers have brought the PE products to the counter and asked for his advice.

"I tell them that pseudoephedrine is a better product," Rosenthal said.

He said few customers have balked at producing identification or signing the logbook once he explained the law. To purchase a pseudoephedrine product, customers must record their name, address and date of birth in a log book that pharmacies must keep behind the counter. They also must show a photo ID.

At some pharmacies, asking for pseudoephedrine products at the pharmacy is nothing new. Last year, several large chain stores including Walgreens, CVS and Wal-Mart voluntarily placed products containing pseudoephedrine behind the counter.

The signature requirement also is not unprecedented, said Martucci of Arrow Pharmacy. He recalled that in the late 1970s a customer signature was required for the purchase of paregoric, an opium-based medicine that was used to treat diarrhea in children and teething pain in babies. Paregoric has since been pulled from the market.

White House Commends Montana Meth Project (AP)

AP, October 17, 2006

The Montana Meth Project, a campaign with graphic messages about the perils of methamphetamine use, received White House recognition Monday.

John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, appeared in Great Falls and cited the project as one of the nation's most powerful anti-drug efforts. Walters presented a certificate of recognition, which business tycoon and part-time Montana resident Tom Siebel accepted on behalf of the project.

It is funded by the Thomas and Stacey Siebel Foundation. The project begun in 2005 aims to discourage first-time use of meth by teenagers. The campaign includes gritty television, newspaper and billboard portrayals of meth users.

The project is Montana's largest advertiser, and its messages reach 70-90 percent of the state's teens at least three times a week, according to the White House. Besides the advertising, the project includes work to mobilize community groups against meth.

"The Montana Meth Project is a key component of a balanced strategy against meth and is an extraordinary example of the results we can achieve when we combine the power of advertising with the dedication and expertise of the leaders of this community," Walters said.

Larimer/Weld Summit Takes On Meth Issue (COL)

The Coloradoan, October 16, 2006

About 100 community leaders looking for solutions to the growing use of methamphetamine in Larimer and Weld counties gathered today for a day-long summit at The Ranch, Larimer County's fairgrounds and special events complex.

Participants were told meth, a powerful stimulant that is highly addictive, takes a toll not only on users but on the community as well, through higher human services costs and a clogged criminal justice system.

About 80 percent of the meth found in the United States comes from Mexico or large "super labs," said John Horton, associate deputy director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

The number of small labs in the country is down 29 percent in recent years, he said.

Partnerships between governments at home and abroad are needed to curtail the production and use of the drug, Horton said.

"We know we can make a difference when state, national and local communities come together," he said. "That's why drug use is down in this country."

Officials Discuss Growing Problem Of Meth Use At Regional Summit (GT)

Greeley (CO) Tribune, October 17, 2006

Multiple, easily-accessible chemicals melded into one substance has created a drug of choice that has led to many social problems.

The problem of methamphetamine use has become so large in the region that its abuse prompted leaders from Weld and Larimer counties to gather Monday at The Ranch in Loveland to discuss the problem of the drug's abuse in northern Colorado.

About 70 people participated in the day-long brainstorming session. State, county and city government officials, law enforcement representatives and people from local treatment centers in both counties joined the discussions.

John Horton, associate deputy director for state and local affairs in the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, spoke early in the meeting about the national problem. He said local governments need to lead the way in tackling the problem and he applauded Colorado's laws that make it more difficult to purchase ingredients used for the drug.

Experts talked about the drug problem that is correlated with child abuse and neglect. More information about the addictive drug set a solemn tone at the meeting.

Deb Hill, a drug and alcohol counselor at Island Grove Regional Treatment Center in Greeley, spoke about the day she discovered meth. The day before she graduated high school, one of her cousins shared the drug with her.

"As soon as I used that first line I knew that things were going to change," Hill said.

But things didn't change immediately. Hill said she found a substance that gave her a surge of energy and empowered her when she was uncomfortable.

"Methamphetamine worked for me," Hill said. "I used it for the weekend and stopped in time to go to work."

Eventually she used the drug during the week and couldn't hold a steady job. Hill said she ended up in a homeless shelter with a 6-month-old child and eventually gave birth to her third child who was born affected by the drug.

But all was not lost.

"We do recover," Hill said. "We become responsible, productive, loving parents."

That message hit Scoot Crandall, executive director of TEAM Fort Collins.

"I came here with the idea that there's no such thing as a recovering meth addict, but that's not true," Crandall said.

Area leaders shared ideas about how to prevent, intervene and treat addictions. Possible partnerships could develop in the future.

"There was good dialogue," said Weld County Commissioner Dave Long. "That's always the beginning step. Everybody had open minds. Now we just have to draw on what the positive ideas are."

Plan Called A Meth Gateway (DENP)

Denver Post, October 17, 2006

Loveland - A proposal on the state ballot to loosen marijuana laws in Colorado would make it harder to fight the war on methamphetamine abuse, a federal drug official said Monday.

John Horton, a former Oregon prosecutor, said Amendment 44 - which would allow people 21 and older to legally possess an ounce or less of pot - would make marijuana accessible to more people and allow them to fall victim to the highly-addictive and destructive properties of methamphetamines.

"Many meth addicts say they started with marijuana," said Horton. "So I don't think we want Colorado to be a testing ground for new marijuana laws."

Horton, associate deputy director for state and local affairs in the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, spoke at a summit sponsored by officials in Larimer and Weld counties.

The meeting was called to compare notes and arrive at strategies to deal with the spread of methamphetamine use and meth labs in northern Colorado.

Both counties report big increases in meth use in just the past few years. In Weld County, for instance, the Island Grove Treatment Center in 2005 saw a 62 percent increase in women who were pregnant and admitted using meth and a 20 percent increase in the total number of those admitted - 860 - who reported meth use.

Meth is highly addictive and often leads to job loss, homelessness, health problems and deadly violence, say officials and past users.

Deb Hill, a counselor at Island Grove, said she was seduced by meth just before her high school graduation. The drug made her feel confident and outgoing, two qualities she lacked.

"When I used that first line, I knew things were going to change for me," Hill said.

But slowly meth began to chip away at her life and she lost her family and became homeless. "I had track marks up and down my arms, and I went 12 days without sleep or food," Hill said. "I knew my life didn't work."

Social service workers helped her recover, and she implored the 100 or so gathered at Monday's summit to work together to solve the meth problem.

"You are the decision-makers; you are the movers and shakers. You can make a difference," Hill said.

Horton said there have been strides in cutting meth traffic, including reducing the number of small labs in the country by 29 percent. He said efforts like Amendment 44 would only hurt the fight, however, because marijuana is a "gateway drug."

DOJ_NMG_0082161

Mason Tvert, campaign director for Amendment 44, said Horton and other officials are using scare tactics to sink the proposal. Recent studies have shown marijuana's status as a gateway drug is overblown and most illicit drug users start with alcohol and tobacco, Tvert said.

He added: "They need to point out to people that there are other drugs out there we need to talk about besides marijuana."

Colombian Man Gets 15 Years In Cocaine Bust (NDN)

Naples Daily News, October 16, 2006

A Colombian man caught with nearly two tons of cocaine in international waters was sentenced today in Fort Myers to 15 years in prison.

Leopoldo Caiceda Caiceda, 57, of Buenaventura, Colombia, pleaded guilty in June to possession of cocaine and conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute cocaine.

He was found last December along with three other men in a fishing boat off the coast of Costa Rica. In their wooden fishing boat U.S. Coast Guard officials found 3,500 pounds of cocaine, said Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Doug Molloy.

"The retail value of this is almost unimaginable," Molloy said.

The drugs are suspected of being en route to Florida, which is why Caiceda was being prosecuted here. Caiceda's 190-month sentence was the harshest among the men found in his boat. He was considered the captain of the boat, which is why he received the harshest punishment from U.S. Magistrate Sheri Polster Chappel, Molloy said.

Fellow Colombians Victor Manuel Lemos Vasquez, 37, of Calle-Primera; Mauro Luis Badillo Lozano, 41, of Bahia Solano; and Jaime Beltran, 53, of Cali; each received 135-month sentences.

This is the second time Caiceda was caught transporting drugs. In the mid-1990s he was picked up with 27,000 pounds of marijuana, Molloy said. For that offense he served five years in prison and was deported to Colombia.

Border Patrol, Lawmen Outgunned By Cartels (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, October 17, 2006

Homeland Security panel also says traffickers are forming ties with U.S.-based gangs

The U.S. Border Patrol and other law enforcement agencies at the U.S.-Mexico border are outgunned by increasingly ruthless and well-armed Mexican drug cartels, a new congressional report concludes.

"The cartels use automatic assault weapons, bazookas, grenade launchers and improvised explosive devices," the House Homeland Security oversight subcommittee report said. "In contrast, U.S. Border Patrol agents are issued 40-caliber Beretta semiautomatic pistols."

The report, scheduled to be released today by U.S. Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Austin, said drug cartels are able to break the encryptions on Border Patrol and sheriffs' deputies' radios.

"Lookouts for the cartels, using military grade equipment, are positioned at strategic points on the U.S. side of the border to monitor movements of U.S. law enforcement," it continued.

Fear of terrorismEven as the traffickers expand their drugrunning routes to smuggle immigrants into the United States, they are forming dangerous alliances with U.S.-based criminal gangs such as MS-13 and the Latin Kings, according to the congressional panel.

McCaul, whose district stretches into western Harris County, chairs the subcommittee.

The former federal prosecutor expressed concern that trafficking networks could use their delivery routes to smuggle terrorists or weapons of mass destruction into the U.S.

"The thing that keeps me up at night when I think 'What can we do to prevent another 9/11?' is that they own these delivery routes," he said in an interview Monday.

Hezbollah members already have entered the U.S. from Mexico, the report confirmed.

"As if narco-terrorist violence were not enough, extensions of Middle East terrorism have crept into the United States," the report stated. "Islamic radical groups that support Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamiya Al Gamat are all active in Latin America."

McCaul said he commissioned the report to bring focus to the national security threat and rising violence at the border, which has witnessed a spree of murders and kidnappings linked to warring drug cartels, particularly in Nuevo Laredo.

The federal government has added Border Patrol agents, detention beds and high-tech surveillance systems to deter illegal crossings, he said, with less attention to the border's other problems.

DOJ_NMG_0082162

"We put billions of dollars in trying to stop the flow coming in, in a more reactive way, and what I'm suggesting is we also need to take a look at the other piece of this problem and identify what is the root cause and attack the root cause head on," he said. "In my view, the head of the snake is the cartels."

McCaul urged better intelligence gathering in Mexico and Latin America. And he called for greater cooperation with the Mexican government to crack down on the cartels.

Still, he acknowledged that expanding the partnership is difficult in light of persistent corruption in Mexican law enforcement ranks and the deadly attacks the cartels have launched on Mexican authorities.

Growing populationCiting federal estimates that the Border Patrol apprehends only 10 percent to 30 percent of illegal crossers, the report said as many as 10 million illegal immigrants may have entered the U.S. last year.

Estimates by the Pew Hispanic Center and other experts peg the illegal immigrant population in the U.S. at 11 million to 12 million.

And while federal law enforcement seized 1.1 million pounds of cocaine and 6.8 million pounds of marijuana, McCaul's staff estimated the total cocaine flow may have topped 11 million pounds.

"While the United States has taken positive steps to secure its borders, much more is needed to combat an increasingly powerful, sophisticated, organized and violent criminal network which seeks to move illegal contraband ... into our country for profit," the report concludes.

Rebel Head Said Plotted To Keep Hostages (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, (AP) -- The government said Monday that a top Latin American rebel leader plotted to keep three Americans hostage and use them as political bargaining chips after their plane crashed in Colombia.

But the defense portrayed Ricardo Palmera as a tangential sympathizer of the leftist FARC group who unfairly got caught in the middle after trying to negotiate a deal between guerrilla fighters and the U.S.-backed Colombian government.

"This man had nothing to do with the capture of the three Americans," said Palmera attorney Robert Tucker. "He became the pawn in the power play."

Justice Department attorney John Crabb opened his case by arguing that Palmera — better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad — was guilty on charges of hostage-taking, conspiracy and providing material support to terrorists.

"We'll trade you hostages — including three Americans — for all FARC prisoners in jail. That was Simon Trinidad's offer," Crabb said.

"He admitted he was a member of FARC, he admitted FARC takes hostages," he said. "That man, Simon Trinidad, tried to use them as get out of jail cards for FARC."

Tucker countered that there was little evidence tying Palmera directly to the hostage-taking after the plane carrying the U.S. military contractors encountered engine trouble and crashed in February 2003.

"There's no evidence he's ever seen them," Tucker said. "There's no evidence he ever made any demand or talked to anybody."

A panel of 15 jurors and alternates listened intently. In the courtroom audience sat family members of the three American hostages.

"Despicable," muttered Jo Rosano, mother of Marc Gonsalves, as prosecutors laid out their case against Palmera.

A relaxed Palmera, dressed neatly in a dark suit and green tie, flashed a smile to the packed courtroom audience when he entered the courtroom. Once arguments began, he sat quietly, using headphones to listen to a Spanish translator.

The jury will decide the fate of Palmera in the 3-year-old kidnapping case, in which three Americans are believed to be held by guerrillas in the thick jungles of southeastern Colombia. The trial is expected to last five to six weeks.

Palmera, 56, was extradited in late 2004 after his capture in Ecuador.

FARC is demanding that the Colombian government release all of the group's imprisoned members, including Palmera, in exchange for the release of 62 hostages. The hostages include the three Americans on the plane — Gonsalves, Thomas Howes and Keith Stansell — who authorities say were defense contractors involved in a counternarcotics mission.

Palmera is also charged in the killings of two others on the plane, U.S. pilot Thomas Janis and Sgt. Luis Alcides Cruz, a Colombian soldier, who were found near the crash site, apparently shot to death. The prosecution has argued that the plane was shot down, although that is in dispute.

The trial is the latest evidence of a toughened U.S. stance against FARC. Since 2000, the U.S. has given more than $4 billion to Colombia to fight the insurgency and the world's largest cocaine industry.

DOJ_NMG_0082163

If convicted, Palmera could face 30 years in prison, the maximum allowed under the extradition treaty between Colombia and the United States.

A former banker from a wealthy family, the Harvard-educated Palmera says he took up arms to fight social injustice. FARC, along with a smaller leftist rebel group, has battled to topple the Colombian government for 42 years in a conflict that has claimed more than 3,000 lives every year.

He told The Associated Press in 1999 that he had chosen to "be alongside the progressive people fighting the 10 percent of landowners who are monopolizing 90 percent of Colombia's land."

The group funds itself through drug trafficking, extortion and kidnapping.

US General: Military Aid To Colombia Should Be Reduced (AP)

AP, October 16, 2006

The U.S. military's commander for Latin America says Washington should gradually reduce its roughly $600 million in annual military and anti-drug aid to Colombia, support that has been crucial to putting the region's most potent rebel force on the defensive.

"I'm not concerned there's going to be a loss of funding," Gen. John Craddock said Monday when asked about reports that the State Department wants to phase out Plan Colombia, which has provided the country with some $4 billion in total aid since 2000.

"First of all, there should be (decreased funding), over time. It makes sense. The Colombians are winning," said Craddock, a four-star general and former tank commander who this week ends a two-year stint as chief of the U.S. Southern Command.

"(The Colombians) are taking every year more and more responsibility for the conduct and the resources. That's the way it ought to be," said Craddock, who will be assuming command of U.S. forces in Europe and Africa and of NATO.

In an interview with several news organizations at his headquarters, Craddock said Colombia's defense minister, Juan Manuel Santos, is in agreement with reductions in U.S. military funding.

The U.S. aid has helped President Alvaro Uribe, elected in May to a second four-year term, make Colombia's highways and cities safer and cut the world's highest kidnapping rate roughly in half by putting the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, on the defensive.

And though it is questionable whether Plan Colombia has put a serious dent in drug trafficking from the world's leading cocaine producing nation, from which the FARC and other illegal armed groups benefit, the Colombian military's gains are measurable.

U.S. analysts say the FARC has been reduced by some 5,000 fighters to 12,000 since 2002 as Uribe boosted the number of police and soldiers by 30 percent, created elite anti-insurgency units and benefited from training by U.S. Special Forces and closer intelligence-sharing.

Colombia's military has also gained air mobility with the acquisition of a fleet of UH-60 Blackhawk helicopters.

But Uribe's armed forces have recently been beset by a series of scandals, including accusations of dozens of civilians killed by soldiers who claimed they were rebels and allegations that military intelligence officers have staged bombings and FARC surrenders to make it appear as if they have been weakening the rebels.

The most egregious scandal involved the May massacre of 10 anti-drug police by a military unit - a hit allegedly ordered up by cocaine mafiosos.

On other topics, Craddock said he believes there is greater democracy in the region than when he assumed command two years ago of Southcom's 1,200 soldiers and civilians in the Caribbean and Latin America south of Mexico.

"I think that if you take it on balance and look at the entire region there's cause for optimism," he said, adding that the results of Sunday's elections in Ecuador indicate democracy is working even in that chronically unstable country.

Leftist economist Rafael Correa, who vowed not to renew the U.S. base at Manta when its lease runs out in 2009, scored far fewer votes Sunday that pre-election polls indicated, forcing a November runoff with Alvaro Noboa, Ecuador's wealthiest man. Noboa is far more acceptable to Washington.

Craddock said the rise of populists in Latin America - he was careful not to name names - highlight his greatest concern about the region: that even with economic growth, little has been done to bridge the wide gap between rich and poor.

"I think that what we're seeing is a recognition that governments have an obligation in the region to eliminate poverty, reduce corruption and reduce the inequality," he said.

Craddock has in the past accused President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela of playing a "destabilizing" role by trying to export his "extreme populist movement" elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0082164

Asked for evidence of that Monday in the case of Bolivia, Craddock would not comment. But he denied that U.S. military ties with Bolivia have suffered, even as populist President Evo Morales strengthens military cooperation with Venezuela. He said U.S. soldiers are currently planning a humanitarian assistance mission in Bolivia under the "New Horizons" program, in which U.S. soldiers engage in construction projects and provide free medical care.

Craddock's replacement as Southcom chief, Adm. James G. Stavridis, takes over on Thursday. Like Craddock before him, Stravridis wears four stars and comes to the job after serving as a top military aide to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

U.S. Taking Wait-and-see Approach On Ecuador, General Says (MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

McClatchy Newspapers, October 16, 2006

MIAMI - Hailing democratic gains in Latin America, the departing head of the U.S. Southern Command said Monday that the Pentagon is taking a wait-and-see approach to whether Ecuador's elections will lead to the loss of a U.S. military base there.

In a wide-ranging interview with several reporters, Army Gen. Bantz "John" Craddock offered an upbeat assessment of the region where he has overseen U.S. military operations for the past two years. He next moves to Europe as NATO commander.

"I know there's been a lot of rhetoric from presidential candidates in Ecuador," he said - casting vows by the leftist candidate to end the U.S. military presence there as an "if, then" hypothesis.

"We'll have to see how it all sorts out," Craddock said. "And then we'll talk to the new government and see what kind of accommodations and agreements we can reach."

There is no certainty that the United States will have to abandon its down-range air operations at Manta, Ecuador, used by U.S. surveillance aircraft and other forces for anti-drug operations. A runoff election Nov. 26 will pit billionaire banana magnate Alvaro Noboa, who favors close ties with the United States, against Rafael Correa, a leftist who has vowed to close the base. Correa placed second in first-round elections over the weekend.

Craddock came to the Southcom post after serving as senior military assistant to Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld.

His replacement, Adm. James Stavridis, takes command at Southcom Thursday, in a ceremony at the Doral, Fla., headquarters - a nine-mile commute from the Coral Gables residence that comes with the job.

"I won't miss the traffic. But I really like the area," said Craddock, who described South Florida as "eclectic," "international in flavor" and populated with academics and others who have keen interest in the region.

Coral Gables Mayor Don Slesnick, who has been among the staunchest backers of basing Southcom in South Florida, said Craddock led the headquarters at a tumultuous time in the region.

"I'll give credit to General Craddock for giving a steady course of action during his tenure and certainly helping calm the waves of a troubled sea," said Slesnick, who added that Craddock also found time to serve on the Orange Bowl Committee and speak to the Greater Miami Chamber of Commerce.

In the interview, Craddock said he was not concerned by predictions that the United States would cut funds to Plan Colombia, the roughly $600 million a year multi-agency U.S. program that has over the years spent billions of dollars to disrupt the drug trade and insurgencies that profit from it.

"First of all, there should be reductions over time. It makes sense," he said.

"The Colombians are winning, they are taking every year more and more responsibility for the conduct and for the resources. That's the way it ought to be."

In two years on the job, he said he has seen enhanced democracy across the region - and pointed to a dozen elections in the past year as the proof of it.

"I do think there is freedom of expression; look around at the elections this year. Think about it. Twelve or 13 that's happened already. It's been significant. The second round in Brazil, the second round in Ecuador - the process is working!" he said. "It's not like our process. But that's OK; it's fine. Every place is a little different. Some of the countries have 20 and 30 political parties."

Craddock spoke expansively for nearly an hour in a conference room outside his office, beneath a poster of Uncle Sam pointing and the slogan: "We're at war. Are you doing all you can?"

Craddock said the left-right struggles in the region don't threaten democracy - so long as the people can "hire and fire their government" through elections.

Democracy is endangered, he said, when people take their political grievances to the streets or resort to "extreme viewpoints on the left and right," and, ultimately, violence.

"I know there are many with pessimistic views of Latin America and the Caribbean basin in terms of fragile democracies, populist movements," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082165

"But I think if you take it on balance and look at the entire region I think there's cause for optimism. ... As these democracies, however strong or fragile as they may be, continue to exist and grow, mature, I think that over time, the trends will be positive."

Moonshiners Nearly Extinct In W.Va. (CDM)

By Justin D. Anderson, Daily Mail Staff

Charleston Daily Mail, October 17, 2006

The West Virginia moonshiner is a vanishing breed made all but extinct by economics and modern law enforcement techniques, experts say.

Moonshine is not profitable to make for widespread sale anymore.

And in the modern era of ATVs and helicopter aerial searches, it's harder for a moonshiner to hide.

But moonshine hasn't gone away entirely.

An elderly Roane County man was recently arrested for allegedly shooting his nephew after a night of drinking moonshine. When police found Wayne Howard Mallory passed out in his trailer, they roused him and asked him about the shooting. Mallory couldn't remember anything about it.

In August, authorities seized $1 million worth of marijuana and a moonshine still at a Greenbrier County couple's 29-acre property.

"There's probably a bit of it going on, but I don't think it's a problem," said Paul Cross, agent in charge of the Charleston office of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Cross said his agency hasn't come across a real case of moonshine-making in about seven years. "People get into that stuff to make money," he said. "It doesn't seem to be economically viable to do it at this time."

Paul Rakes, a history professor at WVU Tech in Montgomery, knows a little something about moonshine. His grandfather made it in the basement and ran the exhaust from the still out the chimney.

The classic, romantic image of the moonshiner came from journalists writing after the Civil War, he said.

"The moonshiner, he's this person that's lived this agrarian life and the only thing that made him a criminal was the interference of the government," Rakes said.

Most were farmers who didn't have the means of transportation to get all their corn to market. It was easier to get corn whiskey to market.

People who made moonshine back then had to fight off taxmen -- or revenuers -- who trudged into the mountains to collect on the product. Moonshiners developed an attitude of "negative liberty," Rakes said, which means "If people leave me alone, I'll leave them alone."

Modernization mostly did away with that kind of attitude, Rakes said, but it still exists in some remote pockets of West Virginia. And these usually are the places where there's still some moonshine going around.

However, Rakes said: "The tools to locate and defeat moonshining are so advanced now. They've simply advanced beyond the ability to produce moonshine. It's just too risky.

"And the culture of the people is changing. You have skills and intelligence of the mountain that are passing away with these old practices of rebellion."

As late as 1988, Rakes said he went to a Christmas party where some state troopers showed up and brought some "excellent" hooch. He didn't ask them where they got it.

Kevin Barksdale, who teaches Appalachian history at Marshall, said the moonshine that's still around today is mostly made and kept within the small circle of family and friends. "It's always been a very familial thing passing around the jar," he said.

There's still pride in being able to make a good batch, he said. The social stigma of breaking out a jar seems to have passed, too. Barksdale said he was just at a bluegrass concert when, in the middle of the show, someone pulled out a big jar of moonshine.

Col. David Lemmon, superintendent of the West Virginia State Police and a longtime law enforcement officer can remember busting stills back in the 1950s and 1960s while he was stationed at the Chelyan detachment.

Even back then, he said it was a declining problem. Lemmon said they'd occasionally find a still in an out-building or an abandoned mineshaft.

Lemmon said he remembers patrolling the area around Campbell's Creek back in the early 1960s when he dropped in behind a Beckley man driving a Buick on U.S. 60.

The guy took off and Lemmon gave chase. The suspect went around a curve a little too fast and ended upside down in the creek. Jars of moonshine busted everywhere.

DOJ_NMG_0082166

"He was bringing it in," Lemmon said. "He wasn't drunk, he was just driving too fast. He didn't get hurt seriously."
Those days are mostly gone, though, Lemmon said. It's unusual for troopers to make this kind of discovery.
And that's all right for Lemmon, who never did see the big attraction in moonshine, anyway.
"I never did taste any of it that tasted good," he said. "I always thought it smelled like kerosene."
Contact writer Justin D. Anderson at justin@dailymail.com or 348-4843.

IMMIGRATION:

Child Abuse Lawsuit Creates Immigration Waves (CBS2CHI)

By Rob Johnson
CBS 2 Chicago, October 17, 2006
(CBS) CHICAGO A child abuse lawsuit aimed at helping illegal immigrants stay in the country is creating some waves.
Some people believe the lawsuit in support a Chicago mother and her son misses a critical point, and CBS 2's Rob Johnson reports that others believe it's right on target.
The immigration debate has become one of America's most pressing issues. The latest salvo fired came last week with the filing of a class action lawsuit on behalf of children like 7-year-old Saul Arellano, whose mother Elvira is hunkered down in a Humboldt Park church fighting deportation.
The suit names President Bush and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, among others, and claims that such deportations are a form of child abuse.
"They should be able to live in this country with their parents and that is not happening," said Emma Lozano with the Center Without Borders.
That strategy, says CBS 2 legal analyst Irv Miller, is a long shot.
"It's probably not going to be a class action, which is what the mom and the child want it to be to gain the notoriety," Miller said.
But UIC child psychiatry professor Dr. Bennett Leventhal believes that a child in that type of situation faces real emotional damage.
"I think it would be an abusive thing to forcibly separate children from their parents under circumstances like that where it is clearly avoidable," Leventhal said.
But there are others, like Michelle Jacobsen with the Chicago Minuteman Project, who contend that Elvira Arellano is confusing the entire issue.
"Why did a mother put her child in this situation? Because the government didn't do that to her. The government didn't force her to come over the border," Jacobsen said. "The government didn't force her to fraudulently use a Social Security number or to have a child over here when she was illegal. She made all of those choices herself."
Supporters of undocumented immigrants are planning to have many of these children at a huge rally in Washington on Nov. 3, hoping the president will hear their pleas.
Their opponents vow to continue talking about how they believe illegal immigration is hurting this country.

Some Democrats Send A More Conservative Immigration Message (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns
The New York Times, October 17, 2006
CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., Oct. 11 — In Washington, the Democratic leadership in Congress has maintained a united front on immigration, demanding legislation that would legalize illegal immigrants and create a guest worker program to ensure a reliable legal flow of foreign workers.
But here in Tennessee, and in at least a dozen other fiercely contested Congressional races, Democratic candidates are publicly breaking with that message.
In North Carolina, Heath Shuler, a former Washington Redskins quarterback who is running for Congress, ran a television advertisement declaring he would never “give amnesty” to illegal immigrants. In Georgia, Representative John Barrow has played up his vote to build a fence on the southwest border. In Ohio, John Cranley, the challenger to the Republican incumbent, Representative Steve Chabot, has accused Mr. Chabot of voting to legalize hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants.
In this state, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., the Democrat running for Senate, reminds voters repeatedly that federal agents raided his Republican opponent’s business and found four illegal immigrants working there. Mr. Ford also proudly describes his vote for the border security legislation passed by the House last year, a measure condemned as anti-immigrant by many Democrats in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0082167

"I'm the only person on this stage who has ever voted for an anti-illegal-immigration bill, matter of fact the strongest in the country," Mr. Ford said this week in a debate with his Republican opponent, Bob Corker. The congressman emphasized that his position put him at odds with his party and with President Bush, who pushed for legislation to grant legal status to illegal immigrants.

The vast majority of Democrats in Congress support their leadership's call for legislation that would grant legal status to illegal immigrants and toughen border security. And politicians of all stripes go against their party leaders, on occasion, to address regional concerns. But the appearance of some candidates vying to be tougher than Republicans on border security, particularly in tight races in conservative states, shows how divisive the immigration issue remains.

The tough border security message is carried mostly by Democrats in the South and the Midwest, where a surge of Hispanic immigration is transforming small towns and cities. In such communities, some candidates are deriding legalization as amnesty, proclaiming border security as their priority or criticizing Republican challengers as failing to stem the tide of illegal immigration.

This stance has fueled an outcry from immigrant advocacy groups, including the National Council of La Raza and the Tennessee Immigrant and Refugee Rights Coalition, which have accused some Democrats of abandoning their principles. They warn that Democrats and Republicans who demonize immigrants risk alienating Hispanic voters, who are expected to constitute a powerful bloc in coming years.

Democratic leaders have been treading carefully. This summer, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee withdrew an advertisement from its Web site displaying images of people scaling a border fence along with images of Osama bin Laden and President Kim Jong Il of North Korea. Several Hispanic groups had complained that it unfairly likened immigrants to terrorists.

"There is a disconnect between what the national party sees as rational policies and what Congressman Ford and other Democrats have determined they need to do to win," said David Lubell, the director of the Tennessee immigrant rights coalition. "These Democrats are trying to out-right the right."

Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, who supports the legalization of illegal immigrants, also lamented the emergence of the trend in his state. "It's who can claim 'I'm not for amnesty' and who can say that the loudest," Mr. Flake said.

Republican campaign officials dismiss the phenomenon as insignificant, arguing that most Democrats still remain vulnerable on immigration, particularly among conservative voters.

"Democrats may try to talk a good game," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, "but most of the incumbents have voting records opposite to what they're now trying to claim."

Some Democrats praise the shift in tone, saying internal polling shows that the traditional message of support for legalization for illegal immigrants lacks the backing of many middle-class voters, regardless of party affiliation.

"They think that Democrats are on the side of illegal immigrants even at the expense of citizens," said Jim Kessler, vice president for policy at the Third Way, a centrist Democratic research group that has conducted polling on immigration. Mr. Kessler, who in recent months has briefed senior Democratic campaign officials and the staffs of dozens of Democratic candidates, has been advising them to take the offense on border security by charging that immigration enforcement has faltered under Republican leadership.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who is leading the Democrats' campaign to win Congress, and Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, Mr. Emanuel's Senate counterpart, publicly praised Mr. Kessler's research this year.

All three men emphasized that they supported the legalization of illegal immigrants but said that it was important to note the Republicans' weaknesses on enforcement.

Mr. Kessler acknowledged that his message was hard for some Democrats "to swallow." But adopting a tougher message, he said, would make Democratic candidates less vulnerable in the November elections.

"Immigration is an incredible source of strength for Americans," he said. "But it's also a source of angst for Americans. I don't think we should just shrug that off."

The mounting Democratic ambivalence over immigration was apparent in September in the last frenetic weeks of lawmaking before the Congressional recess.

With the November elections looming, 62 House Democrats voted to support a strict border security measure championed by the Republican leadership, up from the 36 who supported tough legislation last December. In the Senate, 26 Democrats voted in favor of building 700 miles of fencing along the Mexican border, outnumbering the 17 Democrats who opposed it.

DOJ_NMG_0082168

Since then, on the campaign trail, Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, who is up for re-election and often breaks with his party, has accused his Republican challenger of supporting the legalization approach favored by two Democratic senators, Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry, both of Massachusetts.

"I support border security first; my opponent supports amnesty," Mr. Nelson said in a television advertisement this month.

Tessa Hafen, who hopes to unseat Representative Jon Porter, Republican of Nevada, said this month that Mr. Porter favored Mr. Bush's approach to immigration, "a plan Porter called amnesty." But she acknowledged in an interview that she personally favored legalization, too, along with tougher border security.

In Tennessee, Mr. Corker and his allies in the Republican Party have been trying to raise doubts about Mr. Ford's commitment to border security. In television advertisements, they say he voted against sending the military to the border and against hiring more border agents. They often note that he has voted with his party more than 80 percent of the time.

And in this week's debate, Mr. Corker, who did not return a call for comment, said that the illegal immigrants found at his work site had been hired by a subcontractor.

Mr. Ford, who is known as something of an ambitious maverick in his party, countered that he had made those votes before the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and that he had been tough on illegal immigration since then.

"They think they can come in here and just malign me as this Democrat that is out of touch, whose views don't comport with mainstream conservative values," Mr. Ford said. "But we've been able to withstand that."

Law On Overseas Brides Is Keeping Couples Apart (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

PALM COAST, Fla. — Adam Weaver thought everything was set to bring his Colombian fiancée, Yesenia Meza, to the United States.

But Mr. Weaver did not count on being hindered by a Congressional effort intended to protect women from potential abuse by American men who seek brides from other countries on the Internet. In June, the federal immigration service froze 10,000 visa applications for foreign fiancées because they did not conform with a law that went into effect in March.

Mr. Weaver and Ms. Meza, who were expecting to be together here by now, were caught in the net.

"Smuggling a ton of cocaine into this country," Mr. Weaver fumed, "is probably easier than bringing your fiancée."

The law, known as the International Marriage Broker Regulation Act, or Imbra, is intended to give foreign women and the American government more information about the men who seek so-called mail-order brides.

"This is an unequal partnership where you have somebody dependent on somebody else in a profound way," said Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, who was a leading sponsor of the law. "It puts women at a significant disadvantage, in a potentially violent situation."

Reports of violence in international marriages, some of them Internet matches, have increased in recent years. In 1998, fewer than 2,500 foreign women applied to become permanent residents under the Violence Against Women Act, which allows abused wives to apply for residence without the support of their husbands. In the fiscal year that ended in September, 9,500 applied.

The new law has angered many men, who argue that there is no definitive evidence that violence is more likely to take place in an international marriage arranged over the Internet than in a domestic one. Unwilling or unable to find a spouse in the United States, some worry that the law could make it more difficult to find a wife abroad.

"We should have the right to correspond with, date and marry the person of our choosing," said David Root, who has been involved with many women from the former Soviet Union in the past decade but has not married any of them. "The government shouldn't interfere in this."

Helped by the Internet, international matchmaking has mushroomed. In 1999, a report by the immigration service found some 200 international dating agencies in the United States. A study in 2004 found 500.

The immigration service said 37,500 women entered the country last year on fiancée visas or temporary visas for spouses of American citizens. That was a 50 percent increase from 2002, when the temporary spouse visa came into existence, and a fourfold increase over the 9,500 women who entered on fiancée visas in 1998. Estimates based on the 1999 government report suggested that one-third to one-half of these visas were for women who had met their American partners through matchmaking brokers.

Under Imbra, dating agencies that specialize in matching American men with women overseas must first obtain information about a man's criminal record and marital history, relay it to the woman and then get her consent before disclosing her contact information. Men must also provide this information to the government when applying for a fiancée visa. Generally, applicants have a lifetime visa limit of two foreign fiancées.

DOJ_NMG_0082169

Web sites offer men in affluent countries contacts with women from just about everywhere in the developing world; Brazil, Colombia, the Philippines, Russia, Ukraine and Vietnam are among the most popular countries.

The businesses vary in their approaches. Russianladies.com, owned by European Connections, based in Georgia, charges men for membership and requires a fee for sending and receiving e-mail messages. Two others, A Foreign Affair and Filipina Ladies, organize trips to places like Bangkok, where a dozen men may meet several hundred women.

"It all started with women's lib," said Sam Smith, a former salesman of insurance and mutual funds, who founded I Love Latins in Houston six years ago. "Guys are sick and tired of the North American me, me, me attitude.' "

Mr. Smith and others in the industry said most clients were middle-aged and middle-class, and able to spend several thousand dollars courting a woman overseas. Seventy percent of Mr. Smith's clients are divorced, he said.

Mr. Weaver, a 40-year-old construction manager, had almost given up on dating after a two-year marriage and a strained six-year relationship with a mother of three, which ended when she left him "for a younger man who liked to dance."

At his age, Mr. Weaver figured, the only American women who would be interested in him would be divorced, with a former husband and children in the background. "Been there, done that, not going back again," he said.

Moreover, he said, American women are self-centered, competitive and too critical. "I would prefer a more old-fashioned girl," he said.

Last year, he found Ms. Meza, a Colombian 17 years his junior, on the I Love Latins Web site. "Her profile," he wrote in an e-mail message, "was one of the only ones that said, 'I want to know a man who knows about God.' "

Mr. Weaver bought Ms. Meza a computer, a digital camera and a high-speed connection so they could talk every day by Internet phone. He sends her money on occasion, paying for her English and driving lessons. In September, he visited Ms. Meza in Colombia for the third time.

"My relationship with Yesenia," he said, "is real and more valid than anything I ever had in my life."

Ms. Meza also says she is eager to start her life with Mr. Weaver. "In Colombia most men are womanizers and want to dominate women," she said in a telephone interview. "I want a loving man who will treat me like a queen."

So far, however, they have not cleared immigration. A spokesman for the immigration service said that most of the backlogged visa applications frozen in June had been processed.

"Innocent people are being punished by a law aimed at the misdeeds of a few," Mr. Weaver said. The only time he was ever involved in a violent episode, he said, was a barroom brawl some 20 years ago.

Supporters of the law insist they are not trying to stop marriages between American men and foreign women but say the women should be informed about what they are getting into.

Seeking a woman on some matchmaking sites is not unlike shopping at Amazon.com. The sites often allow men to search for women by age, weight, height, religion and command of English, among other characteristics. And they frequently market the women as untouched by modern American culture.

Russianladies.com states, "Russian ladies are traditional, unpretentious, down-to-earth, and their views of relationships have not been ruined by unreasonable expectations." BarranquillasBest.com offers tips on how to prevent foreign brides from becoming "Americanized."

Randall Miller, a lawyer in Washington who has represented abused women, said such depictions were an invitation to violence.

"The guy doesn't have to be a predator," Mr. Miller said. "He wants to be the king of the house and buys into the promotional claim that he can get a more traditional woman in Russia — she will cook dinner and have sex and otherwise shut up. And he is taken aback when the woman is outspoken and has opinions and wants to get a job."

Two matchmaking companies have sought to block the law in court.

Mr. Weaver, for all his exasperation over the wait, acknowledges that providing the extra information required by the law may be warranted. So does Ms. Meza. But they do not see why they should have to suffer in the meantime.

"If men are investigated it will be good for all women," Ms. Meza said. "But when you are in love and want to go there, you get desperate."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Losing Faith In The President (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0082170

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

White House officials realized they had a problem, former staffer David Kuo writes in his new book, "Tempting Faith," when they saw how a panel rated the first applications for grants under the "faith-based initiative," President Bush's vaunted effort to help religious charities.

On a scale of 1 to 100, respected national organizations such as Big Brothers Big Sisters of America scored in the mid-70s to mid-80s, "while something called Jesus and Friends Ministry from California, a group with little more than a post office box," scored 89 and Pat Robertson's overseas aid organization, Operation Blessing, scored 95, according to Kuo.

"It was obvious that the ratings were a farce," he writes, adding that he and other White House aides feared that if the list became public, "it would show once and for all that the initiative was purely about paying off political friends for their support."

Portions of Kuo's explosive book, which formally went on sale yesterday, were leaked last week by MSNBC. They brought heated denials from White House press secretary Tony Snow and other current and former Bush administration officials.

The book is full of insider anecdotes and details, many of which were not reported by MSNBC, and some of which can be read as defending rather than attacking the Bush White House.

In the case of the grant applications, for example, Kuo says that the ratings obviously favored conservative Christian groups but that the White House "really did have nothing to do with" it. The problem, he asserts, is that the "peer review" panel chosen by the Department of Health and Human Services came from the "faith-based policy world."

"There are, at most, 100 people in think tanks, foundations, major nonprofits and the like who really work on these issues and who support the president. Virtually all of them are very compassionate and dedicated evangelical Christians who tend to be politically conservative," Kuo writes. "They were supposed to review the application in a religiously neutral fashion. . . . But their biases were transparent."

Kuo tells a story about meeting a member of the review panel at a party. He says she giggled as she recalled, "when I saw one of those non-Christian groups in the set I was reviewing, I just stopped looking at them and gave them a zero." Kuo says he laughed but, at the same time, was aghast.

"Some in the press would later 'expose' that we in the White House had doled out grants to friends. They were technically wrong," he writes. "We didn't do it. We didn't have to. The White House influence was so great that its will was carried out by other appointees in other departments without thinking."

In addition to being a memoir of his three years in the White House, where Kuo was deputy director of the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives until December 2003, the book is a saga of falling in, and out of, love with conservative Christian politics.

Kuo, 38, recounts that in college, he was a liberal who interned for Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). But he got a girlfriend pregnant, and they went together to an abortion clinic. "We regretted it. We were relieved. I knew what we'd done. I had no idea what we'd done," he writes.

Haunted, Kuo became an antiabortion activist. When he moved to Washington to work for the National Right to Life Committee and, later, for the CIA, he began attending First Baptist Church in Alexandria. It was there, he said in an interview yesterday, "that I learned that being a good Christian means being a conservative Republican."

Before the age of 27, Kuo took William J. Bennett as a mentor, wrote speeches for Ralph Reed and Robertson, and was domestic policy adviser to then-Sen. John D. Ashcroft (R-Mo.). In 1998, he joined George W. Bush's campaign for president.

Kuo said he was "dazzled" by Bush's talk of compassion. But in his telling, the administration's actions never matched its rhetoric. During the scramble to win tax cuts, for example, the promise of $8 billion per year for charities was scrapped.

To try to climb up the White House's list of priorities, Kuo said, he and others working in the faith-based office offered to politicize their efforts. The White House political affairs office gave them a map of battleground states in 2002, and they used it to plan conferences to win support for GOP candidates. "Smart politics, bad morals," he said in retrospect.

In 2003, Kuo was diagnosed with a malignant brain tumor. It is still growing slowly, he said, giving him perhaps five or 10 years to live.

"I feel a pressing spiritual need to say what I think is important," he said. "And I really think that what is important is to be able to warn Christians about politics, that they should not throw so much at politics, because they're being used, and it will not answer the problems, and it corrupts the name of the God we're trying to serve."

A Faith-Based Battle For Voters (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082171

The very fact that it took David Kuo's book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction," to put President Bush's faith-based initiative back into the news proves that the author's thesis is right.

His argument -- Kuo went on the record with it long before this book appeared -- is that the White House never put much money or muscle behind Bush's "compassionate conservatism." It used the faith-based agenda for political purposes and always made tax cuts for the wealthy a much higher priority than any assistance to those "armies of compassion" that Bush evoked so eloquently.

As a result, the faith-based initiative has largely been off the public radar for years. And after Sept. 11, 2001, the president made the war on terrorism his central cause, both for substantive reasons and because (until now, at least) it proved to be a great vehicle for winning crossover votes. Compassionate conservatism gave way to martial conservatism.

The headlines that have come Kuo's way have focused on the author's claims that White House staffers ridiculed some of their evangelical supporters as "nuts" and "goofy" and that public events surrounding Bush's faith-based initiative were geared toward Republican electoral fortunes. As a former deputy director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, Kuo has a fair claim to knowing what he's talking about.

ExposÃ©s of hypocrisy are the mother's milk of Washington journalism. Yet the most useful thing that could flow from Kuo's revelations would not be a splashy exchange of charges and countercharges but rather a quiet reappraisal by rank-and-file evangelicals of their approach to politics.

I hope Kuo's book promotes serious discussions in religious study groups around the country about whether the evangelicals' alliance with political conservatism has actually made the world, well, more godly from their own point of view. What are evangelicals actually getting out of this partnership? Are they mostly being used by a coalition that, when the deals are cut, cares far more about protecting the interests of its wealthy and corporate supporters than its churchgoing foot soldiers?

Kuo is being cut up by some administration loyalists. That's not surprising, but it's painful for me. I met Kuo in the 1990s through a conservative friend and was impressed by the power of his religious faith and his passion for developing a conservative approach to helping the poor that would be as serious as liberal efforts but, in his view, more effective.

The faith-based initiative was one of the few Bush policies I defended against liberal attacks during the administration's early months -- before I concluded that it was not really an administration priority. Kuo and I are both friends of John DiIulio, who briefly headed the faith-based office and brought Kuo in. DiIulio and I collaborated on research into religiously inspired social service work in the 1990s.

All of which is to say that I once hoped -- and, for the future, still hope -- that left and right might meet in some compassionate center to offer support for expanded government help to the needy while also fostering the indispensable work of religious and community groups.

Kuo has always thought that nongovernmental groups could carry a larger share of the load in fighting poverty than I do. Kuo, you see, really is a conservative, although he does acknowledge that not all past efforts by government to help the poor are failures.

Despite our disagreements, I have always shared Kuo's view that liberals who care about the poor should be less squeamish about building stronger alliances between government and religiously based social action work. Government can do things the religious and community groups can't, but the religious and community groups can do things government can't.

Kuo's book comes on the eve of an election in which the odds suggest that voters will administer a strong rebuke to Republicans and the administration. It will thus be read as another argument for why such a reproach is merited.

But the power of his case should be felt after the election. Kuo suggested on "60 Minutes" that evangelical Christians take "a fast from politics." Personally, I don't favor "fasts" from political participation, even if the one Kuo proposes might help the sort of candidates I support. Instead, I hope Kuo's reflections will encourage a less rigidly partisan approach to the role of religious faith in our public life.

When Kuo says there's something wrong with "taking Jesus and reducing him to some precinct captain, to some get-out-the-vote guy," he sounds a trumpet that makes you want to follow him into the battle.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

He's Got Folks Waving Flags -- Red Ones

David Kuo , the former White House staffer who claims the Bush administration cynically manipulated evangelical Christians, has plenty of GOP loyalists furious with him right now. They can line up behind organizers of the October 2001 "United We Stand" concert, who say Kuo stiffed them to the tune of $25,000.

DOJ_NMG_0082172

Kuo was the administration's point man for the star-studded concert at RFK Stadium (featuring Michael Jackson , Aerosmith, James Brown, Janet Jackson, Mariah Carey, P. Diddy, Rod Stewart, Destiny's Child), which was thrown together in the weeks following the 9/11 attacks to benefit the American Red Cross and other relief funds.

Since the principal promoter, Clear Channel Entertainment, was based in Philly, it asked D.C. Republican fundraiser Rob Jennings to help with corporate fundraising. Jennings told us Kuo seized on an idea to hand out 50,000 American flags to the audience and repeatedly assured organizers he could find an underwriter for the $25K cost -- and so the flags were ordered and paid for by the promoter. "It was such a hurried effort that everyone was just trying to do what they could," said Jennings.

The concert came and went -- with all those little flags waving for the cameras -- but the money never arrived, despite Kuo's continued promises. Kuo eventually stopped returning calls, and organizers were quietly asked by the White House to back off, said Jennings. He added that he didn't see Kuo again until he popped up on "60 Minutes" Sunday promoting his new book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction."

"If I did something wrong, I'm sorry," said Kuo yesterday. "That's all I'm going to say, just to save time and apologize to people. I don't want to have hurt anybody."

Kuo said that he doesn't remember much about the concert discussions, but that he regrets if he didn't produce the promised money. He also notes that plenty of Republicans are determined to portray him in the worst possible light right now: "Of course the long knives are out for me. I've had lots of calls from friends about people who are going to 'take me down' or destroy me. I'm not going to back down. I'll confess to whatever it is, so I can keep on talking about what I want to talk about."

Jennings told us he would like Kuo to take the first $25,000 he earns from the book and write a check to the Red Cross. "That would be the right thing to do."

Kuo called us back to ask us for Jennings's phone number so he can apologize.HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

Â· Former representative Connie Morella and husband Tony at the KenCen's Family Theater on Saturday night, back in town from her diplomatic posting in Paris to see her actor son, Paul , in the title role of " Teddy Roosevelt and the Treasure of Ursa Major."

Â· Former Wizards center Gheorghe Muresan holding court at the annual Meridian Ball Friday night, a dozen black-tie-clad fans craning their necks to chat with the 7-foot-7 star.THIS JUST IN . . .

Â· Vince Vaughn , who never officially acknowledged dating Jennifer Aniston during their widely reported relationship of one year, is now threatening to sue tabloids that claimed he cheated on her with a mystery blonde. A statement from his lawyers, reported by People, added that the stars "had not ended their relationship either at the material time or since."

Internal Specter Review Found No Wrongdoing (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

An internal investigation of a senior aide to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and spousal connections to Congressional earmarks found that no illegal or unethical activity occurred, according to a copy of the report reviewed by Roll Call.

However, the report found that Senate ethics rules do not adequately address the large number of spouses, children and other immediate family members who also work as lobbyists, prompting Specter to institute a series of changes to his internal rules of conduct.

The investigation was conducted following news reports that questioned the role that Specter aide Vicki Siegel may have played in securing earmarks sought by clients of a lobbying firm founded by her husband.

The report, completed last spring, looked at six earmarks given to clients of American Defense International, a lobbying firm founded by Siegel's husband, Michael Herson.

In all six cases, internal office records showed that for the earmarks Specter helped secure, aides to Specter were lobbied either by company officials directly or by other lobbyists not associated with Herson. The report also concluded that Herson worked on behalf of these clients on unrelated matters and limited his lobbying in the Senate to the delegations of other states.

Nevertheless, the report acknowledged that a lack of controls on the access of Herson and other lobbyists with familial ties to Specter aides led to the appearance of a conflict of interest, and it recommended a series of firewalls to limit access to the office. These included a ban on family members of aides lobbying Specter or his staff; barring aides from dealings with firms that employ their family members; and full disclosure of any such relationships throughout the earmark consideration process.

Specter put those changes in place this spring, an aide said, noting that staff members were also required to attend a briefing by a Senate Ethics Committee aide.

FBI agents in April reviewed financial disclosure forms for Specter on the same day that USA Today published an article about lobbyists, relatives and earmarks.

DOJ_NMG_0082173

However, Specter's decision to order an internal investigate his own staff and change his rules is contrasts with the more defensive posture taken by some other lawmakers who have come under scrutiny for their earmarking efforts.

Hastings Leads Way In Page Investigation (AP-Y)

By Matthew Daly

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

He would rather talk about the latest apple crop, but these days Rep. Doc Hastings is spending more time scrutinizing salacious allegations against a former colleague.

Hastings, a 65-year-old Republican from Washington state, is chairman of the House ethics committee, which is investigating sexually explicit electronic messages sent by ex-Rep. Mark Foley to teenage male pages.

A former small-town paper supplier who represents a rural district best known for its apples and pears, the taciturn Hastings has long sought to blend into the scenery on Capitol Hill. Before taking over the committee last year, he had never held a Washington news conference.

That changed when the committee got the politically uncomfortable job of investigating former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas. The panel had hardly begun meeting before DeLay resigned from Congress.

Now Hastings finds himself in the spotlight again as he leads the Foley inquiry. Foley, R-Fla., resigned last month after he was confronted with instant messages sent to former male pages.

While clearly uneasy about his renewed visibility, Hastings pledges that the Foley investigation will go wherever the evidence leads.

"I take that responsibility that I have as the chairman of the ethics committee very seriously," he told The Associated Press. "Life gives you all sorts of responsibilities, and sometimes you just have to deal with them. I feel very confident in the direction we are moving."

While still in its early stages, the inquiry already has had some missteps.

After an Oct. 5 news conference announcing the investigation, critics accused Hastings of being too close to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., a key focus of the Foley investigation. Some Democrats and others contend Hastert and other House leaders did not do enough to stop Foley after they became aware of some of the electronic messages he had sent.

Asked whether he personally supports Hastert, who named Hastings to lead the ethics committee, Hastings said, "I think the speaker has done an excellent job."

Hastings later clarified that his remarks were "not related to the matter at hand here."

"They should have brought in an outside counsel," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a group that monitors congressional ethics. The ethics panel rejected that idea in favor of a four-member subcommittee of two Republicans and two Democrats from the full committee.

The lack of an outside counsel "gravely undermines the public credibility of the House investigation and calls into serious question whether we will ever get to the bottom of what happened here," Wertheimer said.

Hastings and Rep. Judy Biggert, R-Ill., also were criticized for old political contributions from Hastert's political action committee. The Keep Our Majority committee gave $2,500 to Hastings in 2000, and $6,000 to Biggert in 2002.

In an interview with the AP, Hastings declined to say whether he expects to have the investigation completed by the Nov. 7 election, as some Democrats and outside groups have advocated.

"We are moving to have this done in weeks," he said. "Obviously there are logistics we have to deal with. We are moving as quickly as we can."

But some critics say Hastings has already shown his hand.

"The doctor was out when the patient was very sick," said James Thurber, a political scientist at American University who has studied Congress. Since Hastings took over the ethics panel in early 2005, the committee has met just a few times.

It was only after West Virginia Rep. Alan Mollohan — the former top Democrat on the ethics committee — stepped down under his own ethics cloud that the partisan squabbles ended. Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif., replaced Mollohan in April and established a good working relationship with Hastings.

Berman, who has pledged that he "wanted no part of an incumbent protection agency," said he has been impressed by Hastings.

While the two men disagree politically, "on this committee and for purposes of this investigation, we are going to put those partisan considerations totally aside — as I have seen and witnessed from the chairman during the past five-and-a-half months," Berman said.

DOJ_NMG_0082174

In a burst of activity last May, the ethics panel announced a flurry of investigations, focusing on Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, with links to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and on Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., who was at the center of a separate bribery probe. Ney pleaded guilty on Friday in the Abramoff scandal and he faces up to 10 years in prison.

But Thurber said those probes were too little too late.

"I think it's hurt his reputation," he said of Hastings' service on the ethics panel, "and I think he likely will move to get off the ethics committee if the Republicans lose" the majority in November.

Page Board Said Discussed Other Charges (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

Allegations of improper conduct toward House pages, which do not involve ex-Rep. Mark Foley, were discussed Monday by the board overseeing the program, a Democratic lawmaker said.

Rep. Dale Kildee, D-Mich., the only Democrat on the House Page Board, would not elaborate on whether the discussion involved lawmakers. He said, however, that none of the allegations discussed have been proven.

Kildee commented after he testified before the House ethics committee on the Foley matter. He said the House Page Board held the discussions in a conference call.

"It was about other allegations and I'd like to leave it at that," he said. "Let me just say, not about Mr. Foley. It's only been allegations."

The page board consists of three House members and two House officers, the clerk and sergeant at arms.

Kildee has said previously, and repeated again after his testimony, that he was not informed about Foley's e-mails and instant messages to former male pages until the scandal became public in late September.

Kildee has been on the House Page Board for 21 years.

The GOP: Slugged On The Nose (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

"On the nose" is a Hollywood expression. It refers to an idea or a scene or even a piece of dialogue that is too obvious or too good to be true. Hollywood would have said the whole Mark Foley sex scandal is on the nose. Let's just start with the fact that this confessed gay stalker of teenage congressional pages was co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus. All over Hollywood, fingers would go to the tip of the nose: Can't we make it Armed Services?

No, we cannot. To change anything at all about the Foley matter would be to trifle with its essential vacuity, its reliance on bigotry and ignorance, its resplendent Beaver Cleaver qualities (congressional pages, for crying out loud!) and, not least, the fact that so far this is the ultimate Washington sex scandal: There is no sex.

Maybe there will be sex. Maybe some underage page or former page will be discovered to have had sex with Foley, but so far this has not happened. This lack of a physical victim -- with the arguable exception of Foley and the entire Republican Party, that is -- may explain why certain GOP congressional bulls, from committee chairmen to the speaker of the House himself, did not bolt from the joint, pulling every alarm on the way out. Foley was creepy and appallingly inappropriate, but so far that seems to be it.

The lack of a victim hardly gets noticed as politicians coil their ropes, measuring Foley or some other poor chap for a proper lynching. Dennis Hastert should have known. George Bush should have known. Karl Rove should have known. (Why not? He knows everything else.) How come this did not come up on one of those unconstitutional wiretaps? Did anyone in the House leadership think of waterboarding Foley? The man was gay after all. What has happened to the Republican Party we used to loathe?

That, too, is on the nose. That this happened to the GOP is too, too much. It is no longer the party of Lincoln but the party of gay-bashing. Its base, its vaunted base, is among those who embrace ignorance of homosexuality and, while they are at it, ignorance of sexual matters in general. It is deeply blue Massachusetts, after all, that has gay marriage -- Did you notice that the late Gerry Studds's "husband" was quoted in some of his obits? -- and the state was once represented by not one but two gay members of Congress (the other being Barney Frank).

Put the finger back on the nose. It was the GOP that stood for family values. It was the GOP that cozied up to churches and preachers who likened homosexuals to the vilest people of all time and called on them to cease their wicked ways, go from homosexual to heterosexual, which everyone knows they can do but will not because, apparently, it is easier to be gay and reviled than it is to be straight and comfy about it.

DOJ_NMG_0082175

With regard to this sort of haranguing demagoguery, the leaders of the GOP have not just looked away, they have encouraged it. They have set themselves up as the little Dutch boys of American politics, their fingers in the dike, holding back such unspeakable X-rated evil that it is a miracle any child in this great country can grow up to be heterosexual or devout or an accountant.

So it is not possible now to call the whole thing off, to say it was overblown and -- look, folks -- nothing happened with Foley and those kids. It is not possible even to suggest that all those kids are not 8-year-olds but American teenagers, some of them undoubtedly sexually active, probably none of them sexually naive. In all likelihood, nothing Foley messaged them was entirely new to them, and it's even possible to argue that, no matter what was said, psychological trauma is not likely to follow.

The abuse of trust is no laughing matter, and the corruption of children is in a class by itself. But a sex scandal-turned-political panic involving just one person lacks a certain something. That it has attained such critical mass, that it threatens the speaker of the House and the GOP majority, says little about the repellent Foley but a lot about how the GOP has been hoisted by its own petard. It's on the nose all right, but sometimes so is life itself.

Reid To Amend Ethics Reports To Fully Account For Land Deal (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) announced yesterday that he will amend four years of ethics reports to Congress to more fully explain a real estate transaction that allowed him to collect $1.1 million in 2004.

At the same time, he said he will personally reimburse his political campaign $3,300 that his campaign fund contributed for the Christmas bonuses of support staff at the Ritz-Carlton in Washington, where he lives.

The actions, prompted by reports by the Associated Press, are proving to be a headache for Democrats as they press their case that Republicans have succumbed to a "culture of corruption." The land deal, in particular, has brought comparisons to a real estate transaction last year that netted House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) $2 million. In both cases, congressional leaders reaped significant windfalls from land that was purchased in rapidly growing regions and then sold as part of ventures that appear to have obscured the lawmakers' involvement.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley dismissed any comparison, saying Reid noted ownership of the land on his financial disclosure forms. But in his amended ethics statements, he will also note that he transferred ownership to a limited liability corporation in 2001. Subsequent disclosure statements will list ownership under the company's name, Patrick Lane LLC.

"The fact is that this case is simple," Manley said. "He bought the land. He sold the land, and he fully reported that he owned it. Now he's going to go above and beyond all the requirements to ensure the facts are clear for all to see."

Manley said the profit on the deal was about $700,000, after Reid's initial $400,000 investment is subtracted from the amount of the sale.

The Associated Press reported last week that Reid gained the 2004 windfall even though he had not owned the property for the previous three years. Reid had not divulged the 2001 transfer of the land to Patrick Lane LLC, which he co-owned with Jay Brown, a friend and former casino owner.

On the Ritz-Carlton Christmas fund, Reid aides denied any wrongdoing. They said the staff of the hotel, where Reid lives in a condominium, frequently has the burden of additional work because of Reid's political activities. Doormen, valets and other staff members are called on to deal with a stream of visitors and political events.

On advice of counsel, Reid said, he gave the Ritz-Carlton Christmas fund $600 in 2002, $1,200 in 2004 and $1,500 in 2005 from his reelection campaign. Federal election law bars candidates from using political donations for personal use. Reid said he did no such thing but will reimburse his campaign "to prevent this issue from being used in the current campaign season to deflect attention from Republican failures."

Reid Rewrite (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Kate Ackley

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

Under fire from Republicans for alleged ethical lapses, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) announced Monday that he would amend his financial disclosure reports to more fully reflect a 2001 Las Vegas land deal.

While admitting no wrongdoing, the top Senate Democrat said he has directed his staff to revise his ethics reports to make clear that he didn't sell the property in question in 2001, but merely transferred the title to the land to a limited liability corporation.

Reid also said he would address "two minor matters" left off his original disclosure forms relating to two smaller land transactions.

DOJ_NMG_0082176

Reid called the land transaction a "routine legal move" that allowed him to keep ownership of the land through the LLC until 2004, when he sold it for a profit of $700,000.

"Republicans may believe in cover-ups," Reid said. "I believe in ensuring all the facts come to light."

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said by making the changes to his disclosure forms, "the Senator is aggressively getting ahead of the story."

Crawford Charged. The U.S. attorney's office filed charges Monday against former Food and Drug Administration Commissioner Lester Crawford. He was charged with conflict of interest and making a false statement after an investigation into statements he made about his financial holdings during confirmation hearings before the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee.

Court papers allege that Crawford said he no longer owned stock in the companies Sysco and Kimberly-Clark, even though he "and/or his wife held shares in both" and that he held stock in PepsiCo while looking at recommendations for food labels that would affect the company.

Crawford's attorney was quoted in news reports saying he planned to plead guilty as early as today to charges related to the case.

Senator Reid Used Donations For Condo Tips (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 (AP) — The Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, has been using campaign donations instead of his personal money to pay Christmas bonuses for the support staff at the Ritz-Carlton hotel here, where he lives in a condominium.

Federal election law bars candidates from converting political donations for personal use.

Questioned about the campaign expenditures, Mr. Reid's office said Monday that his lawyers had approved them but that he nonetheless was personally reimbursing his campaign for the $3,300 he had directed to the staff holiday fund at his residence.

The bonuses — $600 in 2002, $1,200 in 2004 and $1,500 in 2005 — went from Mr. Reid's re-election campaign to an entity listed as the REC Employee Holiday Fund. His campaign listed the expenses as campaign "salary" for two years, which Mr. Reid said was a clerical error, and as a "contribution" one year.

Mr. Reid also announced he was amending his ethics reports to Congress to account more fully for a Las Vegas land deal, highlighted in an Associated Press article last week, that allowed him to collect $1.1 million in 2004 for property he had not personally owned in three years.

In that matter, the senator had not disclosed to Congress that he first sold land to a friend's limited liability company back in 2001 and took an ownership stake in the company. He collected the seven-figure payout when the company sold the land again in 2004 to others.

Mr. Reid portrayed the 2004 sale as a personal sale of land, not mentioning the company's ownership or its role in the sale.

Reid To Reimburse Campaign For Donations (AP-Y)

By John Solomon

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid has been using campaign donations instead of his personal money to pay Christmas bonuses for the support staff at the Ritz-Carlton where he lives in an upscale condominium. Federal election law bars candidates from converting political donations for personal use.

Questioned about the campaign expenditures by The Associated Press, Reid's office said Monday his lawyers had approved them but he nonetheless was personally reimbursing his campaign for the $3,300 he had directed to the staff holiday fund at his residence.

Reid also announced he was amending his ethics reports to Congress to more fully account for a Las Vegas land deal, highlighted in an AP story last week, that allowed him to collect $1.1 million in 2004 for property he hadn't personally owned in three years.

In that matter, the senator hadn't disclosed to Congress that he first sold land to a friend's limited liability company back in 2001 and took an ownership stake in the company. He collected the seven-figure payout when the company sold the land again in 2004 to others.

Reid portrayed the 2004 sale as a personal sale of land, not mentioning the company's ownership or its role in the sale.

DOJ_NMG_0082177

Reid said his amended ethics reports would list the 2001 sale and the company, called Patrick Lane LLC. He said the amended reports also would divulge two other smaller land deals he had failed to report to Congress.

"I directed my staff to file amended financial disclosure forms noting that in 2001, I transferred title to the land to a Limited Liability Corporation," Reid said in a statement issued by his office.

He said he believed the 2001 sale did not alter his ownership of the land but that he agreed to file the amended reports because "I believe in ensuring all facts come to light."

Reid labeled the AP story as the "latest attempt" by Republicans to affect the election. AP reported last week that it learned of the land deal from a former Reid adviser who had concerns about the way the deal was reported to Congress.

On the Ritz-Carlton holiday donations, Reid gave $600 in 2002, then $1,200 in 2004 and $1,500 in 2005 from his re-election campaign to an entity listed as the REC Employee Holiday Fund. His campaign listed the expenses as campaign "salary" for two of the years and as a "contribution" one year.

Reid's office said the listing as salary was a "clerical error" and that the use of campaign money for the residential fund was approved by his lawyers. "I am reimbursing the campaign from my own pocket to prevent this issue from being used in the current campaign season to deflect attention from Republican failures," he said.

Residents and workers at the Ritz said the fund's full name is the Residents Executive Committee Holiday Fund and that it collects money each year from the condominium residents to help provide Christmas gifts, bonuses and a party for the support staff.

Federal election law permits campaigns to provide "gifts of nominal value" but prohibits candidates from using political donations for personal expenses, such as mortgage, rent or utilities for "any part of any personal residence."

The law specifically defines prohibited personal use expenses as any "obligation or expense of any person that would exist irrespective of the candidate's campaign or duties as a federal officeholder."

Land deeds show Reid and his wife, Landra, purchased a condominium for their Washington residence at the hotel for $750,000 in March 2001. The holiday fund has existed for years at the condo, workers said.

Reid said Monday he believed the expenses were permissible but he nonetheless was reimbursing the campaign.

"These donations were made to thank the men and women who work in the building for the extra work they do as a result of my political activities, and for helping the security officers assigned to me because of my Senate position," Reid said.

Larry Noble, the Federal Election Commission's former chief enforcement lawyer, said Reid's explanation is aimed at a "gray area" in the law by suggesting the donations were tied to his official Senate and political work.

"What makes this harder for the senator is that this is his personal residence and this looks like an event that everybody else at the residence is taking out of their personal money as they're living there," Noble said.

Back in 2000, Congress rebuked powerful House Transportation Committee Chairman Bud Shuster, R-Pa., for among other things creating the appearance, through poor record-keeping, that campaign committee expenditures were for personal rather than bona fide campaign uses.

On the land dealings, Reid announced Monday he had failed to disclose two other transactions on his prior ethics reports and would account for those on his amended reports along with the 2001 sale.

The first, he said, involved the sale in 2004 of about one-third acre of land in 2004 he owned in his hometown of Searchlight, Nev. And he said he had not reported his ownership since 1985 of a quarter acre of land his brother gave him in 1985.

Reid said the failure to disclose those transactions previously was due to "clerical errors" and they amounted to "two minor matters that were inadvertently left off my original disclosure forms."

He had asked the Senate Ethics Committee last Wednesday for an opinion on the 2001 land sale but decided to amend his forms prior to the committee acting.

Reid's announcement came after numerous newspapers nationwide published editorials criticizing both his initial failure to disclose the full details of his Las Vegas land deal and his response to AP's story.

The $1.1 million land deal was engineered by Jay Brown, a longtime friend and former casino lawyer whose name surfaced in a major political bribery trial this summer and in other prior organized crime investigations. Brown has never been charged with wrongdoing, except for a 1981 federal securities complaint that was settled out of court.

Ethics experts told AP that Reid's inaccurate accounting of the deal to Congress appeared to violate Senate ethics rules and raised other issues concerning taxes and potential gifts.

Reid Used Campaign Funds To Pay Bonuses To Staff (WT/AP)

By John Solomon

DOJ_NMG_0082178

The Washington Times-AP, October 17, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid has been using campaign donations instead of his personal money to pay Christmas bonuses for the support staff at the Ritz-Carlton, where he lives in an upscale condominium.

Federal election law bars candidates from converting political donations for personal use.

Questioned about the expenditures by the Associated Press, Mr. Reid's office said yesterday that he was personally reimbursing his campaign for $3,300 in donations he had directed to the staff holiday fund at his residence.

Mr. Reid also announced he was amending his ethics reports to Congress to more fully account for a Las Vegas land deal, highlighted in an AP story last week, that allowed him to collect $1.1 million in 2004 for property he hadn't personally owned in three years.

In that matter, the senator hadn't disclosed to Congress that he first sold land to a friend's limited liability company back in 2001 and took an ownership stake in the company. He collected the seven-figure payout when the company sold the land again in 2004 to others.

Mr. Reid portrayed the 2004 sale as a personal sale of land, making no mention of the company's ownership or its role in the sale.

Ethics experts told the AP that Mr. Reid's inaccurate accounting of the deal to Congress appeared to violate Senate ethics rules and raised other issues concerning taxes and potential gifts.

Mr. Reid said his amended ethics reports would list the 2001 sale and the company, called Patrick Lane LLC. He said the amended reports would also divulge two other smaller land deals he had failed to report to Congress.

"I directed my staff to file amended financial disclosure forms noting that in 2001 I transferred title to the land to a limited liability corporation," Mr. Reid said.

He said he believed the 2001 sale did not alter his ownership of the land but that he agreed to file the amended reports because "I believe in ensuring all facts come to light."

Mr. Reid labeled the AP story as the "latest attempt" by Republicans to affect the election. The AP reported last week that it learned of the land deal from a former Reid adviser who had concerns about the way the deal was reported to Congress.

On the Ritz-Carlton holiday donations, Mr. Reid gave $600 in 2002, $1,200 in 2004 and $1,500 in 2005 from his re-election campaign to an entity listed as the REC Employee Holiday Fund. His campaign listed the expenses as campaign "salary" for two of the years and as a "contribution" one year.

Mr. Reid's office said the listing as salary was a "clerical error."

Residents and workers at the Ritz said the fund's full name is the Residents Executive Committee Holiday Fund and that it collects money each year from the condominium residents to help provide Christmas gifts, bonuses and a party for the support staff.

Federal election law permits campaigns to provide "gifts of nominal value" but prohibits candidates from using political donations for personal expenses, such as mortgage, rent or utilities for "any part of any personal residence."

The law specifically defines prohibited personal use expenses as any "obligation or expense of any person that would exist irrespective of the candidate's campaign or duties as a federal officeholder."

Land deeds show Mr. Reid and his wife, Landra, purchased a condominium for their Washington residence at the hotel for $750,000 in March 2001. The holiday fund has existed for years at the condo, workers said.

Mr. Reid said yesterday he thought the expenses were permissible but he nonetheless was reimbursing the campaign.

"These donations were made to thank the men and women who work in the building for the extra work they do as a result of my political activities, and for helping the security officers assigned to me because of my Senate position," Mr. Reid said.

Larry Noble, the Federal Election Commission's former chief enforcement lawyer, said Mr. Reid's explanation is aimed at a "gray area" in the law by suggesting the donations were tied to his official Senate and political work.

"What makes this harder for the senator is that this is his personal residence and this looks like an event that everybody else at the residence is taking out of their personal money as they're living there," Mr. Noble said.

On the land dealings, Mr. Reid announced yesterday he had failed to disclose two other transactions on his prior ethics reports and would account for those on his amended reports along with the 2001 sale.

The first, he said, involved the sale in 2004 of about one-third acre of land he owned in his hometown of Searchlight, Nev. And, he said he had not reported his ownership since 1985 of a quarter acre of land his brother gave him in 1985.

Mr. Reid said the failure to disclose those transactions previously was due to "clerical errors" and they amounted to "two minor matters that were inadvertently left off my original disclosure forms."

He had asked the Senate Ethics Committee on Wednesday for an opinion on the 2001 land sale but decided to amend his forms prior to the committee acting.

Mr. Reid's announcement came after numerous newspapers nationwide published editorials criticizing both his initial failure to disclose the full details of his Las Vegas land deal and his response to AP's story.

The $1.1 million land deal was engineered by Jay Brown, a longtime friend and former casino lawyer whose name surfaced in a major political bribery trial this summer and in other prior organized crime investigations. Mr. Brown has never been charged with wrongdoing, except for a 1981 federal securities complaint that was settled out of court.

Relatives Have 'inside Track' In Lobbying For Tax Dollars (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Peter Eisler

USA Today, October 17, 2006

Members of Congress and their staffs are barred from using their positions for personal profit. But their spouses and other relatives can — and often do — cash in when lawmakers spend taxpayer dollars.

Lobbying groups employed 30 family members last year to influence spending bills that their relatives with ties to the House and Senate appropriations committees oversaw or helped write, a USA TODAY investigation found. Combined, they generated millions of dollars in fees for themselves or their firms.

The connections are so pervasive that, in 2005 alone, appropriations bills contained about $750 million for projects championed by lobbyists whose relatives were involved in writing the spending bills.

"It smells bad; it is bad," Mickey Edwards, a Princeton University lecturer, said when told of the newspaper's findings. "If it is not already completely outlawed, it should be." Edwards served on the House Appropriations Committee during his 16 years as a Republican congressman from Oklahoma.

USA TODAY examined the family ties between lobbyists and the 94 members of the House and Senate appropriations committees, as well as 250 top staffers who serve those members. Those committees control the federal government's purse strings, allocating hundreds of billions of taxpayer dollars each year.

The family connections between lobbying and lawmaking are prompting complaints that Congress is not doing enough to police itself. No rules or laws prevent lawmakers or their staffs from being lobbied by relatives, and proposals to address the practice have stalled on Capitol Hill.

Neither lawmakers nor lobbyists must report if they are related to each other, so USA TODAY reviewed thousands of pages of financial disclosures and lobbyist registrations, property records, marriage announcements and other public documents to identify which lawmakers and staffers had relatives in the lobbying business.

The newspaper found 53 cases in which relatives of lawmakers or their top aides worked at lobbying firms last year. In 30 instances, those relatives, or firms in which they are principals, sought money in the appropriations bills their family members or their family members' bosses helped write. Of those 30 relatives, 22 succeeded in getting specific language inserted in the bills that guaranteed money for their clients, USA TODAY found. Among them:

•Lobbyist Juliet Pacquing collected $60,000 last year from Rhode Island manufacturer TPI Composites, lobbying disclosure forms show. Her husband, Kevin Cook, is the top staffer for the House Appropriations subcommittee on energy and water, chaired by Rep. Dave Hobson, R-Ohio. In news releases, Hobson took credit for securing money for TPI to develop an Army vehicle similar to the Humvee but with lighter materials. The total: $4.5 million. Hobson said Pacquing's relationship did not influence him.

•Lobbyist William Clyburn Jr., received $60,000 last year from two consulting firms to seek federal funding for the Augusta, Ga., airport, disclosure forms show. His cousin is Rep. Jim Clyburn, D-S.C. In an interview with USA TODAY in July, lobbyist Clyburn said he secured $2.5 million for the airport after speaking with lawmaker Clyburn about having the money put into an appropriations bill. In September, a spokeswoman for Rep. Clyburn disputed that characterization. A day later, lobbyist Clyburn reversed his earlier statement and said he did not speak with his relative about getting funding.

•Lobbyist Holly Piper's firm took in $220,000 last year from e-Cavern, a company seeking federal funding to build an underground facility to protect financial information in a Kentucky cavern. Piper's husband is Billy Piper, chief of staff to Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., a senior member of the Appropriations Committee and the second-ranking Senate Republican. McConnell added $1.5 million to an appropriations bill for the project. McConnell's spokesman said Holly Piper's relationship had nothing to do with the senator's decision.

•A start-up lobbying firm co-founded by Cindy Young took in $40,000 last year for helping Dynamic Defense Materials win federal funding to develop new body armor for the military. Young's father-in-law, Rep. C.W. "Bill" Young, R-Fla., chairs the House Appropriations defense subcommittee. Rep. Young acknowledged that his daughter-in-law had set up meetings between him and her clients, including the defense contractor. Rep. Young included $1 million in his bill to fund the company's body armor project. He denied there was any special treatment.

Lawmakers who wrote or approved such spending language sometimes received campaign contributions from the clients and the lobbyists that represented them, the newspaper found. For instance, federal records show Rep. Hobson received a total of $8,000 in campaign contributions from 2005 through 2006 from Pacquing and executives at TPI, the company that hired Pacquing to lobby him.

"It pays to be related to a member of the appropriations committee," said James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University in Washington. "It shows a serious conflict of interest between those appropriators who are supposed to be appropriating for the public interest and their relatives, who obviously have special access to these individuals.

"In the balance of the public interest vs. private interest," Thurber said, "it seems the public interest loses again."

The lobbyists, lawmakers and staffers who spoke to USA TODAY insist that no special treatment was sought or given. Many lobbyists say they have no contact with their family members on appropriations business, though they admit lobbying others who work with or for their relative.

Lawmakers say they are not swayed by their family ties. That's the position of Florida Rep. Young, whose daughter-in-law Cindy Young is a partner in a small Pennsylvania lobbying firm that primarily serves defense contractors. Rep. Young said his daughter-in-law handles legal and business issues for the firm, but she has not registered to lobby Congress.

"Cindy has said, on occasion, 'Hey, would you see this client?' and I've done that," Young said. "But they don't get any special treatment." He said all of the projects had to have another congressional sponsor before he would meet with company officials or consider funding them — a rule he said he enforces for all lobbyists seeking money from his panel.

Young said he accepts no campaign contributions from any clients of his daughter-in-law's firm. And he points out that he rejected requests from two of those clients because he wanted to give the military more of an opportunity to review the projects. "Bottom line," he said, is that those companies "don't get any special treatment, no different from the clients of any other lobbyists who bring people in to see me."

Young said his daughter-in-law is within her rights to run a lobbying firm, even if it represents companies seeking federal funding from his panel. He said his office consulted with the House ethics committee to ensure that her status with the firm, and his interactions with her and her clients, all were within the scope of House rules.

"My daughter-in-law has a right to make a living," the congressman said. "I don't know that I can see one lobbyist or one attorney and not see another just because she has a relationship to my son."

Last year, clients of Cindy Young's firm won $2 million in funding in the defense spending bill that her father-in-law oversaw. In one case, $1 million was directed to one of Cindy Young's clients, Dynamic Defense Materials, to develop body armor for the military. The money came in the form of an "earmark," a provision that lawmakers add to spending bills for an item or program that wasn't requested by the agency getting the money, or authorized by previous legislation.

Cindy Young did not respond to requests for an interview.

Juliet Pacquing's husband, Kevin Cook, is the top staffer for the House Appropriations subcommittee for energy and water programs. The chairman of that subcommittee — the lawmaker who relies most heavily on Cook as a staffer — is Rep. Hobson.

During the past two years, one of Pacquing's main clients, TPI Composites, has received more than $500,000 in federal contracting work under programs funded by Hobson's energy and water appropriations bill.

Hobson also sits on the Appropriations defense subcommittee. In a defense appropriations bill, TPI got $4.5 million to help the Army develop a composite vehicle similar to the Humvee. In a news release, Hobson took credit for getting the money, noting that some work on the vehicle would be done at a TPI facility in his district.

Pacquing acknowledged that she has lobbied Hobson for defense earmarks on behalf of TPI. But she said she never seeks money under the energy and water bill that Cook helps the congressman write. She said she was unaware that her client benefited from the bill. "I don't lobby my husband," she said. "There's a conflict there."

Pacquing said her lobbying work relies on contacts she made in her previous job as a staffer on the Appropriations defense panel. Those clients, she said, are almost exclusively defense contractors. "I'm just a small fish," she said. "I don't know why you're talking to me."

Hobson said he was also unaware that TPI has a financial stake in programs funded by his energy and water bill. That legislation controls spending for a variety of programs, including research into wind energy technology. TPI manufactures blades for experimental wind turbines being developed by Sandia National Laboratory.

"I didn't even know that the contracts were there or that (TPI) even dealt with Sandia," Hobson said. "There's no problem there, because (the Sandia contracts) were competitively bid. … (But) we have to make sure that we continue to have this firewall" between Pacquing and Cook.

DOJ_NMG_0082181

As for the earmark for the Army vehicle, Hobson said Pacquing's relationship to Cook "had absolutely nothing to do with it." He said he has been pushing the Pentagon for years to develop lighter, better-armored tactical vehicles, and TPI has been at the forefront of that effort.

TPI declined to comment. Executives with the company donated a total of $6,000 to Hobson's campaign in 2005 and 2006, federal records show. Pacquing gave $2,000 to Hobson in the same span.

"I don't know whether you can say I encouraged" the contributions from TPI, Pacquing said. "It's just common sense to donate. They've been working with Congressman Hobson, and they'd like for him to be re-elected."

Lobbyist William Clyburn Jr. said he sees no benefit to having family on the Appropriations Committee. The lobbyist is the son of Rep. Clyburn's first cousin, and Clyburn said he grew up calling the lawmaker "uncle." Rep. Clyburn is the third-highest-ranking House Democrat and a member of the Appropriations panel handling transportation projects.

Cedric Johnson, chairman of the Augusta (Ga.) Airport Commission, said that the board knew of the lobbyist's family ties to Rep. Clyburn but that he wasn't hired for his family connections. He said the board sought William Clyburn's help because they knew him from his days as a staffer for then-senator Zell Miller, D-Ga.

Regardless, Johnson said the board could not have won the $2.5 million for terminal improvements without the lobbyist. "He helped us quite a bit with showing us the ropes and what we needed to do to get funding," Johnson said.

In an interview in July — before the newspaper contacted Rep. Clyburn's office — lobbyist William Clyburn acknowledged that he discussed funding for the Augusta airport with his congressman cousin. He didn't credit that relationship for his success. Instead, he talked of the contacts he made during more than a decade in Washington as a congressional staffer and member of the Surface Transportation Board.

"There hasn't been anything that, 'Because Jim is your relative, you're going to get this or that,' " William Clyburn said. "It was really dependent on the network I had developed over the years."

Kristie Greco, a spokeswoman for Rep. Clyburn, told USA TODAY in September that the congressman and his cousin had not discussed the Augusta airport funding or any other business. "He doesn't lobby before the congressman," Greco said of William Clyburn. She suggested that the newspaper contact the lobbyist again.

The next day, in a second interview, William Clyburn reversed what he had told the newspaper in July. He said he discussed other matters with his cousin but had not discussed the Augusta airport funding with him. "Going to a relative, that doesn't make it happen for that project," he said. "You have to have both House and Senate, both Democrats and Republicans."

Just months after Holly Piper left her job as an aide for Sen. McConnell to join the lobbying business in 2004, she married his chief of staff.

Piper went to work for Bates Capitol Group, a Louisville lobbying firm with a client list heavy on Kentucky businesses. One company for which Piper sought money, is e-Cavern, lobbying records show. The company has teamed with local universities to turn a 3-million-square-foot cavern near the city into an underground "technology business park." There, companies or government agencies can build secure facilities to store critical infrastructure and financial records.

As a senior member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, McConnell secured $1 million in federal funding for the facility in 2004, Piper's first year as a lobbyist for e-Cavern. In 2005, McConnell secured another $1.5 million for the project. In those two years, e-Cavern's annual lobbying payments to Bates Capitol climbed from $80,000 to $220,000. Last year, two of e-Cavern's top executives contributed $1,000 each to McConnell's campaign account.

McConnell spokesman Don Stewart said Piper's relationship to the senator's top staffer had nothing to do with McConnell's steering federal funds to the project. "The senator's priorities have been (focused) on making the commonwealth's universities world class, making them competitive," Stewart said, "so that (funding) flows right into his objective."

Stewart said McConnell barred any lobbying contacts between Holly Piper and her husband after they were married. And a year later, in spring 2005, he expanded that policy to forbid anyone on his staff from having any contact with lobbyists who have a relative in the senator's office. Holly Piper has since left the lobbying business and declined to comment.

McConnell's no-contact policy for Piper "was just him trying to go above and beyond what was required," Stewart said. All of his funding decisions are made on their own merits and "are completely justified," Stewart said of McConnell. "He's willing to defend any of them."

In the case of e-Cavern, Stewart said, any lobbying of McConnell or his staff would have been done by the company's other lobbyist at Bates Capitol: company president Hunter Bates — the man who served as McConnell's chief of staff before Billy Piper got the job.

Unlike Congress, the judicial and executive branches have strict guidelines on nepotism and contacts with lobbyists and business interests, said Ronald Utt, a budget expert at the conservative Heritage Foundation think tank.

DOJ_NMG_0082182

For example, laws bar executive branch employees from taking action affecting the financial interests of their spouses or minor children. Federal judges are required to remove themselves from cases affecting the financial interests of their spouses or minor children, or when lawyers or parties to the case are related to the judge. "It's particularly troublesome, because (Congress is) in an environment that has very limited, formal ethical standards to begin with," Utt said.

"The ethics of it are terrible," he said of the newspaper's findings. "It's getting to the point where no one bothers to hide what appear to be raging conflicts of interest."

Utt said it's "both impossible and preposterous" to believe that relatives who are lobbyists don't influence their family members.

Congress appears unlikely to act this year to address how lawmakers and their staff should deal with family members in the lobbying business. As the congressional session enters its final weeks, lobbying bills passed in the spring by the House and Senate have stalled. Congressional leaders have yet to set up a committee of House and Senate members to reconcile differences between the two pieces of legislation. Those differences must be resolved before a final bill can be voted on, let alone passed.

The Senate bill would bar all "official contact" with a lawmaker's office by a registered lobbyist who is an "immediate family member" of that lawmaker — a definition that includes spouses, children and certain in-laws. That bill does not address situations in which a lobbyist is related to a staff member.

The House bill is silent on the issue of lobbying relatives.

Currently, the only official pronouncement on the issue of family ties is an opinion by the Senate Ethics Committee. The committee recommended that a lobbyist related to a senator's chief of staff should not be allowed to lobby anyone in that senator's office. The opinion was never adopted as a rule. And it has no bearing in the House.

"There has to be a serious review of congressional rules in terms of the lobbying done by spouses of members and other relatives," said Fred Wertheimer, a longtime advocate of tighter lobbying restrictions who heads the reform group Democracy 21. "In effect, Congress as an institution has said with regard to all the congressional corruption scandals, 'It's none of your business,' " Wertheimer said. "That's just dead wrong. … It's the public's interest that Congress is responsible for protecting."

Little Accountability In Earmarks (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Peter Eisler

USA Today, October 17, 2006

Family ties give lobbyists insight into how legislation is written — and access to those who are in positions to secure millions for specific projects.

"These are the insiders' insiders," said Ellen Miller, executive director of the Sunlight Foundation, a budget watchdog group. "Lobbyists rule the legislative process. But lobbyists who are family members really have the inside track."

One of the most popular ways to ensure a project gets funded is by adding a provision called an "earmark" to an appropriations bill.

An earmark commits the government to spend a specific amount on a specific program. Earmarks that benefit companies usually direct money to a project that the companies are hired to handle, not to the companies themselves.

Members of the appropriations committees can add earmarks. Often, their staff members, who write much of the legislation, are in position to encourage their bosses to do so.

John Scofield, a spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee, says earmarks are an appropriate way for Congress to put its stamp on federal policy. "That's the way (the legislative branch) is supposed to work," he said.

There is little accountability in the earmark process, however. Lawmakers can add the language anonymously. Until recently, no rules required Congress to disclose an earmark's sponsor, and the information is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act or other public-records requirements.

The House changed its rules Sept. 14 to require that spending and tax bills include the name of the lawmaker sponsoring an earmark. However, that rule expires Dec. 31.

In the past decade, the number of earmarks in appropriations bills has more than tripled, to almost 16,000 in 2005, according to the Congressional Research Service. Taxpayer groups and fiscal conservatives in Congress point to earmarks as a major source of waste.

"There's no question that unaccountable earmarking leads to wasteful spending and special favors for campaign contributors or family members who are lobbying for stuff," Miller said.

Occasionally, a company will announce that it has received funding via an earmark. Lawmakers sometimes take credit for them, too, to show that they are fighting for a local project.

In February, USA TODAY reported that Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., added 13 earmarks over four years that set aside almost $50 million for clients of a lobbyist married to a top aide.

Specter said he did not know the beneficiaries were clients of his aide's husband. The FBI is now investigating whether the aide, Vicki Siegel Herson, broke the law by helping her husband Michael Herson. Specter has said he did nothing wrong.

Congress's Charity Cases (NYT)

By Frances R. Hill

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

Coral Gables, Fla.

A REPORT issued last week by the minority staff of the Senate Finance Committee details how the fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff exploited tax-exempt organizations — both sham nonprofits and otherwise legitimate charities — to move money from clients he disdained to congressmen he hoped to influence.

Why were charities Mr. Abramoff's go-to vehicles as he sought to transfer funds covertly through Washington's corridors of power? The primary attraction was their opacity: their ability to raise money in any amount, without limit, from any individual or entity anywhere in the world without disclosing the contributors to anyone.

This makes good sense for honest charities helping people in need. But Mr. Abramoff took advantage of this situation to circumvent campaign finance laws and Congressional ethics rules and provide illicit benefits to powerful politicians.

Though members of Congress are subject to strict rules regarding gifts, travel and entertainment, there have long been exceptions for "value received from charity" — ostensibly to permit officials to help charities raise money for worthy causes.

So the tax-exempt treasuries of willing nonprofits like Americans for Tax Reform, run by the Republican strategist Grover Norquist, became conduits through which funds from lobbyists like Mr. Abramoff and other special interests were transferred to elected officials, their families and their aides in the form of lavish travel, expensive meals, golf outings and tickets to sports and entertainment events.

The rules that govern charitable giving obscured the true source of these gifts, while at the same time affording lobbyists private access to the congressmen they were trying to influence.

In its 2003 decision upholding the campaign finance law, the Supreme Court repeatedly expressed its concern that tax-exempt organizations could be abused in just this way.

And now this grim report from the Senate Finance Committee's Democratic investigators should remind Congress and tax-exempt organizations that reform is overdue.

The guiding principle should be simple and direct: a politician's only relationship with a charity should be as a contributor. Elected officials should not accept travel or meals or golf course fees, even if they claim that participating in charity events will induce others to write checks for a good cause.

In order to put this principle into effect, Congress should begin by eliminating exceptions in ethics rules, campaign finance laws or lobbyist registration laws for benefits channeled to politicians through nonprofit, tax-exempt entities.

Any funds or benefits that a charity gives to a politician or a political committee should be traced back to the original contributor on regularly-filed disclosure reports. Just as important, politicians should be prohibited from raising money from third parties for charities they control, directly or indirectly.

If politicians help other charities raise money, they should accept absolutely nothing in return from those organizations or any organizations related to them. The same rules should apply to politicians' spouses, children and children's spouses, as well as to current and former staff members and their immediate families.

Finally, Congress should establish an electronic database where members list all their contributions to charities, benefits they receive from charities and their leadership positions in such groups.

As I.R.S. commissioner Mark Everson noted back in January, when the government announced Mr. Abramoff's plea agreement, "The mixing of politics, money and charities is, simply stated, a bad cocktail."

Indeed, it's distressing to see that in exchange for a taste of the high life, members of Congress were apparently selling what cannot be for sale in a representative democracy — access to the public policy process and possibly even their votes. Charities serve many indispensable purposes, but financing the livings of the powerful and privileged is not one of them.

President Bush To Visit Greensboro Elementary (News14NC)

By Kira Mathis

News 14 Carolina, October 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082184

GREENSBORO -- One Greensboro elementary school will be welcoming a very exciting visitor this week. President Bush is scheduled to visit Falkener Elementary School on Wednesday, and that means Greensboro has plenty of preparing to do in time for the president's big visit.

"I didn't believe it," said Principal Amy Holcombe, "I thought it was one of my brothers playing a joke on me at first."

But the news that Holcombe heard was no joke at all. President George W. Bush will in fact be visiting her school on Wednesday

The White House picked Falkener Elementary because it is a successful example of the No Child Left Behind legislation.

President Bush is scheduled to visit Falkener Elementary School on Wednesday. The White House says Falkener is a successful example of the No Child Left Behind legislation.

"We're very honored to have him come and visit Falkener. We're sure he picked the best school he could have," Holcombe said.

Students at the school have already made a sign to welcome the president. It also has a special message for the first dog, Barney.

"They're thrilled. The students are so excited about the visit. It's all they're talking about around the school today," Holcombe said.

The school is also taking extra steps in the classroom, so the students realize the meaning of the visit.

These school children will spend time this week learning about the significance of the visit.

"We're putting an additional focus on this particular area of the curriculum. Our students normally study local, state and federal government but we're shifting that to this week, so they have a heightened awareness of who is coming to visit and the significance of the visit," Holcombe said.

That means until Wednesday, Falkener Elementary will put all of its effort into making the school look great for President Bush's visit.

Falkener Elementary School has only been open for five years, but it has continually met adequate yearly progress and they have been named a School of Distinction in North Carolina.

President To Visit Greensboro Students (WGHP)

WGHP-TV High Point, North Carolina, October 16, 2006

Greensboro -- President George W. Bush returns to the Piedmont Wednesday. Among his stops will be Greensboro's Falkener Elementary.

The national recognition will spotlight the success Falkener has made in raising test scores. The majority of the school's students come from economically depressed backgrounds.

The success, according to Principal Amy Holcombe comes after hard work and good student-teacher relationships. The school uses money from the federal No Child Left Behind program.

Holcombe said the President plans to visit a few classes and plans to speak to all students via closed-circuit television.

As TSP Grows, Participants Get Chance To Chart Future (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Account balances in the Thrift Savings Plan could grow to $200 billion by year's end, the chairman of the board that oversees the 401(k)-type plan for government employees said yesterday.

Hitting $200 billion would make the TSP twice as large as four years ago, Andrew M. Saul , the head of the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, said at the board's monthly meeting. "That's really a milestone," he said.

TSP participants, like many other investors, are benefiting from the recent run-up in the stock market. Since the start of the year, the TSP's international stock index fund has gained 14.55 percent, and the large, common stock index fund has returned 8.49 percent, according to data presented to the board.

Trading costs also have jumped for the TSP, according to data released yesterday. For the first six months of this year, the plan's investment expenses totaled $9.85 million, slightly more than the trading costs incurred by the plan for all of 2005. TSP officials said most of this year's trading costs were driven by increased transactions in the international index fund, which is more expensive to buy and sell in than other TSP funds.

Despite the interest in the international fund, it is not the most popular investment choice for government workers. At the end of September, 37 percent of TSP assets were in the government securities fund and 35 percent in the large, common stock index fund. Only 9 percent of TSP assets, about $16.7 billion, were in the international fund. The rest of the account balances were spread across the bond index, small-company and life-cycle funds.

DOJ_NMG_0082185

The life-cycle funds, which were launched a year ago, are showing steady growth. Last month, officials noted, TSP investors pulled out about $689 million from the government securities fund and transferred most of it into life-cycle funds, bringing the balance in those accounts to $14 billion.

The L Funds, as they are known, allow participants to diversify their savings by selecting an investment mix that most closely meshes with the time that they expect to draw down their retirement savings.

The TSP was created by Congress about 20 years ago and has 3.66 million participants. About 86 percent of workers covered by the Federal Employees Retirement System contribute to the TSP and receive matching contributions from their agencies. FERS-covered employees also qualify for Social Security and a pension.

Other government workers who typically qualify for a traditional pension or military retirement pay do not receive matching contributions from their agencies. About 67.5 percent of employees in the old Civil Service Retirement System participate in the TSP, and 23.6 percent of the armed forces and other uniformed services make contributions.

TSP officials plan to put a questionnaire in the mail at the end of the month to gather feedback on what participants think of their retirement plan and what changes they might support. About 20,000 participants will receive the survey.

Officials hope to use the feedback and a consultant's study to make decisions late this year or next year on whether to recommend new investment options for the TSP, such as real estate, commodities and emerging markets.

Other issues likely to come before the board next year include:

· Whether to ask Congress to require automatic enrollment in the TSP for new hires. Government employees now must sign up for a payroll deduction.

· Whether to ask Congress to designate a new default fund for FERS employees who do not enroll but receive a mandatory agency contribution of 1 percent of salary. That money now goes into the government securities fund, but TSP officials think the L Funds would be a more appropriate, long-term investment.

· Whether to add a Roth 401(k)-like feature, similar to private-sector Roth individual savings accounts, to the TSP. With a Roth option, participants would make contributions with money that had been taxed, but the contributions would grow tax-free and account balances would be withdrawn tax-free. Employees now contribute pre-tax dollars to the TSP and pay taxes when they withdraw their savings.

Our View On Higher Education: Time To Grade Colleges (USAT)

USA Today, October 17, 2006

Fears of proposed database are hypothetical, but need for it is real.

Shoppers looking for a vacuum cleaner or a plasma TV can check Consumer Reports to compare ratings and value. For a car, dozens of websites assess prices, safety and gas mileage.

But for parents and students mulling one of the biggest investments of their lives, a college education, comparison shopping is nearly impossible. The most popular college guides tell more about the test scores of incoming students than about how many came out four years later with a degree. While the federal government calculates graduation rates, nearly 50% of students are missing from the data.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings wants to change that. Last month, she proposed a privacy-protected database that would collect information on all students attending college. It would open the way to comparative data and greater accountability. But given the controversy the proposal has kicked up, Spellings will likely need a go-ahead from Congress to spend money on it.

While most of the nation's public universities and community colleges favor the plan, private schools are vehemently opposed, arguing that its very existence would compromise student privacy.

That's dubious. The proposed system would not identify individual students by name or give other identifying information, and experience shows privacy can be protected. Forty states have systems that track individual student information for public universities and colleges; 17 of those also gather data from private colleges, according to the National Center for Higher Education Management Systems.

Peter Ewell, the center's vice president, could recall no breaches of individual records. Nor could the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, which opposes a federal tracking system.

While fears of compromised privacy are hypothetical, the need for a new system is real. The current state systems are incompatible, so comparison among schools in different states is impossible. Federal statistics miss students who start part-time, enter later or transfer from other institutions.

DOJ_NMG_0082186

Better data, through either a comprehensive database or scientifically valid sampling, could answer many pressing questions. Consumers who now see only a school's sticker price might learn what students actually pay, after financial aid is calculated. Researchers might learn why students drop out and where they go. Or what impact college has on their future success.

American taxpayers spend $30 billion a year on financial aid for college students, so they have a right to information about the return on their investment. For parents and students, the average cost of four years of college is $49,000 at a public college and $116,000 at a private school. They certainly deserve a more accurate picture of what they're getting for all that money.

Don't Invade Student Privacy (USAT)

By David Shi

USA Today, October 17, 2006

College transparency is needed, but tracking individuals would go too far.

The most difficult choices in public policy mimic the most difficult choices in life. Choosing between good and evil is easy; choosing one good over another is not.

This is the real issue behind the intense debate over the Education Department's proposal to require colleges to report individual student record data rather than aggregated totals, as is now done.

Opponents, including most private colleges and universities, agree that greater transparency is a good thing. However, the proposed database would put at risk fundamental privacy rights, especially the right of students to control their academic records — a federally protected right since 1972.

Most of the nation agrees with us: 62% in a recent national survey opposed requiring colleges to report individual student data to the government. Last spring, the House voted to prohibit the Education Department from creating such a database because of privacy concerns. That vote occurred before startling revelations that several federal databases had been compromised, including the department's own student loan system.

Advocates of a new database ignore the wealth of data already available online from colleges, such as Furman University, and from the government. Prospective students have access to graduation and retention rates, financial aid data, estimated student expenses, degrees awarded and much more. Yet the department has done little to make this data user-friendly. In 2004, the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities proposed a better way to do that, but the plan was met with silence.

We oppose a new individual tracking system because we fear a larger, more intrusive government bureaucracy. Greater transparency and accountability in higher education can be achieved without threatening privacy. To their credit, some proponents of a student unit-record system are willing to try to address our concerns. Yet more needs to be done. My colleagues and I are eager to work with the department to find ways for colleges to provide more useful and accessible data for applicants while protecting parents' and students' fundamental privacy rights.

David Shi is president of Furman University and chairman of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities.

Sen. Brownback's Litmus Test (WP)

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

IF YOU THOUGHT that fights over judicial nominations couldn't get any worse, consider the case of Janet T. Neff, whom President Bush has nominated to a federal district judgeship in Michigan. Judge Neff, who serves on the Michigan Court of Appeals, is part of a multi-judge deal between the White House and Michigan's two Democratic senators resolving a long-standing fight over federal court nominees from that state. Yet in reaching an accommodation with the home-state senators, Mr. Bush finds himself with another problem. For Judge Neff, it turns out, once attended a commitment ceremony for a lesbian couple -- and that has Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R) reaching for the smelling salts and blocking the nomination.

Mr. Brownback has said he wants to satisfy himself that the judge was not presiding over an "illegal marriage ceremony" in Pittsfield, Mass., in 2002 -- before the state legalized same-sex marriage. He has written to Judge Neff asking for an explanation, his spokesman says, and will hold up her nomination until he learns the nature of the ceremony and its legality. "It seems to speak about her view of judicial activism," the senator told the Associated Press.

In fact it does nothing of the kind. A commitment ceremony is not a marriage; it has no legal force whatsoever but is a private expression of the love and devotion of two people. The idea that such a ceremony could be "illegal" is deeply offensive; Americans are entitled to gather, speak, celebrate and worship as they see fit. An administration official says Judge Neff has told Mr. Brownback that she didn't preside. But even if she did, that would say nothing about her jurisprudential views -- merely that she wished to help a couple recognize their relationship informally in the absence of state sanction for it. Keeping Judge Neff off the federal bench over such a matter is perilously close to declaring her unfit to serve because she has lesbian friends.

DOJ_NMG_0082187

It also does a disservice to Mr. Bush. We have criticized Democrats for obstructing qualified judicial nominees; it is no more acceptable when Republicans do it. In this case, Mr. Bush has finally reached a compromise with Michigan senators to ease one of the more intractable irritants in the wars over lower court nominations. Judge Neff is a piece of that deal, all of which could get derailed if Mr. Brownback does not back off.

OTHER NEWS:

Lower Deficit Sparks Debate Over Tax Cuts' Role (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

With great fanfare, President Bush last week claimed credit for a striking reversal of fortune: New figures show the federal budget deficit shrinking by 40 percent over the past two years, a turnaround the president hopes will strengthen his push for further tax cuts.

Bush hailed the dwindling deficit as a direct result of "pro-growth economic policies," particularly huge tax cuts enacted during his first term. "Tax relief fuels economic growth. And growth -- when the economy grows, more tax revenues come to Washington. And that's what's happened," Bush said.

Economists said Bush was claiming credit where little is due. The economy has grown and tax receipts have risen at historic rates over the past two years, but the Bush tax cuts played a small role in that process, they said, and cost the Treasury more in lost taxes than it gained from the resulting economic stimulus.

"Federal revenue is lower today than it would have been without the tax cuts. There's really no dispute among economists about that," said Alan D. Viard, a former Bush White House economist now at the nonpartisan American Enterprise Institute. "It's logically possible" that a tax cut could spur sufficient economic growth to pay for itself, Viard said. "But there's no evidence that these tax cuts would come anywhere close to that."

Economists at the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office and in the Treasury Department have reached the same conclusion. An analysis of Treasury data prepared last month by the Congressional Research Service estimates that economic growth fueled by the cuts is likely to generate revenue worth about 7 percent of the total cost of the cuts, a broad package of rate reductions and tax credits that has returned an estimated $1.1 trillion to taxpayers since 2001.

Robert Carroll, deputy assistant Treasury secretary for tax analysis, said neither the president nor anyone else in the administration is claiming that tax cuts alone produced the unexpected surge in revenue. "As a matter of principle, we do not think tax cuts pay for themselves," Carroll said.

But, he said, "we do think good tax policy can lead to important economic benefits. . . . The size of the tax base is larger than it would have been without the tax relief."

The subtleties of that argument have been lost on the campaign trail. With less than three weeks to go until the Nov. 7 election, Republicans are promoting the good fiscal news, eager to talk about something other than the House page scandal and mounting casualties in Iraq.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) claimed credit for "driving down the deficit" and accused Democrats of plotting to roll back the tax cuts if they win a majority in the House, a move Hastert said "would destroy jobs and hurt the economy." Bush, meanwhile, called on Congress to permanently extend the cuts, which are scheduled to expire by 2010, at an additional cost to the Treasury of $2.2 trillion by 2016, according to CBO estimates.

Democrats criticized the president for celebrating a deficit that still ranks among "the largest in our nation's history," as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California put it. And they pointed to CBO projections that the deficit will rise again next year and balloon in coming decades as 78 million retiring baby boomers make claims on Social Security and Medicare.

"The truth is that the administration's fiscal policies have failed," said Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.), the senior Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee. "They have not benefited most Americans. They have dramatically worsened our long-term budget outlook. And they are putting our fundamental economic security at risk."

Without question, the deficit is receding. Despite spending swollen by storm cleanup on the Gulf Coast and the war in Iraq, the deficit fell to $248 billion in the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30, down from a record $413 billion in 2004, as higher tax receipts poured into the government's coffers.

If growth induced by Bush's cuts doesn't explain the surge, where did all those extra tax dollars come from?

DOJ_NMG_0082188

The short answer is spectacularly high corporate profits and the advancing fortunes of wealthy Americans, economists said.

Skyrocketing profits caused corporate tax receipts to jump 27 percent, to $354 billion, in 2006, the largest increase in any tax category. "After three years of strong profits, corporate tax receipts as a share of [the economy] are at levels not seen since the late 1970s," the CBO said in its August budget report.

Meanwhile, individual income tax receipts rose 12 percent, to more than $1 trillion, largely on the strength of higher salaries, bonuses and non-wage income from stock market gains, a subcategory that climbed by 20 percent, according to CBO estimates.

Why those earnings are increasing so rapidly is, at the moment, a bit of a mystery, economists said, noting that details of individual tax returns will not be available for analysis until 2008. A robust economy and a strong stock market deserve the bulk of the credit, the economists said, but tax collections are growing far faster than the economy as a whole, so those factors cannot completely explain the Treasury's good fortune or suggest how long it might last.

As recently as March, the CBO was projecting a 2006 deficit of $371 billion, despite a strong economic outlook. And administration officials in February predicted that Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath would help push the 2006 deficit to $423 billion, the largest ever in nominal dollar terms. The record is held by the 2004 deficit, though that budget gap was smaller than some deficits of the 1980s when measured against the size of the economy.

"The money flowed in in a way that no one expected," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former Bush White House economist who retired last year as CBO director. "Good economic growth is not the surprise. The surprise is that profits as a whole are so much higher."

Over the past decade, the budget deficit has tracked the economy with seeming indifference to federal tax policy, shrinking during good times and swelling during downturns. The Treasury last saw a huge influx of unexpected revenue in the 1990s, after the Clinton administration and a Democratic Congress raised taxes.

In 2000, the economy was booming and the budget was in surplus when Bush campaigned for president on a promise to cut taxes. The nation then slid into a recession soon after he took office, a downturn exacerbated by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the cost of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and big job losses. Tax revenue plunged, spending rose, and the budget swung into deficit.

The White House successfully pushed tax cuts in 2001 and 2003, partly as remedies for an ailing economy. At the same time, the Federal Reserve slashed interest rates to four-decade lows to spur consumer spending. The economy gradually gained steam, growing at a faster-than-average pace of more than 3 percent in 2004 and 2005. The housing market took off, corporate profits surged, the stock market rebounded and many upper-income Americans pocketed big gains.

Holtz-Eakin and other economists said they can only speculate about why that economic growth generated a disproportionate jump in revenue. There have been changes in the tax code, such as the 2004 expiration of a tax that allowed businesses to immediately deduct half the value of new assets. Economists said corporations chastened by recent accounting scandals may also be paying more taxes on more of their income. And with large and growing incomes going to chief executives, athletes, entertainers, and even star lawyers and academics, those people are paying more taxes.

"The simplest way to think about it, I think, is we know we have growing income inequality, especially at the top," said Isabel V. Sawhill, a Brookings Institution economist who worked for the Clinton administration. "The very rich are pulling away from the ordinary rich and the middle class. Those very rich people pay higher tax rates. When the distribution of income shifts upward, as it has in recent years, you get a revenue kicker from that."

It's A Faith Thing (WSJ)

By Brian S. Wesbury

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

With equity markets steadily gaining ground and the Dow Jones Industrial Average reaching record highs, it is getting harder for cynics and pessimists to argue that the U.S. economy is doing poorly. But this does not stop them from trying. Lately, the old class-warrior standby, that "Wall Street may be doing fine, but Main Street suffers," is echoing down the alleyways.

Fortunately, no matter how many times this theory bounces off the walls, there is little in the way of facts to back it up. The so-called "jobless recovery" was dealt a severe blow when the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) reported that its annual recalibration of employment statistics will add 810,000 jobs to its previously calculated total. This is one of the largest revisions in history, exceeding the combined payrolls of GM, Ford, United and American Airlines.

In an additional blow to those who find things to worry about everywhere, the Treasury released its latest estimate of the budget deficit -- now expected to be $248 billion in FY 2006. Just eight months ago, the CBO guesstimated a $337 billion shortfall and the White House forecast a $423 billion deficit.

DOJ_NMG_0082189

While cynicism and pessimism are part of human nature, handwringing based on out-of-date models and inaccurate data is unnecessary. Bad data and bad models are a dangerous combination that can bias political views and impact policy decisions. Recent revisions reflect the problem; the very data that caused so much indigestion previously now reveals a strong and resilient economy.

The driving force behind the good news is productivity growth fueled by innovation. If the 1980s and 1990s saw the invention and proliferation of new technology, the early 21st century is witnessing its implementation. The impact is immense, and it changes everything. The 2003 tax cuts have also played a major role. Before those tax cuts, the economy, job growth and the stock market were sluggish and stagnant. After them -- because they increased the incentives for risk-taking -- the economy and markets improved dramatically.

Business investment has boomed and nonfinancial corporate sector productivity has grown an annualized 4.3% over the past three years -- its most rapid growth in 45 years. Pre-tax corporate profits have doubled in just five years. Still, fears about growth and geopolitics have kept stocks cheap. A simple capitalized profits model (corporate profits divided by interest rates) suggests that even after recent strength, the broad U.S. equity market is 35% undervalued.

Part of this undervaluation reflects a view that the U.S. economy is fundamentally fragile, especially the consumer sector. But as long as tax rates are low, the economy will do just fine. It's a faith thing. Those who lack faith in free markets fret constantly about weak job growth, problems at old-line manufacturing firms and some signs of weakness in incomes. But this pessimistic view is heavily reliant on the BLS Establishment Survey, which was designed in a paternalistic age of large businesses and time-clock punching. It has difficulty capturing small business employment, the self-employed, independent contractors and many limited liability corporations. As a result, I have argued for at least a decade that it misses a great deal of our New Era Economy.

It is easier than ever to start and manage a new business and harder for the government to track those new businesses. Software programmers can work anywhere, any time. So can those who buy and sell on eBay. Masseuses, manicurists, landscapers, realtors, painters, dry-wallers and many other professions are naturals for small partnerships that avoid paying unemployment insurance, which means they escape the BLS establishment survey.

They do show up in a second BLS jobs survey -- the household survey, which is done in person or over the phone, and asks people, not employers, if they are working. A perfect example of these forces at work surfaced two weeks ago when the assets of Tower Records were sold off, including the flagship store on Hollywood's Sunset Boulevard, putting 3,000 employees out of work. Technology -- in this case, digital music downloading -- is boosting productivity rapidly. This type of creative destruction is both real and widespread. If former Tower Records employees use their intimate knowledge of the music business to make a living on eBay or consult to online music providers, they would disappear from the establishment survey, but remain in the household survey.

During the 12 months ending in September 2006, the household survey reported 2.54 million new jobs. Going back 24 months shows 5.5 million new jobs, an annual average of 2.75 million. This exceeds the booming 1995-2000 average of 2.34 million new jobs per year. The household survey, in contrast with the establishment survey, has consistently signaled a resilient economy. And it continues. In the past two months, the household survey has expanded by 261,000 per month, while the establishment survey rose by an average of just 120,000.

But that's not all. Because the payroll survey is the major source for both average hourly earnings and wage and salary estimates, these measures of income have also underestimated potential consumer strength. But like job growth, recent revisions found $160 billion of personal income that was previously uncounted.

This helps to explain the awesome tidal wave of tax revenues flowing into federal government coffers. Tax revenues grew 12% in 2005 and are up by 11.8% this year. Despite lower tax rates, total federal revenues are $410 billion higher this year than they were at their previous high water mark in 2000.

The problem is on the spending side. Federal government spending this past fiscal year was $907 billion higher than it was in 2000 -- the equivalent of adding both the Australia and Ireland GDPs to annual spending. If ranked, total annual U.S. government outlays of $2.7 trillion in 2006 would be the world's fourth largest GDP: Just below Germany, but 10% larger than China's entire economy. These spending increases make it even more amazing that the U.S. economy has been able to grow at a 3.7% annual average rate in the past three years. While pessimists fret about global competition, they rarely think about the fact that U.S. entrepreneurs must compete while carrying a government larger than China on their backs.

My estimates suggest that every percentage point increase in government spending as a share of GDP subtracts roughly 0.2% from real GDP growth. Between 2000 and 2006, spending jumped from 18.4% of GDP to a 20.3% share, a 1.9% increase. Whether this spending is financed by borrowing or taxation, it still crowds out the private sector and reduces potential real GDP growth by roughly 0.4%.

DOJ_NMG_0082190

Nonetheless, tax cuts and productivity growth have overcome the negative impact of this spending splurge. Looking back, despite a dozen Fed rate cuts, the stock market did not bottom until the early months of 2003, when the pro-investment tax cut was finally on its way to passage. Since then, the Dow industrials is up 51%, the S&P 500 63%, and the Nasdaq 80%.

The lesson of all this is that when tax cuts and technology work together to encourage productivity growth, the economy and markets perform well. Massive positive revisions to employment and incomes, rising stock prices and a flood of new tax revenues paint a much different picture than conventional wisdom had expected. But history is clear. As long as government policies do not hinder entrepreneurship, the U.S. economy can overcome even the most daunting of challenges. Have faith.

Dow Industrials Inch Closer ... Ever Closer (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rallied to another record despite a third straight rise in crude-oil prices and analyst downgrades of two of its component companies.

The blue-chip indicator is less than 20 points shy of its first close above 12000, after pulling within four points of that milestone during yesterday's session. The Dow rose 20.09 points, or 0.2%, to 11980.60, up 11.8% on the year. It was the seventh record close in 10 trading sessions,

Market watchers said, as they have several times recently, that investors seem increasingly confident that third-quarter earnings reports trickling out from companies will show strong profit growth. Two Dow components -- International Business Machines and Intel -- rose ahead of their reports due out today.

Although IBM trades on the New York Stock Exchange, these technology-companies' market gains helped to boost the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index, which gained 0.3%, or 6.55 points, to end at 2363.84. It is up 7.2% on the year and just slightly more than seven points below a 5½-year high.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock Index rose 0.3%, or 3.43 points, to 1369.05, up 9.7% on the year and at a new 5½-year high.

Crude-oil futures for November delivery leapt $1.37, up 2.3%, to $59.94 a barrel, the biggest rise in more than two weeks on the New York Mercantile Exchange. The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries called an emergency meeting Thursday to discuss an output cut. The cartel's members have disagreed in recent days over whether to reduce production by a million barrels a day and, if so, who should shoulder that burden.

On the year, crude prices are off 1.8%.

"A lot of companies have been able to offset energy costs by raising prices," said Chris Meeker, analyst and portfolio manager at asset-management firm Farr, Miller & Washington. "It's certainly a concern that those energy costs could get out of control again. But it's not enough for us to change our thesis," that large companies like those in the Dow and S&P 500 are poised to do well in the months ahead.

Keeping yesterday's stock-market gains in check, shares in Home Depot and General Electric, both Dow components, fell more than 1%. Analysts at Goldman Sachs downgraded Home Depot to a neutral rating from buy, citing concerns over recent management departures. Merrill Lynch analysts made a similar ratings change for General Electric, citing risks to its long-term earnings.

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, rose 0.76%, or 1.70 points, to 224.56.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.3 billion shares, as 2,305 stocks advanced and 1,014 fell.

Bond prices rose. The 10-year note gained 6/32 point, or $1.875 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.784%. The 30-year bond rose 10/32 to yield 4.915%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 119.12 yen, compared with 119.67. The euro rose to $1.2532, compared with $1.2510.

Stock Market Surge May Boost Charities (USAT)

By Sandra Block

USA Today, October 17, 2006

If the stock market sustains its strong performance through the rest of the year, investors won't be the only winners. Charities will likely benefit, too.

DOJ_NMG_0082191

Historically, stock market performance has been closely correlated with charitable giving, research by the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University shows. Charitable giving rose sharply in the '90s, then dropped off as the market sank.

"I'm very optimistic for charities this holiday season," says Trent Stamp, president of Charity Navigator, which rates charities. "I think it could be the biggest year in five to 10 years."

Most charitable donations are made near the end of the year. "For the stock market to be going up in advance of people making those year-end decisions — that's a good thing for philanthropy," says Patrick Rooney, director of research for the Center on Philanthropy.

Even before the most recent run-up in stock prices, charities were bullish about prospects for year-end giving. A survey the center conducted this summer found that most charities expect donations to increase during the second half of the year compared with the same period in 2005.

Nearly 60% of charitable groups reported an increase in giving in 2005, according to the Center on Philanthropy. Contrary to what some had feared, donations to relief groups that helped victims of Hurricane Katrina and the Indonesia tsunami did not lead to a drop-off in contributions to other types of charities last year, Rooney says.

Along with the stock market's performance, Rooney says, continued growth in the economy and stable interest rates are likely to encourage charitable giving. Though housing prices have declined, the center's research shows that home values tend to have a lesser effect on charitable giving, he says.

Other factors contributing to a cheery outlook for charity:

•A rise in contributions of securities. Contributions to the Fidelity Charitable Gift fund, which typically receives about 70% of its donations in the form of appreciated securities, are up 29% year to date compared with the same period in 2005, says David Guinta, president of the fund. When stocks do well, contributions of securities typically rise. Donors can deduct the market value of the shares at the time of the contribution and avoid paying tax on capital gains.

•Online giving. Charities expect online giving to rise significantly during the holiday season, particularly among young donors. Though it still represents just 2% to 3% of overall giving by individuals, online giving is tracking the trend in online shopping and banking, according to Network for Good, an Internet site that lets donors contribute to thousands of charities. While the majority of "offline" donors are in their 60s, the median age of donors who contribute through Network for Good is 38, says Katya Andresen of Network for Good.

The Internet is "bringing in a new group of people who haven't been philanthropic in the past," Stamp says.

Consumers Face Test As Gas Prices Fall (WSJ)

By Joseph B. White

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

October is turning into a big month for alternatives to century old gasoline car technology.

Just last week, Toyota Motor Corp. officially launched production of its gas-electric hybrid Toyota Camry sedan at its big factory in Kentucky. Toyota's betting that 60,000 Americans a year will want a $26,200 family car that averages 39 mpg.

The small but vigorous lobby that wants auto makers to put more muscle behind so-called "plug-in" hybrid technology got a symbolic boost when AutoNation Inc., owner of the largest chain of car dealerships in the U.S., issued a call for car companies to build such vehicles, and said it will take orders from customers who want them.

A plug-in hybrid takes the technology of a car like the Toyota Prius to the next level by allowing the driver to operate the car solely on battery power for up to 60 miles. The owner recharges the batteries by plugging the car into a wall socket. A plug-in hybrid can still rely on its gasoline engine for longer trips or if the battery runs out. Advocates say that a hybrid car that allows for a significant amount of all-electric operation can save far more petroleum than a conventional hybrid car which needs to run its gasoline engine often.

But that's not all. Fans of European diesel technology, which enables family cars to average around 40 miles per gallon or more, are cheering because after years of wrangling, regulations requiring refiners in the U.S. to remove 97% of the sulfur previously allowed in on-road diesel fuels finally take effect. Ultra-low sulfur diesel is a prerequisite to various car makers' plans to try to re-launch diesel engines as a mass-market alternative for cars and sport utility vehicles. Several car makers have recently announced plans to add or expand diesel models in the U.S. market over the next three years.

To top it off, President Bush on Thursday used the podium of a Renewable Energy Conference in St. Louis to express his enthusiasm for a wide range of oil-conserving technologies, including corn and cellulosic ethanol, fuel cells, and plug-in hybrids, as well as nuclear power, natural gas and coal. The president explicitly linked reducing oil consumption to protecting national security and economic security.

With all of these developments, you'd think the Green Revolution is right around the corner.

DOJ_NMG_0082192

There's just one problem: Gasoline is once again getting cheap, or at least, cheapish. That's great if you drive a long way to work. But if you really want to end what the president has called America's "addiction to oil," it's a problem, as the president himself acknowledged.

"Look, let me just put it bluntly: We're too dependent on oil," Mr. Bush said, according to a transcript posted on the White House Web site. "…And see, low gasoline prices may mask that concern. So, first, I want to tell you that I welcome the low gasoline prices, however it's not going to dim my enthusiasm for making sure we diversify away from oil. "

Mr. Bush's quandary reflects a much longer term dilemma. The U.S. has been having an argument with itself about automobile fuel efficiency for more than 30 years. Over those decades, the momentum of the argument has shifted from one pole to another. In the 1970s, oil prices spiked and Washington for the first time demanded that auto makers meet certain Corporate Average Fuel Economy standards, commonly known as CAFE. The societal urge to escape the squeeze of Middle Eastern oil producers also brought on the 55 mile-per-hour speed limit, a surge in demand for small Japanese cars and Jimmy Carter's cardigan.

In the later 1980s and 1990s, gasoline prices plunged, and American culture lurched back the other way. Cardigans, Drive 55, and econoboxes were out. Hummers and Explorers were in.

The constant in all of this: An unwavering commitment by the government to cheap gasoline.

So instead of clear signals, there is static. The political rhetoric says, "Keep America Strong! Buy a plug-in hybrid that burns E85 ethanol." But the everyday message sent by prices at the gas pump is, "Aren't you glad that $3 a gallon business is over? Fill 'er up."

Moreover, there is no serious talk right now of substantially raising car and truck fuel economy targets -- the better to force fuel-saving technology into production. And there is no serious discussion of reordering national priorities by say, diverting some of the billions spent on highways to construct high-speed intercity rail links.

The big question is, what signals will consumers heed, and what signals will they send?

The next several months will be a test. Auto industry executives say they believe that a greater number of American consumers now rank fuel economy high on their list of priorities, despite the recent gas price drop.

In September, as gasoline prices eased under $2.50 a gallon in many parts of the country, interest in fuel economy oriented gas-electric hybrid vehicles such as the Honda Civic and Ford Escape and the Toyota Prius remained relatively strong, according to data from the Power Information Network. An Escape hybrid, for example, took 24 days, on average, to move off a dealer's lot in August and September, according to PIN data. That compares to 63 days to sell in March. The Escape had an average $1,305 rebate in August and $568 rebate in September. During the past two months, the Civic and Prius moved after just 10 days and 5 days, respectively, with no rebates.

The few diesel cars on the U.S. market aren't quite as hot as the Civic and Prius hybrids. But the diesel Volkswagen Jetta in September sold in an average of just 18 days, compared to 67 days for the gasoline version, according to PIN data.

Meanwhile, data from Edmunds.com, the big shopping site, indicates that many of the best selling large SUVs are still struggling. The average discount offered on a Dodge Durango in September was over $11,000, or about 30% of sticker price. And the vehicles still are sitting unsold for an average of 182 days.

One car to watch is the Camry hybrid. The hybrid Camry is rated at 39 miles per gallon in combined city/highway driving, compared to an EPA rating of 27 miles per gallon in city/highway driving for a four cylinder Camry with a five speed automatic transmission. The Hybrid Camry has features similar to the four cylinder Camry with the most expensive XLE trim level, which starts at $24,700. That puts the hybrid premium at about $1,500. But if you wanted to be rigorous about it, the cheapest Camry sedan starts at $18,270, and the average Camry sells for about $22,700, according to Power Information Network data. On those terms, the hybrid premium is more like $3,500. Toyota says Camry hybrids purchased after Oct. 1 will qualify for a $1,300 tax credit.

Toyota has publicly defined success as selling 60,000 Camry hybrids a year, or 5,000 a month, which is roughly equivalent to 15% of total U.S. Camry sales. If the Camry misses that target, it could be a sign that President Bush is right to be worried about the resolve of Americans to end oil addiction, just because they should.

Energy Shortage (NYT)

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

President Bush touched a lot of the right bases in a speech in St. Louis that focused on the urgent need for increased efficiency and alternative fuels to address the country's energy problems, including its dependence on imported oil. It would be helpful, though, if he could get his Department of Energy on the same page.

DOJ_NMG_0082193

One of the department's most important tasks is to periodically review and improve efficiency standards for appliances and other equipment. The department has always been sluggish in issuing these standards. But under Mr. Bush it has been more passive than ever, failing to issue a single strengthened efficiency standard since he took office. It also tried to roll back strong Clinton-era standards for central air-conditioners. Only a lawsuit filed by New York's Eliot Spitzer, nine other state attorneys general and the Natural Resources Defense Council prevented it from doing so.

Mr. Spitzer and others also sued the department for violating Congressionally mandated deadlines for revising standards for 22 products. In the wake of that lawsuit, and under new management — Secretary Samuel Bodman took the helm at the end of 2004 — the department has at least begun proposing new standards, most recently for home furnaces and for distribution transformers, the gray cans that hang on electric wires and change the voltage on the grid to household levels.

The bad news is that the proposed standards are not nearly strong enough. The standard for distribution transformers, issued for public comment in August, was so low as to antagonize the industry itself — a rare event. Top executives from 10 major utilities, led by Exelon and New Mexico-based PNM, argued that more efficient transformers would not only save energy and cut pollution from power plants but would save the companies money.

For home furnaces and boilers — big users of oil and natural gas — the department proposes only trivial efficiency increases that would leave consumers with heating bills almost as high as their current ones. The department's reasoning seems to be that the more efficient (but more costly) equipment needed for colder climates could impose an unnecessary financial burden on consumers in warmer climates.

At the same time, however, the department said that it did not have the authority to establish regional standards, and instead invited individual states to set their own standards — an uncertain process at best. From where we sit, it appears that a department that has long retreated from its statutory obligations has done so again.

As Talk Radio Wavers, Bush Moves To Firm Up Support (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 — On an overcast Friday morning last month, White House aides ushered an influential group of conservative radio hosts into the Oval Office for a private audience with the president.

For an hour and a half, Mr. Bush discussed his case for the war in Iraq, his immigration proposals and even the personality of his Scottish terrier Barney, who scratched on the door during the session until the president relented and let him into the office, according to several hosts who attended.

The meeting, which was not announced on the president's public schedule, was part of an intensive Republican Party campaign to reclaim and re-energize a crucial army of supporters that is not as likely to walk in lockstep with the White House as it has in the past.

Conservative radio hosts are breaking with the Republican leadership in ways not seen in at least a decade, and certainly not since Rush Limbaugh's forceful advocacy of the party in 1994 spawned a new generation of stars, said Michael Harrison, publisher of the industry's lead trade publication, Talkers.

Disgruntlement can now be found not only among the more flamboyant radio voices, like Michael Savage, who raged against Mr. Bush's proposals on immigration and other issues, but also among more mainstream hosts, like Laura Ingraham, who told her listeners in the wake of the scandal involving former Representative Mark Foley and under-age Congressional pages, "You have to ask yourself, the people who are in positions of power now in the Republican Party, are they able to credibly articulate the conservative agenda to the American people — to rally the base, to rally the country?"

Such questions, coming from such quarters, have created yet another challenge for the White House and the central party leadership as they work to steer Republicans to victory next month in the face of low approval ratings and dissatisfaction among the party faithful.

Strategists on both sides agree that the party's greatest hope for holding control of Congress now rests with its ability to get core Republicans to vote, and that talk radio, which reaches millions of them, is crucial to the task.

Democratic strategists say talk radio remains a fearsome Republican advocacy force for which they have little direct answer. (Air America, which features liberal hosts, including Al Franken, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy last week.) The top two rated conservative hosts, Mr. Limbaugh and Sean Hannity, have done more than their part to rally their listeners this year, especially during the Foley scandal, to the great relief of Republican Party officials. And even those critical of Mr. Bush or the party on specific issues still consider themselves major supporters in general, with perhaps the exception of Mr. Savage.

DOJ_NMG_0082194

But Mr. Savage is the third most popular host in the nation, with at least eight million listeners weekly, according to Talkers. And the Democrats have watched happily as he and others have at times sent reverberations of conservative frustration into what they often call the "Republican echo chamber."

The challenge now falls to party strategists to persuade the hosts to overcome the frustrations of many hard-core listeners over issues like spending and border security without alienating them.

"When conservatives are agitated at the president, radio hosts feel pressured to stand with the conservatives against the president to prove their independence," said Tim Graham, an analyst at the Media Research Center, a conservative news monitoring group. But, Mr. Graham said, "realizing what life would be like if we lost the House is concentrating people's minds."

The White House and the Republican National Committee are hammering home that point in interviews, talking-point bulletins and a healthy dollop of pomp that only a White House can provide.

The effort will peak on Oct. 24, when the administration will hold something of a talk-radio summit meeting, inviting dozens of hosts to set up booths on the White House grounds, where top cabinet officials are expected to sit for interviews.

The party chairman, Ken Mehlman, has already been working overtime on the talk radio circuit. From Wednesday to Friday of last week, he was interviewed a total of 20 times in Missouri, Tennessee and Ohio, promoting party stances on tax cuts and terrorism.

But, several hosts said, the most telling development so far this year was the White House decision to invite some of the most popular hosts to the Oval Office for off-the-record time with the president.

Kevin Sullivan, the White House communications director, said the meeting was among the latest examples of the administration's effort to put Mr. Bush in front of more news media as his own best spokesman. The president also gave interviews recently to several television anchors and held an Oval Office chat with a group of conservative writers.

And Mr. Bush granted an on-camera interview to Bill O'Reilly of the Fox News Channel. The first of three parts ran Monday night.

Still, officials said, the meeting with the radio hosts gave Mr. Bush a chance to speak intimately with a group that reaches an overwhelmingly Republican audience of 30 million people per week.

"You want to make sure that your friends are friendly," said Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, who has been crucial to the effort and who was a conservative radio host who turned harshly critical of Mr. Bush just months before he went to work for him last spring.

Mr. Snow said that while "any party has its disagreements," there was little division among Republicans on the top two issues Mr. Bush has tried to push this year: terrorism and taxes.

And the fight against terrorism dominated the discussion at the meeting.

"This was clearly, clearly an effort to kind of rally the troops when the troops need rallying," said Mike Gallagher, who attended the meeting and whose daily program reaches at least 3.75 million people each week. "They know that we've got an audience of people who may or may not be on the political fence right now."

Mr. Gallagher said that he and the other hosts — Mr. Hannity, Ms. Ingraham, Neal Boortz and Michael Medved — talked about the experience on their programs "for days and days and days."

(Mr. Limbaugh said that he met with Mr. Bush and Karl Rove, the president's chief strategist, in the Oval Office in June, but generally tried to keep his distance to maintain independence.)

On his Web site, Mr. Medved wrote how Mr. Bush spoke about his commitment to his immigration plan in terms of the fight against terrorism. He said the president made a case that if he were to give in to conservative complaints, "the nation's enemies (and the rest of the world) would take away the belief that the president could be bullied, prodded, overwhelmed and intimidated."

Mr. Hannity said of the meeting, "I think he'd have an 80 percent approval rating if he could bring people into the Oval Office six people at a time and explain it all to them."

But Ms. Ingraham, who recently went bike riding with the president, has continued to complain about federal spending, progress in Iraq and, lately, the Republican leadership's handling of the Foley scandal. Ms. Ingraham likened herself to a sports fan who nonetheless has occasional criticism of the coach. But, she said pointedly on her show: "I am not an advocate for the G.O.P. I'm an advocate for conservative ideas."

Bush's Appearances Revolve Around Core Themes (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's political pitch boils down to two words and one argument.

The words are taxes and terrorism. The argument: Democrats are wrong on both.

DOJ_NMG_0082195

Those themes dominate the half-hour stump speech Bush gives on behalf of Republican candidates across the country. Seeking to preserve precarious GOP majorities in Congress, he has delivered nine campaign speeches in October and could give as many as 20 more before the elections Nov. 7.

This week, he will speak at a Republican National Committee dinner in Greensboro, N.C., and on behalf of two embattled GOP incumbents, Rep. Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania and Sen. George Allen of Virginia. Sherwood admitted an extramarital affair last year after his mistress sued him. Allen is in a tight race for a second term with Democrat Jim Webb.

"I like campaigns," Bush said at a fundraiser Oct. 4 for Rep. Rick Renzi, R-Ariz. "It's a good chance to explain the philosophy of the two different parties."

Like an old song with new verses, Bush's basic text is constantly updated. White House communications director Kevin Sullivan said most of Bush's speech comes from the president's handwritten notes, from an outline he developed.

Before each event, speechwriters provide a list of local dignitaries to be acknowledged, Sullivan said. They also provide an insert on the message of the day that is either tied to the candidate's own history or news events. That could mean talking about a candidate's role in energy or environment legislation, in addition to standard hits on taxes and the war on terrorism.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president's stump speech also carries a "subtext. He's got a plan, and it's not clear the other guys do."

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg said she hears a different message: "They are desperate to scare voters in any way they can." She said the middle class does not feel safe or financially secure because of Bush's policies.

Wayne Fields, author of Union of Words: A History of Presidential Eloquence, noted that Bush is "not a very good speechmaker" who sometimes mangles his syntax. For example: In saluting Colorado secretary of State candidate Mike Coffman, an Iraq war veteran, Bush said, "Proud to have been able to call you commander in chief."

This kind of thing doesn't necessarily hurt Bush, Fields said, because many voters regard him as "an ordinary guy in the way he talks."

What's Behind Bush's Stump Speech (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 17, 2006

Topic

Bush quote

What he's doing

Notable

The introduction

"I'm proud to be here with … (fill in name)" or "It's good to be in (fill in city or state) ..."

— A typical opening line Bush salutes local officeholders and dignitaries, and the cities he visits. If he's going to make a quip to relax the audience, this is where he'll slip it in. At a Sept. 28 event in Alabama, Bush referred to the 6'9" lieutenant governor candidate, Luther Strange, as "a man who will stand tall" for the state.

This is standard political fare. Bush, like most politicians, adjusts to the situation. For example: At an Oct. 12 campaign event in Chicago hosted by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Bush defended the Illinois Republican who is under fire for his handling of lurid communications between former representative Mark Foley and teenage male pages. Hastert is "not one of these Washington politicians who spews a lot of hot air."

The first lady

"Now, I wasn't Dean's first choice. He wisely had put in a request for Laura."

— Oct. 2, for Nevada congressional candidate Dean Heller Most Bush campaign speeches contain a homage to the first lady, including an oft-told line about how he married well. If Laura Bush is not in attendance, he says she sends her regards. This is where he'll thank a candidate's spouse.

Bush isn't entirely joking. Laura Bush's popularity has consistently rated above 60% in polls since 2001, and she is considered one of the president's top political assets. The first lady also stumps on her own for Republican candidates.

The economy

"The issue is (if) the Democrats get control of the Congress, they're going to have their hands on your wallet."

— Oct. 4 for Rep. Bob Beauprez, the GOP candidate for Colorado governor The meat of Bush's stump speeches starts with the economy and a call for more tax cuts. He credits them for the rising stock market and falling unemployment rates. Bush accuses Democrats of wanting to increase taxes, such as this Oct. 10 reference to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.: "She said, 'We love tax cuts.' Given her record, she must be a secret admirer."

DOJ_NMG_0082196

Pelosi and other Democrats said they support tax cuts that help the middle class. Pelosi says her party's stance is a "stark contrast" from Bush's "tax breaks for the super-rich that have led to a budget that is grossly out of balance and a national debt that is morally indefensible."

The Iraq war and terrorism

"They talk tough on terror, but when the votes are counted, their softer side comes out."

— Oct. 3, about Democrats during an event for Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif. Bush spotlights Democratic opposition to a variety of anti-terrorism efforts: the Iraq war, expanded law enforcement powers, a warrantless wiretapping program and techniques used by the CIA to interrogate "high-value" terror suspects.

Democrats such as Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont said the war in Iraq has spawned terrorism. Leahy also said expanded law enforcement authority and warrantless wiretaps spark concerns about civil rights and privacy. Leahy said the bill to be signed today by Bush that establishes rules for CIA interrogation of terror suspects omits "checks against mistreatment of prisoners" that will make it harder to boost the image of the United States around the world.

The last pitch

"If you want people in Washington who are not going to sit back and wait to be attacked again, you make sure you send people like John Doolittle back to the United States Congress."

— Oct. 3, endorsing Doolittle at a California fundraiser As he winds up the terrorism section of his speech, Bush says it's the GOP — and the candidate on stage next to him — that can best keep the nation safe.

Until recently, most polls showed Americans believed the GOP was the party that could best handle issues of national security and terrorism. A new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds respondents believe Democrats are now best suited to deal with terrorism, 46%-41%.

Sources: White House and USA TODAY research. Reported by David Jackson. Graphic by Mark Pearson, USA TODAY

Cheney Hits Heartland, And He Can Feel The Love (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

TOPEKA, Kan., Oct. 12 — Grace Mosier lives with her mom and dad, goes to birthday parties, takes ballet classes and is just like a lot of other 6-year-old girls. Except that she happens to be obsessed with Dick Cheney.

"I really, really like him," says Grace, who can tell you what state the vice president was born in (Nebraska), where he went to grade school (College View, in Lincoln) and the names of his dogs (Dave and Jackson). She gets her fix of Cheney fun-facts by visiting the White House Web site for children. It says there that his favorite teacher was Miss Duffield and that he used to run a company called Halliburton.

So when Mr. Cheney came to town Thursday, Grace was at Forbes Field, holding a little American flag and a sign that said, "Welcome, Mr. Vice President, pet Dave and Jackson for me." She watched him get off Air Force Two, step into a car and speed off to a fund-raiser.

"Like a rock star coming to town," says Dene Mosier, Grace's mother. And while Mr. Cheney might be an unusual object for a 6-year-old's fixation, it is probably less unusual here, in the heart of Cheney Country.

The terrain consists of hotel ballrooms, military bases and private homes deep in the reddest of red states like Kansas (where President Bush and Mr. Cheney won by 25 percentage points in 2004). As a rule, people still love Mr. Bush in Cheney Country, at least relative to some locales. But the president cannot be everywhere, so Mr. Cheney comes instead, exposing as he goes the durability and devotion of his party's base.

He is dispatched around the country — to Topeka last week, to Casper, Wyo., the week before, and to Wyoming, Mich., the week before that — to preside over events largely ignored by the national news media but covered big-time by the local press. He raises a lot of cash for the Republican Party and its candidates — more than $40 million at 114 events since January 2005, many of them in off-Broadway political settings like Topeka.

And he reaps a full helping of love.

"How about a big Kansas welcome for Vice President Dick Cheney?" Representative Jim Ryun, a five-term Republican, says at a lunchtime fund-raiser on Thursday.

And a big Kansas welcome he gets: cheers, sustained applause, even some war whoops — yes, war whoops. Loving ones.

"Well, that warm welcome is almost enough to make me want to run for office again," the vice president responds. "Almost."

DOJ_NMG_0082197

Mr. Cheney's favorability ratings might be in an underground bunker, somewhere beneath the president's (at 20 percent in the most recent New York Times poll). Critics deride him as a Prince of Darkness whose occasional odd episodes — swearing at a United States senator, shooting a friend in a hunting accident and then barely acknowledging it publicly — suggest a striking indifference to how he is perceived. Even admirers who laud his intellect and steadiness rarely mention anything about his electrifying rooms or people.

But then there are people like these, at the Capitol Plaza Hotel Manor Conference Center in Topeka.

"It's just such a big thrill to see and hear this man," says Marvin Smith, a farmer and former teacher.

Mr. Smith says most people he knows feel the same way, "except for a few of those peacemakers." He means protesters, a smattering of whom are picketing down the street.

"We love him here," Susan Wagle, a state senator, says of Mr. Cheney.

After a sustained and rollicking ovation that inspires a rare smile with both sides of his mouth, Mr. Cheney starts into a variant of the same talk he has delivered literally hundreds of times. He tells how the first vice president, John Adams, enjoyed Senate floor privileges until they were revoked. (Mr. Cheney has told this story at least 48 times in official remarks since 2001, according to the White House's Web site.)

He skips the bit about how he had been the lone congressman from Wyoming — "It was a small delegation, but it was quality," which he has told at least 67 times as vice president.

He offers his standard homage to tax cuts, a warning about how terrorists are still trying desperately "to cause mass death here in the United States" and a derisive cataloging of the various "Dean Democrats," congressmen including Charles B. Rangel of New York, Henry A. Waxman of California and Barney Frank of Massachusetts, whose influence would grow if the apocalypse came and Democrats took over Congress.

The crowd boos.

"Don't hold back," Mr. Cheney urges.

The crowd laughs.

The lights over Mr. Cheney's head keep getting dimmer and then brighter, the kind of inexplicable distraction that can get an advance person fired but that also adds sizzle to the floor show. (There were no audible requests for Mr. Cheney to crowd-surf, shed his tie or perform "Free Bird.")

None of the Cheneyphiles here are mentioning Mark Foley, the former Republican congressman at the center of the House page scandal, or the precarious hold Republicans might have on Congress or, for the most part, the problems in Iraq. Nor is anyone mentioning Mr. Cheney's unpopularity in the polls, except in terms of all the unfair attacks from Democrats and the "liberal media."

"They throw so much trash at him, it's just unbelievable," says Morris Thomason, a rancher who lives in Belvidere, Kan., but who grew up in Casper, Wyo., Cheney's boyhood home. He spent his formative years with Dick Cheney himself.

Young Dick even came to his 13th birthday party, Mr. Thomason recalls, and gave him a bunch of stamps and a book. They water-skied together in an irrigation canal near Casper.

He has not spoken to Mr. Cheney since the latter was secretary of defense in the first Bush administration, or, Mr. Thomason says, maybe it was when he was chief of staff under President Gerald R. Ford. He will not be seeing him today, either, at least up close, because that would require a $1,000 contribution for the photo op, and Mr. Thomason's $100 ticket is only for the speech.

Mr. Cheney starts his 20-minute talk early and then is off to tour a barge factory in New Orleans and to speak at another fund-raiser.

"There was a peacefulness and a truthfulness to this man that really caught my heart," says the congressman's wife, Anne Ryun, who is clutching a Bush-Cheney placard from the 2000 campaign that the vice president has just autographed.

Ms. Ryun had spoken briefly to Mr. Cheney and says she had told him she was praying for him. She adds that his wife, Lynne, "is the most gracious, intelligent woman I've ever known of," and that she wants to model her life after her. Recounting this, Ms. Ryun's voice goes soft, and her eyes become a little glassy.

While Mr. Cheney spoke, 6-year-old Grace stayed behind at the airport and scored a private tour of Air Force Two. The Secret Service agents were impressed with her Cheney knowledge and admitted that it exceeded their own. She got her picture in the paper, made the local newscasts and became quite a sensation in her own right on the day Dick Cheney came to town, and it was a big deal.

Backstory: 14 Hours, Really, With Dick Cheney (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

DOJ_NMG_0082198

The Christian Science Monitor, October 17, 2006

ABOARD AIR FORCE TWO

The running joke among White House correspondents is that the most glamorous part of our job is ... telling people you cover the White House.

In fact, as much as reporters like to complain about life in the much-maligned White House press corps, it has its moments - careening around in motorcades with no regard for red lights, quips from President Bush about one's wardrobe, the tiny lamb chops at the White House Christmas party.

But what about covering the No. 2 man, Dick Cheney, widely seen as the most powerful vice president in history? After all, he is better known for being sequestered in undisclosed locations than for chatting up journalists.

Then the invitation came: Would I like to spend a day flying around the country - well, actually, from Washington to Topeka to New Orleans, then back to Washington - as the "pool" reporter with Vice President Cheney? My job would be to go where I was told and file to my fellow reporters summaries of the vice president's actions and any color I felt like throwing in. I accepted.

On the appointed day, last Thursday, I arrived at Andrews Air Force Base, just outside D.C. in Maryland, at 7:30 a.m., whereupon I was asked to open all the doors, hood, and trunk of my car for an inspection by a military dog. I passed. Then it was on to the terminal, where I was met by Jamie, a friendly young press aide in the vice president's office. Two other reporters, Mike Allen of Time magazine and Brendan Murray of Bloomberg, joined us.

Soon we were boarding Air Force Two, a Boeing 757 modified for vice presidential needs, such as secure communication and a private section at the front with a large vice presidential seal on the door. Most of us flying that day - press, flight attendants, Secret Service, military, other aides - boarded via a stairway into the back of the plane. After we journalists had been shown our seats (coach size, while most of the other seats are business-class size), we were invited to go back outside and watch Mr. Cheney exit his helicopter, Marine Two, and board Air Force Two via a separate staircase into the front of the plane. Cheney and several additional aides boarded; we were airborne in minutes.

"Wheels up 9:25," I wrote in the pool report. "TVs set to Fox. Flight time to Topeka 2-1/2 hours."

Then they fed us: western omelets with salsa, hash browns, bacon, plain bagels with cream cheese, yogurt and granola parfaits with blueberries and strawberries. And that was after a fruit basket had been passed around. White House travel is known for its plentiful meals and snacks, and I had wisely skipped breakfast at home. (The Monitor will get a considerable bill for the flights and meals later.)

Next up, getting down to business. Lea Anne McBride, Cheney's communications director, came back to talk to the reporters about the speech the vice president would be delivering in Topeka at a fundraiser for Rep. Jim Ryun (R). Cheney was still putting finishing touches on his remarks, but he would focus on the economy and security, with an emphasis on "consequence," she said. The meaning of that last part soon became clear when we received an advance copy of the text: what to expect if the Democrats take control of Congress.

The speech was classic Cheney - red meat for core Republican voters at a time when anxiety is high over the GOP-led Congress's poor public image, the Iraq war, and scandals. Congressman Ryun appears in no danger of losing his seat, but no one's taking any chances.

"If the Democrats take control, American families would face an immense tax increase, and the economy would sustain a major hit," Cheney told the crowd.

If the Democrats were already in control, he warned, the USA Patriot Act, warrantless wiretapping - a program the White House calls the Terrorist Surveillance Program - and the program of detention and military trials would be in jeopardy.

Cheney named names - not just the top Democrats who would lead both houses if their party wins majorities, Nancy Pelosi in the House and Harry Reid in the Senate - but also probable committee chairs.

"I don't need to tell you what kind of legislation would come to us by way of committee chairmen like Joe Biden, Ted Kennedy, John Conyers, Henry Waxman, Barney Frank, or Jay Rockefeller," he said, eliciting boos and then laughter.

It was his 113th campaign appearance in the current two-year election cycle. The event raised $215,000 for Ryun, boosting Cheney's total fundraising for Republican candidates and committees since March 2005 to $40 million.

Speech over, time to sprint to the motorcade, as Cheney was whisked out of the room. Wheels up at 1:15 p.m. central time. On to New Orleans for Cheney's first visit since September 2005, right after hurricane Katrina.

En route, we were fed garden salads with spicy chicken strips and the world's densest brownies. (I wondered if Cheney was eating the same thing, but such detail is not observable. He never emerged from his private cabin during all our time on AF2.) Before long, we landed in New Orleans, where a blast of hot air hit us as we deplaned. We weren't in Kansas anymore.

DOJ_NMG_0082199

On the agenda was a visit to the port and a tour of a tugboat owned by the Canal Barge Company, an example of a New Orleans business that is fully back in operation post-Katrina. Reporters were allowed to jam into the wheelhouse and watch the veep get a tour from the captain - but "don't crowd the vice president," a press aide warned.

Cheney then received a private briefing from the Army Corps of Engineers, after which reporters were treated to what the schedule called a "pool spray" - remarks by Cheney to the press, but no questions. Then it was time for more fundraising. While Cheney went off to a reception for the Republican National Committee (total take $180,000) the press was briefed by Don Powell, federal coordinator of Gulf Coast rebuilding. Briefing over, I had about 10 minutes of "filing time" to submit my second pool report, about enough time to get the computer set up, then packed up to leave. Then it was back to the motorcade, back to the airport, and back to Washington. Jambalaya, corn bread, and cupcakes were on the menu, soon followed by Dove bars (but who could possibly have room?) Wheels down at 9:30 p.m. Eastern time, a half-hour early.

Fabulous, I thought. I can get home in time to tell my kids to go to bed. I start out from Andrews in my '92 Toyota Camry, along with Mike Allen, who is hitching a ride with me back to D.C. After several miles, I sense trouble. The battery light comes on, and I know what's happening: My car is losing power. It dies in a tunnel on Route 295. Long story short, the tow truck arrives at midnight, and Mike, my guardian angel, flags us a cab.

It was a surreal ending to a day of adventure. I'm still not sure if I would describe flying around the country with the vice president as glamorous, but compared with breaking down in a tunnel underneath the Capitol and having to wait two hours for a tow truck, the answer is, absolutely!

Report Indicates Democrats Out-raising In Key House Races (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic candidates out-raised their Republican opponents in nearly half of 27 tossup races for the House from July through September, new campaign finance reports show.

Most of the GOP candidates — 19 — had more cash on hand as of Sept. 30. And as of last week, the Republican Party and its allies were spending more heavily in the 27 districts.

Still, independent analysts called the Democratic surge unusual and said it suggests momentum for Democrats going into the final weeks of the campaign.

“Most of the time the late money follows the winner, and the winner is mostly the incumbent,” said Stuart Rothenberg, who ranked the 27 races in his Rothenberg Political Report. This year, “the smell of Democratic victory is in the air.”

Six Democrats seeking open seats now held by Republicans in Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota and New York raised more money in the third quarter than their opponents. Another six challengers — four in Pennsylvania and one each in North Carolina and Indiana — also pulled in more than their opponents.

Democrats need to add 15 new seats to win a majority and control of the chamber. Republicans are pouring money into dozens of races to keep that from happening.

The National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) has spent $28 million helping candidates in Rothenberg's 27 tossup districts, according to Federal Election Commission reports. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) by contrast has spent $13.8 million.

Data from the non-partisan Campaign Media Analysis Group show a similar imbalance. As of last week, Republican Party committees and their allies had spent at least $16.5 million on TV in the 27 districts. Their Democratic counterparts had spent $10.6 million.

TV spending by the GOP committees and groups had totaled more than $1 million in three tossup districts. The aim was to defend Reps. Jim Gerlach of Pennsylvania and Mike Sodrel of Indiana and help Ohio's Joy Padgett succeed Rep. Bob Ney, who pleaded guilty last week in connection with the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Anthony Corrado, a campaign-finance expert at Colby College, said the large GOP TV buys indicate “they see their candidates as behind.” He said it's unclear whether the heavy spending will do any good: “If the message isn't getting through and moving the poll numbers, the fact that you're spending more money doesn't matter.”

NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the GOP ad campaigns have been effective and cash on hand is the best predictor of success. “It's what you have available to spend in October that's key,” he said.

DCCC spokesman Bill Burton said there would be spending parity up to Election Day and said no amount of money could save some GOP seats. “Some people are so tied to the status quo in Washington that they will not be able to spend their way to victory,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082200

In Close House Races, GOP Incumbents Hold Advantage In Funds (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Despite a rush of campaign donations to Democrats earlier this year, Republican incumbents in highly competitive races in the House have a substantial cash advantage going into the final weeks before the midterm elections.

Democrats spent more heavily over the summer and early autumn than their Republican rivals in pivotal House districts, leaving themselves at a disadvantage of more than 2 to 1 in money on hand, according to a Washington Post analysis of the latest campaign disclosures.

"What this means is that Republicans have the wherewithal to slow down the tide that's been running against them this year," said Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute, which tracks election funding.

To capture control of the House on Nov. 7, Democrats need to gain 15 seats. Analysts in both parties acknowledge that Republicans are virtually certain to lose at least a handful of seats. But whether that number falls short or surpasses the 15-seat threshold, they agree, could hinge on campaign fundamentals such as the amount of money available to candidates.

At the same time, Democrats are on a better financial footing in open seats -- those in which an incumbent is not running. Of the 12 open House races considered tight, Republicans have more cash on hand in seven of them and Democrats are ahead in five, the Post analysis shows.

Election experts noted that funds raised by candidates are only part of the overall picture. This year, in particular, outside groups and the parties have been spending heavily in districts considered up for grabs.

But the cash in candidates' coffers is a significant factor in congressional contests, said Kent Cooper, co-founder of PoliticalMoneyLine.com, a campaign finance Web site. "It's also the best sign we have now" about which candidates hold an edge as the elections near, he said.

The Cook Political Report, a nonpartisan newsletter about elections, identifies 31 House Republicans in closely contested campaigns. According to their financial reports filed over the weekend, they had a total of $32.7 million in cash on hand as of Sept. 30, compared with $14.5 million for their Democratic challengers.

The National Republican Congressional Committee circulated an internal memo yesterday -- which a Republican gave to The Post -- noting that GOP candidates hold an average cash advantage of $450,000 in 25 of the most competitive districts.

In most years, this is not unusual. "Incumbents almost always outraise the challengers," said Anthony J. Corrado, a campaign finance expert at Colby College. But in recent congressional elections, incumbents generally outpaced challengers by more than 2 to 1.

What is notable this year, Corrado said, is that Democratic challengers have enough money to stage full-fledged efforts, and that is one reason the election appears to be so close. "Although they haven't matched the incumbents," he said, "challengers are raising the amounts of money that they need to be competitive."

In Kentucky's 3rd Congressional District, Democrat John Yarmuth has a third of the cash available to five-term incumbent Anne Northup (R), who reported $1.5 million in her latest filing.

"We knew that we were never going to have as much money as a 10-year incumbent," said Jason Burke, Yarmuth's campaign manager. Still, he said, the Yarmuth campaign has enough to advertise intensively through Election Day.

Northup's campaign said her cash advantage amounts to a powerful wall against Yarmuth's candidacy.

"Especially in a media market like Louisville, it's quite expensive to get your message out," said Patrick Neely, Northup's campaign manager. "Having a 3 to 1 financial advantage clearly better enables you to drive your message out, to get your voters to the polls, and to do all the things you need to do to win on Election Day."

The NRCC memo also noted that Republican Peter Roskam has an almost 7 to 1 cash advantage over Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth (D) in Illinois's 6th District, and that Republican Reps. Geoff Davis (Ky.) and E. Clay Shaw Jr. (Fla.) enjoy advantages of about 4 to 1 over their challengers.

The memo played down the cash disadvantages of two Republicans -- Mike Whalen in Iowa and Rep. Charles H. Taylor in North Carolina -- because they are millionaires who can fund their campaigns.

What's more, in Ohio's 18th District, where Rep. Robert W. Ney (R) is stepping down after his guilty plea in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, Republican Joy Padgett has more cash on hand than Democrat Zack Space -- $258,000 to $146,000.

Still, some Democrats in tough contests are financially outrunning GOP incumbents who are not self-funding. As of Sept. 30, Brad Ellsworth had about 50 percent more money at the ready than Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.), and Joseph A. Sestak Jr. had about 38 percent more cash than Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.).

DOJ_NMG_0082201

In the 12 open-seat races that the Cook Political Report labels as close, Democrats had $5.7 million on hand and Republicans had $4.4 million.

The parties are scheduled to release their financial reports at the end of the week. At summer's end, the Republican and Democratic House campaign committees had similar amounts in the bank -- $36 million for the GOP committee and $34.9 million for the Democrats'. The Republican National Committee held an edge of nearly 4 to 1 over the Democratic National Committee in cash on hand -- $39.3 million to $10.9 million, as of Aug. 30.

That disparity at the national committee level -- if it remains about the same -- would give the GOP an additional benefit in the closing days of the campaign.

But Democrats are hoping that the national political environment, which has been hostile to the GOP lately, will mean that they will not need to raise comparable sums to be in the running this fall.

"It's not about total dollars," said Stu Rothenberg, author of a respected political newsletter, the Rothenberg Political Report. "In a wave election like this one, money isn't as important as mood and momentum -- as long as the challenger has enough money to be relevant."

Democrats are hoping such intangibles will hold sway.

"Everyone knew the GOP would be well funded," said Bill Burton, spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "The question is how big does the Republican cash advantage have to be in order to convince voters that they somehow, all of a sudden, actually want to hold on to the status quo in Washington?"

Committee TV Spending Rises (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

Faced with a national political headwind that could produce devastating losses, House Republicans are largely continuing to spend resources to boost the more than two dozen incumbents who appear more vulnerable by the day instead of diverting funds to second- and third-tier races that now look more promising for Democrats.

Committee spending patterns likely will change in the next few days as the final House playing field settles and the two parties continue to play a game of chicken over which races they're prioritizing.

The National Republican Congressional Committee spent $9 million in independent expenditures on Friday — the largest one-day total for the committee this cycle — bringing the total number of races where the committee has invested at least $1 million for the general election to 18.

The NRCC has spent close to $1 million in at least two other contests, and all but one of these 20 seats are currently held by the GOP.

House Democrats, meanwhile, had spent more than $1 million in just three races as of Friday.

While the political committees continue to chart their spending strategy for the final three weeks of the election, newly released Federal Election Commission reports suggest that House Republican candidates in two dozen competitive races find themselves in generally better shape financially than their Democratic opponents.

But the opposite appears to be true in most of the closely watched Senate races of the cycle — where endangered GOP incumbents are lagging behind their challengers on the fundraising front.

House Republicans' biggest investment so far — not counting the special election earlier this year in California's 50th district — has been in Ohio's open 18th district seat, where the NRCC had spent $2.35 million as of Friday to defend the district being vacated by Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), an admitted felon. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had spent almost $900,000 on the race by that same point.

The NRCC had spent $2.24 million on the effort to re-elect Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) as of Friday, making his 6th district race the second-most expensive for the committee.

As of the end of last week, the NRCC had spent more than $7.2 million on four races involving GOP incumbents in Pennsylvania. The committee has spent close to $3 million on three GOP-held seats in Connecticut and $3.4 million defending three Indiana seats.

The NRCC's outlay Friday included more than $5.58 million for ad buys in 12 districts.

While most of the NRCC's ad dollars went to top races in Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Indiana, the committee also spent $350,000 on continuing a media buy to boost the re-election efforts of Rep. J.D. Hayworth (Ariz.), a six-term incumbent whom GOP strategists have portrayed as on solid ground when it comes to his re-election prospects.

The NRCC also spent $571,000 and $311,000 on behalf of Reps. Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.) and Nancy Johnson (Conn.), respectively, two Members who have looked less vulnerable than their home-state colleagues for months. Fitzpatrick was outraised by his opponent, Iraq War veteran Patrick Murphy (D), in the third quarter and had less cash in the bank than the Democrat did on Sept. 30.

DOJ_NMG_0082202

NRCC Communications Director Carl Forti said the committee has not deviated much from the ad time it reserved earlier this year.

"We're basically just implementing the plan that we reserved back in August," he said.

In recent weeks the NRCC has added money to Iowa's 1st district open seat race, while the party is not spending money to save GOP-held open seats in Arizona's 8th district or Colorado's 7th district.

The NRCC has pulled back reserved ad time in Democratic-held districts in Texas, West Virginia, South Carolina and Ohio, all of which have been viewed as longer-shot opportunities for the GOP.

Meanwhile, Democrats have pulled reserved ad time in Colorado, where a competitive challenge to Rep. John Salazar (D) never materialized and Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R) is facing a much more difficult re-election than once expected.

The NRCC has spent close to $1 million to defend Musgrave thus far, while the DCCC has spent just $92,000. But an outside group recently announced an effort to pour at least $720,000 into defeating the sophomore lawmaker and will spend at least $600,000 on TV ads alone.

President Bush won 58 percent in Musgrave's 4th district in 2004.

But the latest example of GOP worries about holding onto traditionally staunchly Republican seats was manifested in a new ad buy this week in Idaho's 1st district, where according to a Democratic source, the NRCC just bought three weeks' worth of TV time to defend an open seat that seemed safely in Republican hands.

Democrats have yet to tip their hand about which second- and third-tier races they might be willing to redirect money to in an effort to force Republicans to spend on them, too.

"We haven't really seen them pop up in anywhere new," Forti said.

But some Republicans concede that Democrats may not have to invest heavily in other districts.

One GOP consultant familiar with fresh polling conducted last week said it showed Republicans in districts across the country in the worst shape yet this cycle.

"If it doesn't get any better than it was last week, it's going to be a bloodbath," the consultant said. "We'll see if it gets worse, or stays the same or gets better."

The DCCC has outspent Republicans in IEs in a handful of competitive contests. The largest disparity has been in Connecticut's 4th district, where Rep. Christopher Shays (R) is battling for re-election against Westport Selectwoman Diane Farrell (D). The NRCC had spent $777,000 while the DCCC had spent a little more than $1 million through Friday.

Republicans have outspent Democrats, however, in the 2nd district of Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.), and both parties have spent comparable amounts in Johnson's contest against state Sen. Chris Murphy (D).

Democrats have also spent more in Indiana's 2nd district, where they are working to defeat Rep. Chris Chocola, and in Kentucky's 4th district, where Rep. Geoff Davis (R) faces a challenge from former Rep. Ken Lucas (D).

National Republicans are no longer spending money on behalf of Chocola, who is personally wealthy.

Meanwhile, both parties are continuing to spend in Indiana's 8th district — which has turned into a marathon spending fight even as Rep. John Hostettler (R-Ind.) continues to appear headed for defeat based on public polling.

The two committees have spent almost $3 million combined on the 8th district race, and one party isn't likely to stop unless the other one does.

In several contests other than Colorado's 4th district, there has been great disparity in party committee spending to this point.

Republicans have spent heavily on the open seat race in Minnesota's 6th district. The NRCC had spent close to $1.5 million on the race as of Friday, while the DCCC had yet to report spending a dime. Democrats, however, are expected to go up on TV airwaves today on behalf of child safety advocate Patty Wetterling (D).

Also, the GOP has spent more than $1.2 million defending the open 6th district seat in Illinois, while the DCCC has spent less than $200,000, but a new ad buy is scheduled to begin this week.

In Georgia, the two committees appear to be spending inversely.

Republicans view the 8th district of Rep. Jim Marshall (D) as the better pickup opportunity, as evidenced by the NRCC's $454,000 investment as of Friday. The DCCC, meanwhile, has spent just $40,000 on the contest.

In Georgia's 12th district, the DCCC has spent $291,000 while the NRCC has spent less than $25,000.

The DCCC is not spending IE money in North Carolina's 11th district because Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.) has donated $1.6 million in personal funds to his campaign. Thus, the "Millionaires' Amendment" allows the committee to spend unlimited coordinated expenditures on behalf of former NFL quarterback Heath Shuler (D). The NRCC spent $876,000 there through Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0082203

While local and national dynamics continue to play out in myriad ways in the two dozen House races currently rated tossups by Roll Call, the Republicans have a distinct financial advantage in many of them.

In the race to replace Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) in a suburban Chicago district, state Sen. Peter Roskam (R) had an almost 8-1 cash on hand advantage over Iraq War veteran Tammy Duckworth (D) as of Sept. 30. But Duckworth outraised Roskam by almost $400,000 from July 1 to Sept. 30, and seems to have bought the bulk of her TV time for the remainder of her campaign by the end of the quarter.

Several vulnerable House Republicans had cash-on-hand advantages of at least 4-1 over their Democratic challengers, including Reps. Steve Chabot (Ohio), Thelma Drake (Va.), Rob Simmons (Conn.), Geoff Davis (Ky.) and Clay Shaw (Fla.).

But Democrats were more enthusiastic about their financial standing in Pennsylvania's 7th district, where retired Navy Adm. Joe Sestak continues to outperform Rep. Curt Weldon (R), and in Minnesota's 6th district, where child safety advocate Patty Wetterling raised an impressive $1.3 million in three months and banked just shy of $1 million.

And in Senate races, several Democratic challengers were doing better than the Republican incumbents.

In Missouri, state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) raised $3 million in the previous quarter, while Sen. Jim Talent (R) took in $1.9 million. In Virginia, former Navy Secretary Jim Webb (D) outraised Sen. George Allen (R) by almost $1 million. In Pennsylvania, state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D) outraised Sen. Rick Santorum (R) and passed the incumbent in cash on hand.

Democratic challengers also outraised incumbents in Rhode Island, Ohio and Montana.

Why Your Vote Doesn't Matter As Much (USAT)

By Ross Baker

USA Today, October 17, 2006

In 1811, Elbridge Gerry, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was serving as governor of Massachusetts as a member of the Democratic-Republican (later the Democratic) Party, which also held the majority in his state's Legislature. Determined to limit the influence of the rival Federalist Party, the Democratic-Republicans in the assembly adopted a new map of Massachusetts' congressional districts after the 1810 Census, a bill that Gerry duly signed.

One district was so bizarrely configured that Gilbert Stuart, the renowned American portraitist, added a few strokes to the outlines of the district on the map so that it resembled a huge clawed amphibian. He showed his changes to the editor of a Boston newspaper and told him, "That will do for a salamander."

The editor retorted, "Call it a gerrymander."

The name stuck, and so did the practice of drawing the boundaries of House districts for the political advantage of one party or the other. It is this venerable bit of political chicanery that will bolster incumbents of both parties and probably limit Democratic gains in the upcoming midterm elections that have historically favored the party out of power. Worse, it places in the hands of a tiny minority of voters in a handful of congressional districts the responsibility for indicating, with their ballots, the direction of the nation over the next two years.

In the past, midterm elections have meant trouble for the president's party, especially for those that took place during inconclusive or stalemated wars such as the present conflict in Iraq. Back in 1918 and up until 1950, wartime presidents who could not hold out to voters the key to military victory have seen their party's numbers in Congress plummet. Even in the absence of conflict, these elections have served as a kind of referendum on presidential performance between presidential elections.

In the most recent midterm elections, however, the political auguries have been tougher to read. In 1998, Bill Clinton's Democrats actually gained a few seats, as did George W. Bush's GOP in 2002. The once-powerful referendum effect of midterm elections in which the president's party pays dearly for its shortcomings has given way to minuscule losses and trifling gains that can be interpreted many ways.

One cause of this deflation in turnover in House seats is the ancient art of gerrymandering and the enormous advantage it confers, mostly on incumbent members. So even if a majority of voters in the Pennsylvania district of Rep. John Murtha, an outspoken anti-war Democrat, were to oppose his plan for withdrawal from Iraq, it is doubtful that he would suffer defeat.

If gerrymandering has been around for such a long time, why are its most extreme effects being felt only now? Three reasons:

•Mapping. The art of cramming friendly voters into the district of a member of Congress and producing for him or her a guaranteed safe margin of victory through the use of ingenious computer-mapping programs has become the new political alchemy.

DOJ_NMG_0082204

•Connecting. The mapping of districts, by itself, would probably be enough to hold down the loss rate among sitting House members. But these incumbents have also become so skillful at connecting to their constituents that even though voters hold in contempt Congress as an institution, they rarely reject their own representatives.

•Cultivating. The incumbents are also helped by the fact that House members do a good job of cultivating the state legislators who draw the boundaries and are supreme in their fundraising abilities.

A few months ago, Democrats were beguiled by the iridescent dream that the elections of 2006 would be a rerun of the 1994 GOP landslide, except this time, the result would favor them. But 1994 was an exceptional year because of the large number of open seats. Almost one-quarter of all House seats were up for grabs, including several vacated by House members who decided to retire. A large number of these were conservative Democrats whose districts easily fell into Republican hands, thus accounting for the 54-seat Democratic loss to the GOP.

This year, there is no mass departure, and many experts put the number of competitive seats (those that either party has an equal chance of winning) at no more than 40 of the 435 seats in the House.

Scientific gerrymandering, and the astute use of other advantages that accrue to incumbents, have resulted in an electoral sea wall around the House of Representatives that can withstand all but the most powerful political tsunamis.

This year, it appears that only the gentlest tides will be lapping against this redoubt, and even though Democrats need only a 15-seat gain to recapture the House, such a narrow majority would carry no mandate.

These contests, moreover, have evolved into meaningless ratification of incumbents in the vast majority of districts.

With further refinements in computer mapping, there is every reason to believe that the battleground will shrink still further and that control of the House and the indicative value of House elections will be the privilege of a minuscule percentage of the American electorate.

Handicapping Long Shots And Late Shots (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

If you make your living as a political analyst and handicapper (and the odds are very good that you don't), you're facing an interesting dilemma right about now. Do you add every possible House upset race that you can think of to your list of competitive races, or do you keep your list as small as possible, listing only those races that you truly believe might flip in November?

If you add longer-shot races to your list, you minimize the chance that you "miss" a race that changes party control. That's good, since it's always better to look brilliant than appear even a little clueless. But if you do that, you also give credence to long-shot candidates who probably won't flip a seat. And worse, you flirt with intellectual dishonesty.

In the past, I invariably added races about which I was skeptical, preferring to have too many races on my list rather than not enough.

This year, with a Democratic wave brewing, the handicapping problem is particularly acute. Given that waves are inherently unpredictable and likely to sweep in at least one or two candidates who should have no chance of winning — look no further than Republican Steve Stockman, who toppled House Judiciary Chairman Jack Brooks (D-Texas) in 1994 — I'm tempted to add anyone who could possibly ride a wave to victory. It's the easy way out, and I've always taken that route in the past.

But I've decided that I won't do it this year — at least not yet. I won't add Reps. Scott Garrett (R) in New Jersey's 5th district, Mark Souder (R) in Indiana's 3rd, Jim Ryun (R) in Kansas' 2nd, Cathy McMorris (R) in Washington's 5th or other potentially threatened Republicans just because their Democratic opponents have an allegedly encouraging poll or are up with TV ads. While I can't completely rule out the possibility that some or all of them could drown in a Democratic tsunami, I believe the chances are so small that I can't bring myself to put them on a list of endangered incumbents. As I said, at least not yet.

Take Garrett. His opponent, Paul Aronsohn, distributed a polling memo, based on an initial March survey and a late-September poll, that alleged his race against Garrett was "tightening up" and that a Democratic victory was "very possible."

But New Jersey's 5th district, represented by Garrett, is a Republican-leaning district that gave President Bush 57 percent of the vote in 2004. In 2002, Garrett drew almost 60 percent in an open-seat victory against a credible Democrat who outspent him, and two years later he won re-election with almost 59 percent.

Aronsohn's own polling shows the Republican generic vote advantage has been cut in half, but it still stands at 7 points — a significant edge. Then there is the trial heat, which shows Garrett's 25-point advantage in March having closed to 16 points in late September. But those surveys also show that Garrett's share of the ballot test has remained unchanged at 49 percent of the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0082205

Even though the Republican "generic" number has slipped, and even though the "wrong track" number and President Bush's job approval rating have eroded, Garrett's trial heat number has remained the same, just a whisker under the 50 percent mark.

Sure, the ballot test in the poll has tightened, but only because some of the undecided voters went over to Aronsohn, whose share of the vote went from an anemic 24 percent in March to an only somewhat less anemic 33 percent at the end of September.

I can't say with absolute certainty that Aronsohn can't, or won't, beat Garrett next month, only that the chances seem so small that rating the race as competitive seems misleading. If, barring other evidence of an Aronsohn surge before Election Day, the Democrat does win, it will be a jaw-dropping upset, and I won't mind missing it.

The situation is a bit different, but only a bit, in Colorado's 5th district, where a media poll shows a dead heat between Democrat Jay Fawcett and Republican Doug Lamborn for the open seat of retiring GOP Rep. Joel Hefley.

This is a solid Republican district in which Bush drew 66 percent in 2004 and 63 percent in 2000. Recent party registration figures show an advantage for the GOP of 100,000 registered voters — 189,942 Republicans (46 percent), 89,182 Democrats (22 percent) and 132,606 independents (32 percent).

Like New Jersey's 5th district, one public poll alleges that the race is competitive, but here it's an independent Mason-Dixon survey. Moreover, Republicans had a bitter primary and have not united since. All of those circumstances argue for including the race on a list of competitive contests, at least for the moment.

But if you are a Democratic partisan looking for a way for Democrats to net 40 or 50 seats, don't kid yourself. The fundamentals of Colorado's 5th are so terrible for Democrats that it's hard to believe Fawcett will win. Lamborn certainly created enemies within his own party, but he can afford to lose a bunch of them, given his edge in party registration.

For Democrats, the more interesting long shots may include Rep. Melissa Hart (R-Pa.), whose 4th district gave Bush 54 percent of the vote in 2004 and 52 percent four years earlier. Or Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R), who represents a competitive district in southeastern Minnesota. A true national wave could hit hard in districts like those, creating opportunities that Democrats ought not have in a normal year. That's why both of these races now are on my list of Democratic challenges to watch.

I expect a major surprise or two on election night, with an unheralded Democrat or two pulling off an upset, possibly in a rock-ribbed Republican district. I'll try not to miss that race, but I won't be embarrassed if I do.

In Senate Fund Drive, Democrats Are Ahead (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Senate Republicans were outraised by Democratic opponents in key races in third-quarter fund-raising, setting the stage for a competitive campaign stretch.

In Virginia, a string of incidents raising questions about the ethnic sensitivity of incumbent Republican Sen. George Allen appeared to take a toll. Mr. Allen reported raising $1.94 million in the quarter ended Sept. 30 compared with $3.3 million raised by his Democratic challenger Jim Webb.

In Missouri, Democrat Claire McCaskill outraised Republican Sen. Jim Talent by about $1 million. Mr. Talent reported $4.2 million still in the bank, while Ms. McCaskill reported $246,000 in cash on hand after a major final television ad buy.

Democrat Bob Casey reported raising $3.94 million in his campaign to unseat Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Rick Santorum. The Santorum camp reported having $3.6 million in the bank at the end of September; Mr. Casey reported $3.7 million.

Not all incumbents showed weakness, however. Republican Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine collected $2.9 million compared with $2.7 million raised by his challenger, Rep. Sherrod Brown.

Lieberman Likes Bolton For UN Job (NYDN)

By Helen Kennedy

New York Daily News, October 17, 2006

Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman yesterday endorsed controversial Bush appointee John Bolton for a permanent slot at the United Nations - putting him at odds once again with Democrats, including his Senate colleague Chris Dodd.

Dodd (D-Conn.) is the leading critic of Bolton, the controversial envoy President Bush sent to the UN on a temporary ambassadorship after Democrats and some key Republicans balked at nominating him.

"I see no reason not to be for Bolton," Lieberman told a meeting of the Daily News Editorial Board.

"Based on his capabilities - and now based on his performance - I believe Bolton is well-qualified," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082206

"I think he's been a good negotiator and a good spokesman. He deserves to have a vote. I think he deserves to be confirmed."

Bolton's recess appointment expires at the end of the year, and he will need Senate approval to remain as UN ambassador.

Lieberman had not publicly taken a position on Bolton before.

Lieberman's support for Bush's foreign policies lost him the Democratic primary in Connecticut. He is now running for reelection as an independent and has a comfortable lead in polls.

Dodd, who is campaigning for the Democratic candidate, Ned Lamont, had led the fight against nominating Bolton and remains his fiercest critic, saying his performance at the UN so far merits "a failing grade."

In a blistering Senate speech last month listing what he called Bolton's failures, Dodd said, "My objection isn't that he is a bully, but that he's been a very ineffective bully - he can't win the day when it really counts."

In 2nd Debate, Whitehouse, Chafee Return To Familiar Themes (BOS/AP)

By Michelle R. Smith

The Boston Globe, October 17, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I. --Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee and his Democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse tangled over corruption, independence and the Republican Senate on Monday in their second radio debate.

"The Bush administration has been a disaster for America and a disaster for Rhode Island," Whitehouse said.

Chafee said Whitehouse's record as a former state attorney general and U.S. attorney was one of "incompetence and willful blindness."

The conversation continued the themes the candidates have focused on in recent days, with Chafee assailing Whitehouse's record as a prosecutor and saying he ignored corruption by friends of powerful Democrats, and Whitehouse tying Chafee to President Bush and the "Republican agenda."

The latest polls have showed Whitehouse apparently leading Chafee, who is still recovering from an expensive primary against Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey. National Democrats hope winning the seat will help them take back control of the Senate, and they've been running TV ads since last month's primary.

The hour-long debate was broadcast on WHJJ-AM from in front of a live audience at Rhode Island College. Their first TV debate was scheduled for Thursday evening on WPRI-TV.

Whitehouse on Monday continued to press his central campaign theme: that a vote for Chafee amounts to a vote for Republicans and Bush, both unpopular in Rhode Island.

"We have a chance to put a Democratic Senate in place, and a Democratic Senate can stop the nonsense," Whitehouse said, adding "We need a change in leadership."

Chafee, one of the most liberal Republicans in the Senate, has run on his record of clashing with fellow Republicans, including Bush, and has emphasized his credentials as an independent thinker, saying Monday that he "has the guts to make the tough decisions."

In recent days, including in the candidates' first debate Friday, Chafee has tried to shift the focus to Whitehouse's record as the state's top prosecutor, saying Whitehouse had not done enough to go after public corruption when it involved Democrats.

"He did not want to step on the toes of his friends," Chafee said Monday, adding, "It's a record of continued incompetence as attorney general and U.S. attorney."

Whitehouse responded by saying that when he departed his job as U.S. attorney, he was thanked by the staff for "solid gold leadership" with a plaque presented to him by Chafee's brother, Zechariah, who also worked in the U.S. attorney's office.

Darrell West, a political science professor at Brown University, said Chafee's focus may not gain traction with voters.

"I think when you're running for the Senate, voters are going to be much more attuned to national rather than local issues," West said. "This is an era when there are big things on the agenda, like the war and the economy."

Both Chafee and Whitehouse oppose the war in Iraq. Chafee was the lone Republican senator to vote against authorizing the war, and pointed out again Monday that Democrats controlled the majority in the Senate when it voted to authorize war.

However, they disagree on what to do now, with Whitehouse calling for a timetable to withdraw troops and Chafee saying he supports a plan to eventually pull out -- but not a specific timetable.

"It's a quagmire. We have tremendous challenges, there's no doubt about that," Chafee said. "Our best formula is to work with the countries around Iraq."

They also both support legalizing gay marriage and abortion rights and oppose Bush's tax cuts.

"We're going to be years digging out from George Bush's deficits," Whitehouse said.

DOJ_NMG_0082207

Among those who attended the debate were Joseph Robert Fontes Jr., 52, a Whitehouse volunteer who worked and voted for Chafee when he first ran for election in 2000. Chafee was appointed to the seat in 1999 upon the death of his father, John Chafee, who served more than 20 years in the Senate.

Fontes, an unemployed inventor of golf clubs and a registered Democrat, described both candidates as good men, but said the country needs a change.

"Republicans have mismanaged the budget, they've mismanaged the war," he said. "A year from today, I hope the country's in better shape."

Chafee, Whitehouse Debate Along Familiar Lines (PROJO)

By Steve Peoples

The Providence Journal, October 17, 2006

A live radio debate this afternoon between the two candidates for U.S. Senate in Rhode Island was largely civil -- and largely repetitive.

As he has done for months, Democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse did his best to connect his opponent to the Republican Party and President Bush. "We need a new direction in Washington...To change America, we have to change the Senate," Whitehouse said.

And as he has done since winning the Republican primary, Sen. Lincoln Chafee downplayed his ties to the GOP, highlighting his character and his ability to work with people from both parties. "Senator Chafee has the guts to make tough decisions," he said.

Chafee added that it would work to Rhode Island's advantage to have at least one member of its Congressional delegation be in the party in power. Rhode Island's three other delegates to Congress are Democrats.

"Not only have I voted my conscience time and time again, but I've also delivered for Rhode Island," Chafee said.

The race is being watched nationally as Democrats look to regain the majority in Congress.

Chafee did his best to turn the debate to local issues and Whitehouse's actions as a former U.S. attorney in Rhode Island, compared to Whitehouse's repeated efforts to focus on the direction of the country and other national issues such as health care and Iraq.

Chafee sharply criticized Whitehouse's record as U.S. attorney, alleging he failed to pursue charges related to political corruption while in office. "Mr. Whitehouse is guilty of willful blindness" in not pursuing an investigation, Chafee said. "He did not want to step on the toes of his friends."

Again and again, Whitehouse focused on the national implications of the election.

"The Bush administration has been a disaster for America and a disaster for Rhode Island," Whitehouse said. "We have a chance to put a Democratic Senate in place, and a Democratic Senate can stop the nonsense."

Today's debate was held at WHJJ, 920 AM. Radio host Arlene Violet moderated.

Whitehouse and Chafee will meet this Thursday night for their first televised debate. The Providence Journal and WPRI-TV, Channel 12, are co-sponsoring the hour-long debate, which will air live from Warwick's Toll Gate High School at 7 p.m. on WPRI.

The general election is Nov. 7, about three weeks away.

Allen Touts Conservative Record, Ideas (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

Virginia Sen. George Allen yesterday said that he will be re-elected by sticking to conservative issues, even as national liberals are funneling cash to his Democratic opponent and linking the senator to an unpopular president.

On Thursday, Mr. Allen will appear with President Bush to refuel his campaign coffers in an effort to counter Democrat James H. Webb Jr.'s robust fundraising and to rally his anti-tax and socially conservative base.

"If it's based on issues, stands on issues, solutions, ideas and a proven record of performance, I think we're going to win," Mr. Allen, a Republican, told editors and reporters at The Washington Times. "The people of Virginia know me as a senator and as a governor."

The first-term senator said that he wants to make the president's tax cuts permanent and expressed support for privately managed health savings accounts and opposition to activist judges. Mr. Allen was scheduled to appear last night in a two-minute statewide campaign commercial with Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner.

Mr. Webb's call for "more revenue" because of the billions of dollars being spent on the war in Iraq is a "code word for raising taxes," said Mr. Allen, adding that holding the line on taxes is "one of the most salient issues in our campaign."

DOJ_NMG_0082208

Mr. Webb supports rolling back some of Mr. Bush's tax credits for the wealthy, giving a 5 percent tax break for military veterans who serve honorably and extending tax cuts for Virginia's families, such as the college-tuition tax credit. "Any tax breaks that benefit a large section of the American people, I am for," the Democratic challenger said last week.

A former Navy secretary under President Reagan, Mr. Webb has not yet accepted an invitation to be interviewed at The Times.

Mr. Allen once held a commanding lead in his re-election bid and seemed poised for a 2008 White House bid.

However, polls show that Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb are nearly tied in a race that could determine the control of the Senate come Nov. 7. Stars of both parties are crossing the Potomac River and bringing national money to both men.

Mr. Webb has benefited from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee's $1 million ad attacking Mr. Allen and from fundraisers hosted by prominent senators such as Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, John Kerry of Massachusetts and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Former President Bill Clinton will headline a high-dollar fundraiser in McLean for Mr. Webb on the same night that Mr. Bush is scheduled to appear at the Science Museum of Virginia in Richmond for Mr. Allen.

Mr. Bush's approval rating in Virginia is in the low 40s, and Mr. Webb reminds voters at every stop that Mr. Allen has supported the president 97 percent of the time in general and 100 percent of the time on foreign policy.

"The president is welcome in Virginia," Mr. Allen said yesterday. "We hope it's a good fundraiser for us. We need the funds to battle the national liberal Democrats."

When asked, Mr. Allen said that he has disagreed with Mr. Bush on immigration reform, education and the nomination of Harriet Miers as a U.S. Supreme Court justice.

The president's No Child Left Behind Act forces Virginia to "dumb down" its Standards of Learning, which were created when Mr. Allen was governor, the senator said.

Mr. Allen also said that he learned too late about the real cost of Mr. Bush's Medicare prescription-drug program, which he supported with the intent of helping the frail afford prescriptions.

"Clearly, the facts were not accurate," he said.

Mr. Allen said that he and Mr. Warner, a fellow Republican and Virginia's senior senator, agree on the fundamentals when it comes to the war in Iraq. Most notably, the two senators say that the country cannot become a haven for terrorists.

"It hasn't gone as well as I wish it had gone," Mr. Allen said yesterday.

Like Mr. Webb, Mr. Allen yesterday said that he is comfortable with women's roles in the military.

The issue has lingered, in part, because of an Allen television ad that criticizes Mr. Webb for writing a 1979 magazine article questioning a woman's place in the military. Mr. Webb apologized for the article's tone and stressed that he opened more operational jobs to women than any other Navy secretary.

As of Oct. 1, Mr. Allen had $5.5 million in cash on hand and Mr. Webb $2.7 million, according to campaign finance disclosures.

Ex-Gov. Warner Puts Weight Behind Webb (WT/AP)

By Matthew Barakat

The Washington Times-AP, October 17, 2006

Virginia's two most popular politicians jumped full-bore into the state's Senate campaign yesterday, with former Gov. Mark Warner promising to do all he can to get Democrat James H. Webb Jr. elected and U.S. Sen. John W. Warner making a joint televised appearance with Republican Sen. George Allen.

The two Warners are not related.

Mark Warner, who surprised political observers Friday by forgoing an anticipated run for the presidency, campaigned yesterday with Mr. Webb at a Fairfax County retirement community and said many more joint appearances are forthcoming.

"I'll have a little more time now to campaign with him,"Mr. Warner said, referring to his aborted presidential bid. "I'm going to put all my energy behind this effort."

In particular, the former governor said he would campaign with fellow Democrat Mr. Webb in Southside and Southwest Virginia -- two parts of the state where Mr. Warner has worked for years to build up credibility with conservative voters there.

Mr. Warner left office in January with approval ratings above 70 percent. Perhaps the only Virginia politician who rivals Mr. Warner's popularity is Sen. Warner, a Republican who won re-election in 2002 with 83 percent of the vote.

Mr. Allen for the second time in his campaign purchased a two-minute block at 7:58 p.m. yesterday in all of Virginia's broadcast markets -- this time for a taped joint appearance with Sen. Warner.

DOJ_NMG_0082209

Still, Mr. Webb yesterday called Sen. Warner a friend and said he thinks his positions hold more in common with Sen. Warner than Mr. Allen's.

Mr. Webb noted that Sen. Warner recently offered a sober assessment of the situation in Iraq and said the Bush administration might need to consider a "change of course" if the Iraqi government cannot stabilize the situation in the next few months. Mr. Webb has consistently criticized Mr. Bush's move to invade Iraq and his handling of the war and subsequent occupation.

Mr. Webb also cited Sen. Warner's support for embryonic stem-cell research, which Mr. Allen has opposed.

"It seems like Senator Warner's positions are actually closer to Jim Webb than to George Allen," Mr. Warner told reporters.

Mr. Allen's campaign did not immediately return calls yesterday afternoon seeking comment.

Mr. Webb and Mr. Warner fielded questions yesterday at a town-hall forum in Greenspring Village, a well-heeled retirement community of nearly 2,000 that is its own voting precinct and routinely has among the highest voter turnouts in the state. Last year, Democrat Timothy M. Kaine carried the precinct by about 20 points, similar to his margin of victory in the rest of Fairfax County.

Most of the questions from the audience of nearly 300 were about Iraq.

When one resident asked if Mr. Webb would impeach Mr. Bush, Mr. Webb responded that he would do "everything in my power to bring accountability to what has happened on a variety of fronts in this administration." When the resident pointed out that Mr. Webb did not answer the question, Mr. Webb simply smiled in response.

Most but not all in attendance were supportive of Mr. Webb.

Suri Khanna, 70, a native of India, said before the event that he supports Mr. Allen in part because of his support of the Indian-American community on issues like visas for high-tech workers. He described as overblown the "macaca" incident, in which Mr. Allen used what is sometimes regarded as an ethnic slur against a Webb campaign staffer of Indian descent.

After yesterday's forum, Mr. Khanna said he heard nothing from Mr. Webb to change his mind.

"On Iraq, Webb wants to do exactly what Bush is doing," Mr. Khanna said, referring to Mr. Webb's reluctance to immediately pull troops out of Iraq.

Recent polls show the contest between Mr. Allen ahead by between two and 4.7 percentage points.

Boxing's King Throws Jabs For Steele, GOP (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

Boxing promoter Don King yesterday campaigned with Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in Prince George's County and Baltimore, telling black voters to support Mr. Steele's U.S. Senate candidacy even though he is a Republican.

"For black people, there can't be a fealty to party. That's not fidelity to truth," said Mr. King, a Republican.

With his trademark hair standing straight up, Mr. King appeared with Mr. Steele at a cafe in Largo Town Center and then on a street corner in West Baltimore. The two then visited a youth boxing center.

Mr. King criticized the state Democratic Party for not promoting black leaders.

"You don't have any black faces on the Democratic ticket," Mr. King said. "John Kennedy said sometimes party loyalty asks too much."

The Democratic nominees for the top four statewide races -- governor, Senate, attorney general and comptroller -- are all white men. Delegate Anthony G. Brown, the Democratic nominee for lieutenant governor, is black.

Mr. Steele is the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-to-1.

Black political, business and religious leaders have noted growing discontent among black voters, who compose about 40 percent of registered Democrats and have been the party's most loyal voting bloc.

Mr. Steele seized on that sentiment yesterday at the cafe in Largo. He displayed a recent photograph of his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, campaigning with Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts and House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland. All three are white men.

"I see the leadership that's sitting down at the table to talk about the future. I don't see us represented," Mr. Steele said to the predominantly black audience of about 40 people. "You are at my table, friends."

A Cardin spokesman did not respond to a request for comment.

Mr. Cardin's primary criticism of Mr. Steele has been that the lieutenant governor was recruited by President Bush and supports the president's policies.

Mr. King, who campaigned for Mr. Bush in 2004, yesterday said that he "loves" the president for promoting blacks to top spots within his administration.

"I love George Walker Bush for what he did symbolically," Mr. King said.

Mr. King rose to fame and fortune by promoting boxers such as Muhammad Ali and Mike Tyson, but also has had legal troubles that include a manslaughter conviction, for which he served four years in prison. He referred to his checkered past yesterday.

"I must have an indictments list longer than his awards list," Mr. King said, comparing himself with Mr. Steele.

Racial politics in Maryland has focused on the Democratic efforts to secure support among blacks and Mr. Steele's ability to thwart those efforts.

For instance, hip-hop mogul Russell Simmons, who has supported Democratic candidates and causes, endorsed Mr. Steele in August and has appeared with him in campaign ads.

Republican lawmakers in rural parts of Maryland yesterday said that Mr. King's endorsement of Mr. Steele will not turn off white voters.

"[Mr. King] is a successful guy in a very iffy sport," said Delegate Richard A. Sossi, Eastern Shore Republican. "I don't think that's going to be a big issue one way or the other."

Delegate Anthony J. O'Donnell, Southern Maryland Republican, said Mr. Steele "appeals to a broad spectrum of people."

"I represent a very conservative district, and my district loves Michael Steele," Mr. O'Donnell said. "It's a good thing. It may help us get over some of this trash that's been out there for decades."

Senate Hopes To Hinge On Corruption Charges In N.J. (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

One of an occasional series

The same Democratic leaders who have long hoped to regain control of Congress by blasting a Republican "culture of corruption" are in danger of losing their shot at the Senate because of accusations of corruption against Sen. Robert Menendez.

What was expected to be an easy win for Democrats has become one of the nation's most hotly contested Senate races.

Mr. Menendez, New Jersey Democrat, has been plagued by news reports that he's under federal investigation for a long-standing rental deal with a nonprofit group that received millions in federal funding while he was a House member.

His Republican opponent, Tom Kean Jr., has hammered the Democratic incumbent in negative ads. And the criticism increased last month after the Philadelphia Inquirer reported a taped conversation in which a Menendez ally told a government contractor that he would have "protection" if he hired a doctor with ties to Mr. Menendez.

Democrats say they're not surprised by the Republican focus on accusations of corruption but say Mr. Menendez will win anyway by linking Mr. Kean to President Bush. Polls show that Mr. Bush is unpopular in this liberal state, where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans.

"We are confident Bob Menendez is going to be elected," said Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "Tom Kean is a George Bush clone."

The lesser evil

Political observers say the outcome depends on whether voters here get angrier about Mr. Bush and the Iraq war or about state corruption.

"Is this going to be a national referendum or is it going to be a statewide referendum on state corruption?" said New Jersey Republican political consultant Mark Campbell. "If this is national, Menendez wins; if this is a statewide election on the need for reform ... Tom Kean Jr. wins."

"People deserve to know if their senator is the only senator under federal criminal investigation," Mr. Kean said as he took a break Oct. 8 from shaking hands with the tailgating crowd at Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J.

A Quinnipiac University poll taken Oct. 4 to 10 found 49 percent of likely voters support Mr. Menendez and 45 percent back Mr. Kean. It also found that 57 percent of voters feel the ethics questions about Mr. Menendez are serious.

One of Mr. Kean's latest ads plays part of the 1999 taped conversation in which Menendez adviser Donald Scarinci asks a contractor -- acting as an FBI informant -- to rehire a doctor as a "favor" to Mr. Menendez. The ad says kickback schemes and federal probes are "what you get with Bob Menendez."

In another ad, Mr. Kean promises to free New Jersey from the "clutch of corruption." And yesterday, the 38-year-old state senator cited a press report that Mr. Menendez tried to help a convicted felon transfer to a prison closer to his family.

Mr. Menendez, 52, was appointed in January to fill the Senate seat vacated when Democratic Sen. Jon Corzine was elected governor.

DOJ_NMG_0082211

The Democrat said he's being attacked "viciously and falsely" and has repeatedly said he's not under federal investigation, although Republicans note that he told ABC last month that "we welcome" such a probe.

Mr. Menendez has hit back at Mr. Kean with ethics charges of his own. He ran an ad blasting Mr. Kean's campaign for contacting a jailed felon to dig up dirt for the race.

And he charged yesterday that Mr. Kean should be investigated for having a fundraiser with executives from UnitedHealth, which is burdened by a stock-option scandal. Mr. Kean's father sits on the company's board, but the Republican's camp said there was no impropriety and accused Mr. Menendez of making "a baseless attack."

Guilt by geography

Mr. Menendez is a former mayor of Union City with political roots in Hudson County, which has a statewide reputation for corruption. He recently complained to the Associated Press that he's tired of being labeled "guilty by geography."

But in a state where Democrat Sen. John Kerry got 53 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential election, the Senate race is too close to call, and New Jersey Republican lobbyist Michael Torpey said, "The issue of corruption is clearly resonating with people."

That resonance surprises some observers.

"It's hard for me to see how the race turns on ethics," said Rutgers political science professor Cliff Zukin.

Some N.J. voters seem indifferent to the ethics issue, while others are clearly turned off. New Jersey Democratic lobbyist Rick Thigpen said Republicans may be running a negative campaign in order to turn off voters and keep turnout low, which would benefit Mr. Kean in this Democrat-heavy state.

"Everybody's disgusted with all of them," said Pat Resciniti, 51, a Bloomfield resident who watched Mr. Menendez and other politicians march by in the Nutley Columbus Day Parade and insisted that she won't vote.

What's in a name?

Democrats contend that the race has been close not because of ethics concerns but because Mr. Menendez was widely unknown outside of his congressional district while Mr. Kean began with the most popular name in New Jersey politics.

That's shifting though, they say, citing recent polls giving Mr. Menendez a slight edge as proof voters are responding to the message that he's the one who will truly fight Mr. Bush -- especially on Iraq.

"Obviously, our message is piercing through," Mr. Menendez said after shaking hands Oct. 8 at a Fort Lee community picnic for senior citizens.

Mr. Kean began this race with five years' experience in the state House and state Senate and a family name that evokes memories of the most popular New Jersey governor in recent history.

Tom Kean Sr. is known for his bipartisanship during his governorship and in his more recent role as chairman of the September 11 commission.

"There's a huge allegiance, despite everything, to his dad," said Maria Ramos, 36, a Belleville resident who favors Mr. Menendez.

In speeches, Mr. Kean repeatedly cites both his father and grandfather, a former New Jersey congressman. The Republican has billed himself as a reformer and tried to distance himself from Mr. Bush -- saying he disagrees with the president on stem-cell research, spending and the environment, but agrees with him on permanent tax cuts and anti-terrorism efforts.

Patrick Buldo, 61, of Belleville said he likes what he hears from Mr. Kean and will probably vote for him.

"We need some new blood out there, and his father was good," he said.

Mr. Kean, however, has had to walk a fine line since top Republican stars such as first lady Laura Bush have come to the state to campaign for him.

On the war, Mr. Kean has called for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to resign but doesn't support a strict timeline for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq -- which Mr. Menendez voted for.

Mr. Menendez, who says he is "proud" that he voted against authorizing the use of force in Iraq, repeatedly emphasizes his opposition to Mr. Bush and the war.

The Democrat has tried to steer the debate back to issues where he arguably has the advantage in New Jersey, recently distributing an e-mail video clip of Mr. Kean being confronted by the angry mother of a soldier.

"Tom Kean Jr. fails the test of character when it comes to his support of President Bush's failed war in Iraq," the e-mail said. His newest ad also charges that a vote for the Republican is "just another vote for Bush's agenda."

"George Bush is one of the biggest assets Menendez has," said Mr. Thigpen, who predicts Mr. Menendez will win.

"When he gets to the Senate, he'll just be a rubber stamp," Becky Redington, a 62-year-old Menendez supporter from Montclair said of Mr. Kean.

The security issue

DOJ_NMG_0082212

The Quinnipiac poll found that 63 percent of New Jersey voters disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq and 57 percent disapprove of Mr. Bush as president.

Yet, New Jersey voters are also concerned about anti-terrorism efforts because residents had front-row seats to the September 11 attacks and lost many of their own. Some Republicans say the security issue is why Mr. Bush did better in New Jersey in 2004, improving from 2000, when he got just 40 percent of the vote against Democratic candidate Al Gore.

Both Senate candidates strongly advocated enactment of all the September 11 commission's recommendations, and Mr. Menendez has cited his efforts to prevent a Dubai-based firm from taking over some operations at the port of Newark.

Yet New Jersey voters clearly separate September 11 from the Iraq war effort, Mr. Campbell said. The Republican consultant said a "schism" emerges because top Republicans consistently link the two issues.

The New Jersey race has drawn national attention because a loss by Mr. Menendez would all but doom Democratic efforts to capture the U.S. Senate. That factor has attracted star Democrats like former President Bill Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama to campaign for Mr. Menendez, focusing on opposition to Mr. Bush.

As Mr. Menendez worked the crowd at the Fort Lee seniors' picnic, Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg stood on stage criticizing Mr. Bush's Social Security plan, the war in Iraq, tax cuts, and prescription-drug plan.

"To give [Mr. Bush] a majority in the House and Senate would be a big mistake," the New Jersey Democrat told the seniors, some of whom yelled out their agreement. "I'm here to plead with you -- think of what happens if Bob Menendez doesn't win."

That message clearly got through to some.

"The reason I'm set on Menendez is because he's a Democrat," Lila Breslow, 75, said after the picnic, holding the crockpot she won in a raffle. "I prefer the Democrats to Bush."

The Columnist Who Shut Up To Speak Out (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

CLEVELAND At a lively Democratic gathering in a nearby suburb, Senate candidate Sherrod Brown is talking up his wife to the party faithful. He says, as he always does in this part of Ohio, that the crowd probably already knows Connie Schultz as a prizewinning newspaper columnist.

As the seven-term congressman praises her "terrific sacrifice" in giving up the column in the Plain Dealer during the campaign, a spirited voice calls out from the back, "Just win, honey!"

That would be Schultz, who less than a year after winning a Pulitzer Prize tucked away her pen and pad to support her husband in the toughest race of his career -- and one of the most important, most intense, most eyeballed matches of the 2006 campaign season.

The campaign role is new to her. So, for practical purposes, is the marriage. Schultz and Brown met in 2003 when each was long divorced. Now, barely on opposite sides of 50, they are learning to be political partners amid the friction and heat of a grueling race. As friend Jackie Cassara put it, "Why don't you just put them in a centrifuge and spin vigorously?"

Brown is surrendering a safe seat in Congress after seven terms to challenge Sen. Mike DeWine, a two-term Republican incumbent with a campaign treasury that stretches from Cincinnati to Toledo. Schultz is giving up the comfort and satisfaction of her freewheeling newspaper voice.

Some days, the blessing is decidedly mixed. As she arrived to speak to a crowd of 430 retirees at United Auto Workers Local 1250, the union president made a pitch for Brown's candidacy. He then turned to her and said, "I believe he's sent his lovely wife. Connie, is it?"

"The hardest thing," she says, "is I'm always talking for my husband."

Brown, 53, is a doctor's son schooled at Yale. Schultz, 49, is a maintenance man's daughter who became her family's first college graduate. Yet with their progressive philosophy, their passion for the underdog and their gregarious flesh-pressing, there is no mistaking that they are a matched set.

There are plenty of similarities in their rhetoric, too. Schultz, for instance, has publicly accused DeWine of lying about her husband's record and "betraying the working families he was supposed to serve."

Their collective decision to challenge DeWine, a family values conservative with an agreeable public persona in a state long dominated by Republicans, is the biggest political risk of their professional lives. Brown initially said he would not run, because of family concerns.

"I was really the holdout," Schultz says. "We were in a very new marriage. I was not a political spouse. I knew how you could blow a marriage."

DOJ_NMG_0082213

As they talked, and talked, she came to see that Brown needed to enter the race or forever regret it. As she puts it, "The stars had aligned, and I was going to be the big, fat moon in the way."

Once Brown entered the race, it was only a question of time before Schultz would quit her column. For reasons of newspaper ethics and spousal devotion -- who would make sure there were mango slices and carrots in Brown's campaign car? -- Schultz realized in February that the time had come.

This would be an adventure, right? Aren't the best adventures a bit scary?

Well, she was scared.

After she told her editors, she opened her journal and wrote in big block letters, "WHAT IS TO BECOME OF ME?"At Home in Avon

It is a Sunday night in a largely Republican housing development in Avon, west of Cleveland, an unlikely choice for arch-liberals Schultz and Brown after their wedding. Schultz is home after two appearances for her book, a collection of columns called "Life Happens, and Other Unavoidable Truths."

Waiting for Brown, she boils a pot of water in the combination kitchen and family room where they installed a floor-to-cathedral-ceiling wall of bookshelves to accommodate their library. Apologizing for the impromptu meal, she grabs a jar of prepared tomato sauce from the cupboard and a bottle of red wine from the attached garage.

Down the hall, across from the desk where she writes, a ping-pong table is set up on the thick carpet of the living room. It was Schultz's second-anniversary present for her husband. Until he suffered a campaign trail double hernia, they played most nights when he was in Ohio.

"We're pretty wound up when we get home," Schultz explains. "We come home, we play ping-pong and we talk. Just to take his mind off it a little bit."

"It's hard. It's really hard," Brown says of running in a state that last elected a Democratic senator in 1992. He mentions the scope, the pressure. Friends say Brown, divorced for 16 years before he married Schultz, believes he has found a true campaign partner.

He told Schultz the previous night that he would not have campaigned as well or as successfully without her.

"When you said that, I was stunned," she tells him.

"You know that," he answers. "I've told you that a hundred times in a lot of different ways."

Schultz smilingly reports that a woman had advised her to keep an eye on her man, what with the availability in Washington of so many alluring women-not-his-wife. Brown sees many good reasons not to stray, not least Schultz's megaphone -- and her proven willingness to use it.

"I have already said to people," Brown says, "if I ever did anything, she wouldn't just cut my [testicles] off. She'd write about it."Smitten by Her Words

The citation with Schultz's Pulitzer for commentary praised "her pungent columns that provided a voice for the underdog and underprivileged."

Two weeks after she began writing her column in October 2002, she received an e-mail from one "Sherrod Brown, Lorain, Ohio." It read: "Where did the Plain Dealer find you? You are a breath of fresh air; your writing reminds me of that of Barbara Kingsolver, one of my favorite living writers."

Brown read Schultz's first column aloud at the Thanksgiving dinner table. It was about her father, for 36 years an electric company worker. It began, "I want Dad's lunch pail."

"To Dad, it's a daily reminder of the job he hated," wrote Schultz. "To me, it is an enduring symbol of the promise he made to his four young children. 'You kids are never going to carry one of these to work,' he'd tell us, over and over. 'You kids are going to college.' "

Schultz is a mother of two who graduated from Kent State and quit law school after two years. She writes about coat-check attendants whose tips are siphoned by management. She urges respect for valet parkers and better health care for the uninsured. She quotes her mother's admonition: "Don't marry him till you see how he treats the waitress."

She wrote in one column that on the Sunday after Ohio voters banned same-sex marriage, straight members of her congregation wept as more than 50 gay worshipers stood to show they had been affected by the legislation.

"They didn't look angry or defiant," she wrote. "They looked abandoned."

Brown is a self-described battler for the little guy. First elected to the Ohio House at 21, he has been a politician ever since. He fought fiercely against NAFTA and voted against the Iraq war resolution and the Patriot Act. He spotted the makings of a soul mate in Schultz's politics and her tolerant Christian faith -- she belongs to the United Church of Christ; he is Lutheran.

Daughters Emily and Liz saw it right away.

DOJ_NMG_0082214

"He would read us her columns over the phone," says Emily, 25, a union organizer on leave to work in the campaign. "Liz and I were, 'Clearly, you should just ask this woman out, Dad.' "

He did and they met for dinner on New Year's Day 2003.

"Within two seconds," says Emily, "they were in love."

Precisely 10 months 26 days later, Schultz told her readers, they married.'Mrs. Brown' She's Not

Plain Dealer readers know much about the contours of Schultz's heart. She wrote of her nervousness, at age 45, about their first date. She told about Brown becoming friends with her cat, and her inaugural trip to buy manure for his tomato vines. Also, their pedometer competition, their "all day long" e-mail exchanges and the night he proposed.

"Falling in love when you're knee-deep in middle age takes some getting used to," Schultz wrote. "For one thing, you feel mighty silly giggling all the time, especially in front of your grown kids."

The character and the cadence of her columns infuse her performance on the hustings. She tells of campaign encounters and describes her working-class roots in Ashtabula, Ohio, where, as she puts it, a couple of nobodies wore themselves out so their children could become somebodies.

But her talk turns tough when she shifts to Republican criticism of her husband.

"We're going to fight back," she told the UAW crowd. "You respond, you pivot, and you deck 'em."

"Connie has never known the luxury of an unexpressed thought. It's into her head and out of her mouth very quickly," says Cassara, a Cleveland Realtor and the close friend described by Schultz as "my sanity in this race."

Total strangers suddenly have expectations, from how she should wear her hair to how she should gaze upon her husband as he speaks. People regularly ask when she will change her name to Mrs. Brown. Answer: She won't.

"You know what the difference is now?" Schultz asks one morning over coffee. "I'm having to rein myself in. I'm less myself."

This is Brown's race, after all, and he must remain the focus.

"When somebody asks a question, I feel I can't immediately answer. I have to say, 'Sherrod's particularly outspoken about this,' " Schultz says. "Thank God we agree on almost everything. If we didn't, I don't know how I'd do this."

Twice, people have pasted DeWine stickers over the bumper sticker on her car, the one that reads, "Well-behaved women rarely make history."

"A little hostility out there?" she asks in mock innocence.

Then there was her parking lot encounter with the man who pointed to the "Brown for Senate" sticker on her car and said, "I wouldn't be caught dead with that guy's bumper sticker." He told her it was not too late to repent, she remembers.

"It really is too late," Schultz replied.

"Why?"

"I married the guy."The Opponent's Wife

Fran DeWine married her guy, too, 39 years ago. The wedding was two weeks after her 20th birthday, because she believed teenage marriages were doomed. Even then, she had already dated Mike DeWine for longer than Schultz and Brown have known each other.

She takes a softer approach than Schultz when promoting her husband's candidacy. Through 30 years of political life since DeWine won his first race for Green County prosecutor, Fran DeWine says she has overcome an initial shyness. She hands out her trademark 24-page cookbook, paid for by the Ohio GOP, and frequently mentions her eight children and nine grandchildren.

"First of all, I talk about Mike and I, knowing him since we started first grade together," DeWine says by telephone from Northern Virginia as she bakes banana bread for her youngest daughter's cross-country meet.

"I don't go into the details he goes into, but I like to tell what he spends his time doing," says DeWine. She talks of her husband's work on the Senate Intelligence Committee, his role on children's issues and his ability to deliver money to Ohio. "He's my best friend and I help him and we work together, but there is no role, 'Political Spouse.' I think everyone has to decide for themselves."

DeWine would not discuss Schultz's approach or her campaign trail commentary.

"I try not to know," DeWine says. "I want to go ahead and lead my life and I don't want to worry about that."

Schultz, meanwhile, is saying of Mike DeWine at a fundraiser, "Forget that he's lying about Sherrod's record; he's trafficking in a national tragedy for political gain." She is referring to an advertisement, later pulled, that included a doctored photograph: The producers had added more smoke to the burning World Trade Center.

The DeWine campaign stands by its effort to portray Brown as too liberal for Ohio, unable to work with Republicans and unwilling to take essential steps against terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0082215

At the fundraiser, put together by supporters calling themselves Brown-Nosers, Schultz is billed as the star. The first 20 people donating at least $300 are promised a signed copy of her book.

When Schultz begins to speak, she announces a surprise guest, one Sherrod Brown, who has flown in from Washington. As she steps back and he steps up, someone calls out, "We want Connie!"

Brown, who cried when he learned Schultz had won the Pulitzer and sometimes refers to her in e-mails as PPWCS, says a November win would bring a January trifecta: Ohio Democrats in the Senate and the governor's mansion, and Schultz's column back in the Plain Dealer.

"So many people, especially women, are really moved by what she writes about," said supporter Brittany O'Connor, who brought her mother to hear Schultz speak. "I wonder if the Plain Dealer will let her."Hoping to Return

"It does make me uneasy," says Plain Dealer Editor Douglas Clifton. "I'm kind of old-school when it comes to drawing the line between what a reporter can and can't say or do in political campaigns."

After meeting and marrying Brown, Schultz avoided writing about issues he pushed in Congress. But she and Clifton saw that a statewide race would be trickier to navigate.

"I still want to write about what's on my mind, but that is becoming increasingly difficult," Schultz wrote in her final column. "Each passing week brings more limitations on my choice of topics because there is a concern that some will accuse me of using my column to stump for my husband."

As a woman and a feminist, she found the idea that she was "merely parroting" her husband both amusing and offensive, she wrote in that last column. But she was mindful of the appearance of a conflict of interest, as well as problems her presence might cause for colleagues covering the race.

Schultz expects to return. Clifton recently assured her that he wants her back, aware that some readers will view her work through the prism of her campaign efforts.

"In the end," Clifton says, "I have every confidence in her integrity."

Three former journalists who now spend time considering ethical quandaries say the potential conflict is made manageable by the fact that Schultz is campaigning for her husband -- turning down requests from other candidates -- and that she is an opinion writer, not a beat reporter.

"I would be more tolerant of a spouse campaigning for a wife or husband," says former ABC News reporter Bob Zelnick, who teaches journalism ethics at Boston University. He adds, however, that Schultz would be "better advised to be a little bit less sharp and pointed in her attacks on her husband's opponents."

* * *

There are 21 days to go in the campaign. As the pace quickens and the pitch of television commercials grows sharper, most polls show Brown ahead of DeWine in a race professionals expect to remain close.

Schultz crisscrosses the state, keeping in touch with Brown via BlackBerry and cellphone, grabbing catnaps on long drives to Avon. Every day, she laments columns unwritten. But Schultz is taking notes for a campaign memoir. She will call it "And His Lovely Wife."

Politicians' Campaigns Invade MySpace (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, October 17, 2006

Candidates are using popular websites Facebook, MySpace and YouTube for the first time to give their campaigns free publicity, reach young voters and bypass traditional media. Once they're online, though, they risk being mocked and losing control of their messages.

Facebook.com created 1,400 candidate profiles that listed names, states, parties and offices. Of those, about 300 are updated by candidates or their staffs, marketing director Melanie Deitch says.

What's online can be embarrassing:

•Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's Facebook profile has many posts from her Green Party rival, Howie Hawkins, who lists reasons he thinks the New York Democrat should be defeated.

•A Facebook search for “Mike DeWine” turns up the Ohio Republican senator's profile as well as links to several self-organized political groups of Facebook members. One group calls itself “Mike Dewine and (Ohio Rep.) Deborah Pryce are tools,” a derisive slang for dupes.

•In an ad only on YouTube and Republican congressional candidate Paul Nelson's campaign website, Nelson says Rep. Ron Kind, D-Wis., voted to fund studies of “the sex lives of Vietnamese prostitutes.” Matt Sweeney, Kind's campaign manager, says voters will “see through these kinds of sleaze ads.”

DOJ_NMG_0082216

The power of the sites was highlighted this summer when video of Sen. George Allen, R-Va., calling a rival's volunteer "macaca" showed up on YouTube. It has been seen more than 250,000 times. YouTube has more than 30 million visitors a month.

Campaigns are still finding ways to tap the sites' potential, says Democratic strategist Chris Lehane, who predicts they "will ultimately revolutionize politics."

About 1 million of Facebook's 10 million regular users read politics features, Deitch says. That's an opportunity to reach young voters. In the 2004 election, 17% of voters were 18-29.

MySpace, with 56 million visitors a month, had "a huge uptick" this year in political activity, says spokesman Jeff Berman. "When you can reach people that quickly, that effectively and at no cost, it's just a no-brainer," he says.

With Tactical Itinerary, Mrs. Clinton Skirts Iowa (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

DES MOINES, Oct. 15 — Three years have passed since Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton last set foot in Iowa.

Mrs. Clinton has zigzagged through much of the country in that time, bouncing among Ohio and California, New Jersey and Colorado, Pennsylvania and Michigan, raising tens of millions of dollars and meeting with legions of Democrats. But she has conspicuously bypassed Iowa, whose caucuses will be the first presidential nominating contest, and New Hampshire, the state with the earliest primary, where her last visit was even longer ago.

Mrs. Clinton's strategy is a tacit recognition that crossing the border into a state that will matter early in 2008 would set off a cascade of attention and be tantamount to an official announcement that she is running for president. At every opportunity, her advisers say she is doing nothing more than focusing on being re-elected in New York next month. For now, at least, she can point to her itinerary as evidence that she has not made up her mind about 2008.

Yet depending on how long she waits, her absence from Iowa also risks giving her Democratic rivals an opening to curry favor with voters here. Other candidates are already in a nearly constant march through the state, hiring operatives and seeking commitments from grass-roots organizers. Even Terry McAuliffe, former Democratic national chairman and a close Clinton adviser, acknowledges that "the other candidates are there rounding up donors."

"But beyond that, it doesn't matter at this point," Mr. McAuliffe said. "She's in a unique position."

Then, as all Clinton advisers must, he quickly added that the senator was engaged "in a deliberative process," deciding whether to run. "Anybody who tells you she's running today is crazy," he said.

Other strategists agree that if Mrs. Clinton does run, then the moment she begins to devote her attention to a presidential campaign her financial and name-recognition advantages will wash away any memory of the years she declined to visit Iowa and New Hampshire.

Still, at two recent gatherings — the annual Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner sponsored by the Iowa Democratic Party here Saturday and the annual steak fry picnic last month sponsored by Senator Tom Harkin, Democrat of Iowa — there was little evidence of an organic pro-Hillary movement.

Even at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner, where former President Bill Clinton made what was widely viewed as a proxy appearance for his wife, the most visible show of support for Mrs. Clinton came from Peter Feddo, a 23-year-old who runs a Hillary Rodham Clinton for President Committee from Richmond, Va. Mr. Feddo had flown into Des Moines with thousands of "Hillary for President" stickers and signs that he passed out at the door; the best news, he said, was that some guests asked for two. "So that's a sign of momentum for Hillary," he said. "People not only want to support her, they want to tell their friends."

Numerous Democratic voters interviewed at the two events said that although they admired Mrs. Clinton, they feared she could not win the general election. Several said they had been impressed with Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana, who is making a strong push here, and another handful said they were leaning toward former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, who has spent significant time in the state.

"I like Hillary, but I have my doubts about her," said Judy Risvold, a retired accountant from Des Moines who attended the Harkin steak fry last month.

Asked whether Mrs. Clinton should already be courting Iowans if she was going to win here, Ms. Risvold said it was not too late. "She'll come if she's serious," she said.

Michele Barker, a high school teacher, said she considered herself a supporter of Mrs. Clinton but worried about her chances in a general election. "I'm fearful of the response she'd get from the voters," Ms. Barker said, because of a past as a polarizing figure.

DOJ_NMG_0082217

Although there are plenty of Clinton supporters here left over from Bill Clinton's campaigns, he did not build the same network here as in New Hampshire, meaning that his wife would still have to hire advisers and line up supporters, work that others like Mr. Edwards, Mr. Bayh and Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts have already begun.

Even former Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia, who announced last week that he had decided not to run, had invested time and money in Iowa, and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, who is considered less likely to run, has two trips here on the calendar this campaign season.

And then there is Tom Vilsack, Iowa's governor, who is laying the groundwork for a possible race and would have a natural advantage in his home state.

The consensus is that Mrs. Clinton, unlike anyone else, can wait as long as she wants before beginning to court Iowans.

"She is the only candidate where it won't hurt her," said Gordon R. Fischer, former chairman of the Iowa Democratic Party, "because her name recognition is already sky-high; she already has a lot of money. She's the one person, frankly, the one candidate, who could get away with it."

Still, a recent Des Moines Register poll showed Mrs. Clinton in second place, behind Mr. Edwards (with Mr. Kerry and Mr. Vilsack third and fourth).

"Nationally, she is indeed the front-runner, should she choose to compete," Mr. Fischer said.

But he also said: "I think in Iowa you have to fight for it. There aren't any coronations in Iowa. Rightly or wrongly, we demand the candidates come in early and often, and especially often. We expect them to shake our hands and look us in the eye. We expect to be able to ask questions and have them answered. She's going to have to work for it like anybody else."

States Considering Privatizing Highways Can Study Indiana Toll Road Experience (USAT)

By Theodore Kim

USA Today, October 17, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS — Indiana's experience with privatizing its East-West Toll Road shows that states considering the same move might expect quick financial benefits along with higher tolls and other policies that could rankle some drivers.

A number of states have looked at privatizing major highways to fill budget holes and cover the expense of fixing other crumbling roads.

Gov. Jon Corzine of New Jersey is considering leasing the New Jersey Turnpike and other toll roads, while road privatization has emerged as an election topic in Illinois and Ohio.

Privatization has spurred debate over the impact of such deals on toll rates and operations.

Northern Virginia lawmakers have resisted toll hikes on the Dulles Greenway, which is privately run. Leaders in Harris County, Texas, defeated a proposal this year to privatize toll roads in the Houston area, deciding to run the road themselves.

The 50-year-old Indiana East-West Toll Road is in its fourth month of private operation.

In July, a private Australian-Spanish consortium took over the 157-mile highway, which runs east from Chicago to the Ohio border.

The consortium will operate, maintain and collect tolls on the road for 75 years. In return, it gave Indiana a one-time, lump-sum payment of $3.8 billion.

Since the hand-over, the private operator, the Indiana Toll Road Concession, has readied the installation of pay-without-stopping tolling technology and announced a $250 million expansion of the road's western end.

State Treasurer Tim Berry said Indiana has reaped more than $55 million in interest from the consortium's payment.

The company has drawn criticism from police and members of other emergency agencies, who said the operator's practice of installing barriers at turnarounds has hindered their ability to respond to traffic accidents.

"We're trying to respond to emergencies here," said Betty Schroeder, director of Steuben County Emergency Medical Service. "I'm like: You've got to be kidding me here."

Matt Pierce, a spokesman for the toll road operator, says the barriers stop illegal U-turns.

As an alternative, the road operator plans to install flexible posts that will deter drivers from using the turnabouts. Emergency vehicles, Pierce says, can drive over the posts.

Schroeder said she remains skeptical.

The consortium plans to install electronic tolling on the road's western end by June. The entire road will have the technology by September.

Motorists without the transponder needed for electronic tolling will have to pay higher tolls. The consortium has not announced the cost of the transponder.

By September, tolls for passenger vehicles without transponders traveling the entire road will rise to $8 from $4.65.

DOJ_NMG_0082218

Eventually, even motorists with electronic tolling will pay the higher rates. Rates for commercial trucks have gone up to $18 from $14.55. More increases are scheduled.

Gov. Mitch Daniels, who pushed for the deal despite staunch opposition in some parts of Indiana, said the consortium is off to a good start.

"Everything's running flawlessly as far as I know, and they've announced the first quarter-of-a-billion dollars of improvements," the Republican governor said.

Indiana House Minority Leader B. Patrick Bauer of South Bend, Ind., a Democrat who is critical of the deal, said the early setbacks foreshadow what's to come.

"Ultimately, they are a private company that's going to do what's best for them," he said.

Cloning Double Talk (PTR)

By Robert Novak

Pittsburgh-Tribune Review, October 17, 2006

A new video available on YouTube marks a late attempt by pro-life forces to avert serious defeat in Missouri Nov. 7, with national implications. Cathy Ruse, speaking for Missourians Against Human Cloning, declares: "Amendment 2 is a fraud. It is an attempt to trick Missourians into approving -- in their Constitution -- human cloning, the right of biotech firms to do human cloning in Missouri -- something Missourians oppose by an overwhelming majority."

But Amendment 2 is identified for many Missouri voters by the language at the beginning of the five-page ballot initiative: "No person may clone or attempt to clone a human being." That explains why polls have shown a substantial margin of support for the constitutional amendment, which is also backed by key Republican politicians and business interests. It seems to offer the best of all worlds: government support of stem cell research without fear of cloning.

The problem is that the proposal so narrowly defines cloning as to open the door to any cloning procedure that takes place outside the womb. If this is approved by a state that historically is a barometer of national trends and is considered a pro-life stronghold, it will be a national model for breaking popular resistance to what the scientists and biotech companies want.

A campaign costing an estimated $20 million has helped build a substantial lead for the amendment's advocates. A September statewide poll by the Republican firm McLaughlin & Associates shows a 59 percent to 31 percent advantage. Democrats appear to have no doubt, favoring it 75-22, with 3 percent undecided. But Republicans are split, 40 percent in support and 45 against, with 15 percent undecided.

Big Republican names -- former Sen. John Danforth, Gov. Matt Blunt and party contributor Sam Fox -- all support the amendment. The $2-billion-endowed Stowers Institute in Kansas City, funded by major Republican benefactors, is spearheading the campaign.

That establishment Republican support for Amendment 2, including threats to remove the institute from the state if the proposal does not pass, has created a difficult situation for first-term GOP Sen. Jim Talent, engaged in a re-election campaign. I reported Talent's "defection from the anti-cloning ranks" in February when he took his name off a Senate bill to ban human cloning on grounds it might hamper acceptable scientific research.

Talent at that time was taking no position on Amendment 2, but he has since come out against it. In a recent debate with the Democrat Senate candidate, state Auditor Claire McCaskill, on NBC's "Meet the Press," Talent said the proposal "would create ... an unqualified constitutional right to clone the earliest stages of human life. " But he hastened to add he is not against stem cell research.

McCaskill then sought to cast the debate in terms of whether the candidates are for or against the medical miracles that can be achieved through stem cell research. "My faith directs me to heal the sick," she proclaimed, adding that "I come down on the side of hope, hope of cures and supporting science." But she put this in the framework of the constitutional amendment, which, she said, "strictly prohibits human cloning."

But Amendment 2 bans only cloning that involves planting an embryo within the womb. It prohibits government from interfering with somatic cell nuclear transfer, which involves replacing the nucleus of a human egg outside the womb -- the cloning procedure used to produce Dolly the sheep.

This language, contends the YouTube video, "provides biotech firms a blank check for taxpayer dollars to support unethical and unproven research that Missourians oppose." If government-approved cloning can be sold to the pro-life state of Missouri, it will show up next in other states with major research facilities.

Crime And Punishment (WP)

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082219

AS THE DEMOCRATIC candidate for mayor of Baltimore in 1999, Martin O'Malley set a goal of cutting the city's annual number of murders to 175; they were then running at more than 300 a year. He failed. Baltimore's homicide tally looks likely to reach or surpass 270 this year, maintaining the city's standing as one of the nation's deadliest.

As the Republican candidate for governor of Maryland in 2002, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. also set a goal: to reform the state's decrepit, Dickensian system of juvenile jails. He also appears to have fallen short, though that record is not as easily quantified.

One may give both men, who face each other as gubernatorial candidates in the Nov. 7 elections, credit for setting ambitious agendas. One may fairly conclude that each made efforts and some progress in the face of daunting obstacles -- Mr. O'Malley cut Baltimore's murder rate and Mr. Ehrlich closed one of Maryland's worst juvenile jails. Still, the bottom line is that neither made good on his campaign promise to solve a painful, long-standing problem.

Messrs. O'Malley and Ehrlich, in the heat of the campaign homestretch, are busy bashing each other over issues of crime and punishment. They are key questions for voters throughout the state, particularly in the high-crime areas of Baltimore and Prince George's County, and they played a prominent role in the candidates' back-to-back debates this past weekend.

Mr. O'Malley, in particular, has been put on the defensive because of Baltimore's stubbornly high murder rate. It's a good bet that he rues the day he promised to cut homicides to 175 annually, calling it a "realistic goal"; during his term as mayor, which began with this decade, they have never dipped below 253. The murder rate did decline sharply in the mayor's first couple of years in office, as he pushed police to take a more focused, aggressive stance in the city's most crime-ridden precincts -- including the routine arrest of loiterers, which has drawn fire from civil libertarians. But progress on homicides stalled after 2002 even as other categories of violent crime fell sharply. And it speaks poorly of Mr. O'Malley's managerial abilities that he has overseen a revolving door of four police chiefs during his nearly seven years in office -- not counting three others who served on an interim basis.

In the case of Maryland's juvenile justice system, state officials insist that they have made progress in addressing staffing problems, including poor pay and qualifications for many of those who work with young detainees. They closed what was the state's most notoriously violent juvenile treatment facility, the Charles H. Hickey Jr. reform school in Baltimore County -- but without a coherent plan for housing its 144 youthful residents.

Signs persist that the problem is far from fixed. Less than two months ago the state's independent monitor of juvenile facilities, Katherine A. Perez, wrote that she remained concerned about inadequate staffing and "the threat to life, health and safety" of youths at Baltimore City's Juvenile Justice Center. In May, Ms. Perez reported that youths were sleeping on the floor at one overcrowded jail and that monitors had seen a male staff member throw punches at a rowdy girl in another.

The hard problems of drugs and gangs are impediments to denting the problems that both men inherited. But the disappointing results in Maryland's juvenile jails and on Baltimore's rough streets raise questions about the managerial abilities of both candidates.

And The Winner Is ... Me (NYT)

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

Voters in Ohio can be forgiven if they feel they have been beamed out of the Midwest and dropped into a third-world autocracy. The latest news from the state's governor's race is that the Republican nominee, Kenneth Blackwell, who is also the Ohio secretary of state, could rule that his opponent is ineligible to run because of a technicality. We'd like to think that his office would not ultimately do that, or that if it did, such a ruling would not be allowed to stand. But the mere fact that an elected official and political candidate has the authority to toss his opponent out of a race is further evidence of a serious flaw in our democracy.

Ted Strickland, the Democratic nominee, is leading Mr. Blackwell by as much as 28 points, according to one recent poll. In their panic, some Blackwell supporters have hit on the idea of trying to prevent the election from occurring. One of them filed a complaint alleging that Mr. Strickland, who is a member of Congress, does not live in the apartment where he is registered to vote. Mr. Strickland owns a condominium in another part of Ohio, and the complaint alleges that he actually lives there. If Mr. Strickland was not a qualified voter, he would be prohibited from running for governor.

The complaint itself is without merit. No one disputes that Mr. Strickland lives in Ohio, or that he is registered. The only issue is which of his two homes he chose to register from, and the law gives voters with multiple homes broad discretion in choosing among them.

What is more interesting, and troubling, is the way the complaint is proceeding. The county board that heard it broke down 2 to 2, on party lines, about whether to hold a hearing. In the case of a tie vote at the county level, complaints like these get forwarded to the secretary of state's office to be resolved. Mr. Blackwell says he has designated his assistant secretary to handle duties that could conflict with his candidacy. But passing these matters on to a subordinate who is a political ally and owes his job to the candidate hardly removes the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0082220

Election administration should be removed from partisan politics, in Ohio and everywhere else. Decisions like these should be made by nonpartisan bodies or, failing that, by people who do their utmost to insulate themselves from partisan politics. In 2004, Mr. Blackwell chose to become co-chairman of President Bush's Ohio campaign, and then issued rulings that helped the campaign. Now we have the even more bizarre prospect of Mr. Blackwell, or his deputy, potentially participating in the baseless disqualification of his opponent.

We are confident it will not come to that. But however this particular case is resolved, it underscores the need for Ohio, and other states, to find a way to administer elections that is insulated from partisan politics.

Paying For Better Parenting (NYT)

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

New York is searching for new ways to fight persistent poverty, and Mayor Michael Bloomberg's Commission for Economic Opportunity has recommended useful reforms. To encourage families to participate in these programs, the mayor hopes to recruit private donors to provide parents with a cash incentive to make the right choices for their children — like taking them in for regular checkups and making sure they stay in school.

The idea is based on a highly successful Mexican antipoverty program, known as Oportunidades, that is now being tried by at least 25 other countries. Mexico began Oportunidades in 1997. Today it covers one in four Mexican families, helping virtually all the country's poor. The average family gets $35 a month, about a quarter of the rural household income. Families with many children in school can get up to $153 a month, a ceiling imposed to remove the incentive to have more children.

To get payments for food, mothers must bring their children in for regular health checkups and attend informative talks at health centers. Mothers also get cash if their children attend school at least 85 percent of the time. The payments start after third grade and go through high school, rising each year as dropout rates get higher and a child's forgone earning potential is higher. Because checks go directly from the central government to mothers whose families meet the requirements, administrative costs and the chance of corruption are reduced.

From the beginning, Oportunidades built in rigorous evaluation. Those studies have shown that it does focus its help on Mexico's poorest people, and they are benefiting. Children are bigger and healthier. Oportunidades has also cut child labor and led to more schooling. In rural areas, the number of children starting high school increased by 85 percent.

Even a rich city like New York can envy such success. Mayor Bloomberg is smart to explore a brilliantly simple idea that is fighting poverty now and poverty later around the world. We hope that donors will rally to the effort.

North Korean Fuel Identified As Plutonium (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 — American intelligence agencies have concluded that North Korea's test explosion last week was powered by plutonium that North Korea harvested from its small nuclear reactor, according to officials who have reviewed the results of atmospheric sampling since the blast.

The officials, who would not speak for attribution because it was an intelligence matter, were responding to specific questions about what had been learned about the nature of the weapon.

As administration and intelligence officials watched for indications that the North might be preparing a second test, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea on Monday that it risked even further isolation if it took such a provocative action.

American officials have reported recent activity at the test site, leading some to believe that another test might be carried out soon.

The intelligence agencies' finding that the weapon was based on plutonium strongly suggested that the country's second path to a nuclear bomb — one using uranium — was not yet ready. The uranium program is based on enrichment equipment and know-how purchased from Pakistan's former nuclear chief.

Nuclear experts said that the use of plutonium to make the bomb was important because it suggested that North Korea probably had only one nuclear program mature enough to produce weapons.

"This is good news because we have a reasonably good idea of how much plutonium they have made," said Siegfried S. Hecker, the former chief of the Los Alamos National Laboratory and now a visiting professor at Stanford University. Mr. Hecker, who has visited North Korea and is one of the few foreigners to have seen parts of its nuclear infrastructure, said that it was his guess that "they tried to test a reasonably sophisticated device, and they had trouble imploding it properly."

DOJ_NMG_0082221

The supply of plutonium materials is known from the days when international inspectors kept tabs on the fuel rods in the North's reactor, and intelligence analysts estimate that North Korea has enough material to make 6 to 10 plutonium bombs.

Politically, the results of the test may revive last week's finger-pointing about who is more responsible for the Korean test: Bill Clinton or President Bush.

As president, Mr. Clinton negotiated a deal that froze the production and weaponization of North Korea's plutonium, but intelligence agencies later determined that North Korea began its secret uranium program under his watch. The plutonium that North Korea exploded was produced, according to intelligence estimates, either during the administration of the first President Bush or after 2003, when the North Koreans threw out international inspectors and began reprocessing spent nuclear fuel the inspectors had kept under seal.

Unlike the Clinton administration in 1994, the current Bush administration chose not to threaten to destroy North Korea's fuel and nuclear reprocessing facilities if they tried to make weapons.

That threat in 1994 — which was ultimately resolved with an agreement to freeze the weapons program — was made by William J. Perry, who was the defense secretary then. In an interview on Monday, Mr. Perry said: "There was a brief window to catch this plutonium before it was made into bomb fuel. It's gone. It's out of the barn now."

After a week of some lingering doubt about whether the test had indeed been a nuclear detonation, the office of John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, confirmed that much in a statement issued Monday.

"Analysis of air samples collected on Oct. 11, 2006, detected radioactive debris which confirms that North Korea conducted an underground nuclear explosion in the vicinity of Punggye on Oct. 9, 2006," said the statement, putting on the record a conclusion that officials first disclosed Friday, the night before the United Nations Security Council voted on sanctions. "The explosion yield was less than a kiloton," the statement added.

It gave no further details, and the officials who described the early findings did not disclose more beyond the conclusion that plutonium, not uranium, was the device's core.

The determination that the blast was nuclear was announced a day before Secretary Rice was to depart for a trip to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia. She will go to the capitals of the nations that have been engaged in the six-party talks over North Korea's nuclear program except, of course, North Korea.

The unanimous resolution adopted by the Security Council last week imposing sanctions on military material and luxury goods was proof of "a strong and firm hand and strong and firm response," Ms. Rice said Monday during a State Department news conference. She said the international community wanted "to leave open a door for North Korea to take a different course if it wishes to do so."

Pressed to respond to analysts' assessment that desires by China and South Korea for continued economic and business exchanges with North Korea might trump demands for a stiff sanctions and inspections regime, Ms. Rice said her goal was to work out the details of putting the Council resolution into effect.

The Associated Press reported Monday from Dandong, China, that customs officials were examining trucks at the North Korean border as China complied with the United Nations sanctions.

However, China's ambassador to the United Nations, Wang Guangya, indicated that his nation would not conduct similar searches at sea.

Mr. Wang made clear that China would not halt ships and board them to search for ballistic missiles or for bomb-making equipment or material that can be used to manufacture nuclear, chemical and biological arms.

"This is a resolution we have to implement," he told reporters at the United Nations. "The question was raised whether China will do inspections. Inspections yes, but inspection is different than interdiction and interception. I think different countries will do it different ways."

During the news conference on Monday, Ms. Rice said she was "not concerned that the Chinese are going to turn their backs on their obligations. I don't think they would have voted for a resolution if they did not intend to carry through on it."

Nations Discuss Second Nuke Test Reports (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

South Korea and Japan warily monitored unconfirmed reports Tuesday of possible preparations by North Korea for a second nuclear test.

Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said his government has "information" concerning media reports that North Korea could be laying the groundwork for another blast.

"We have information but I cannot speak about its contents," Aso told reporters, without elaborating.

DOJ_NMG_0082222

Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki said Tokyo was working with other unidentified governments on trying to figure out what the North Koreans were up to.

"We are aware that there are various reports. We are closely exchanging information on a constant basis," Shiozaki said. "We should not disclose the content of such exchanges."

A South Korean government official in Seoul said his government also was aware of signs related to possible preparations for an additional North Korea nuclear test. The official said various intelligence reports were coming in about preparations for a possible test, but that it was unclear how reliable they were.

Seoul already has taken measures to be more vigilant for a possible second nuclear test by North Korea, and was bolstering exchanges of intelligence with the United States, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

U.S. government officials have said that they would not be surprised if North Korea were to attempt a second nuclear test sometime soon, following the first one on Oct. 9.

Washington officially recognized Monday that last week's explosion was an underground nuclear test. The test triggered an international outcry, leading the U.N. Security Council to adopt a sanctions resolution on Saturday.

Rice: N.Korea Sanctions Serve As Warning (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that U.N. sanctions are a clear warning the international community is united in opposing North Korea's nuclear ambitions and Iran should take heed that it could face a similar rebuke.

Previewing her upcoming trip to the region, Rice called Security Council sanctions adopted on Saturday "a very strong resolution" that would punish and further isolate the North Korean government.

Rice briefed reporters at the State Department on her upcoming trip to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia, which begins on Tuesday. "The purpose of my trip is to rally the support of our friends and allies" in the region, she said.

"The world has responded calmly and firmly" to last week's North Korean nuclear test, Rice added.

The U.S.-sponsored U.N. resolution demands that North Korea eliminate nuclear weapons but rules out military action against the country, as the Russians and Chinese demanded.

It calls on countries to block North Korea from receiving equipment or materials to build weapons of mass destruction and other advanced weaponry. It also clamps down on travel for North Koreans involved in the weapons program, and orders countries to freeze many of the international assets of people or businesses connected to that program.

While China has been inspecting cargo trucks headed for its communist ally, there have been questions about how strictly it and South Korea will enforce the U.N. resolution. Both countries have significant trade relations with North Korea, whose economy is perpetually on the verge of collapse.

Rice's tone at times was conciliatory.

"Let's give some time to these sanctions to work," she said. "Let's give some time to the diplomacy to work. Let's see if North Korea can be pushed in a different direction. But we've got a much stronger set of tools with which to do that."

She acknowledged international concerns of escalating the crisis. Countries in the region openly worry that the collapse of North Korea's government could send millions of refugees streaming toward their borders. South Koreans also worry about a conventional attack by their unpredictable neighbor.

"I do hear states saying that they want to be certain that it won't ratchet up conflict. We have no desire to ratchet up conflict either. But we'll have some discussions on precisely how this will be carried out," Rice said.

She said her trip was designed to "rally the support of our friends and allies" to pressure North Korea to drop its nuclear effort.

She also said the U.S. will seek to increase international cooperation for efforts like the proliferation security initiative, in which the United States and other countries try preventing weapons of mass destruction from reaching rogue nations. Efforts under that program have so far been limited.

Rice also tried prodding China and other countries, saying, "We expect every member of the international community to fully implement all aspects" of the U.N. resolution.

She said she did not consider North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons irreversible, noting that a handful of other nations like South Africa and Libya had abandoned their nuclear programs.

DOJ_NMG_0082223

"If North Korea reverses course and embraces the path of cooperation, if it makes the strategic choice to dismantle its nuclear weapons completely, verifiably and irreversibly, an entirely new and better future would be open to it and to its people," she said.

Rice said the United States was prepared to return to the bargaining table with North Korea and other countries "without precondition," repeating a position the Bush administration has taken frequently. But such talks, she said, "have to lead someplace" and not dwell on tangential issues.

Six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program have been in limbo since last November.

"The nonproliferation regime is under strain but it is not broken," Rice asserted.

Rice denied that U.S. involvement in Iraq was keeping the administration from giving its full attention to the North Korean nuclear problem. "We can certainly do more than one thing at a time," she said.

Rice pointedly challenged Iran to learn a lesson from the international reaction to the North Korean atomic test.

"The greatest challenge to the nonproliferation regime comes from countries that violate their pledges to respect the Non-Proliferation Treaty. The North Korean regime is one such case, but also so is Iran," she said. "The Iranian government is watching and it can now see that the international community will respond to threats from nuclear proliferation."

Rice said she expected the Security Council to begin work this week on an Iran sanctions resolution.

Rice also said her trip was aimed at winning support from U.S. allies in northeast Asia for "a comprehensive strategy" to handle the confrontation with North Korea.

"As President Bush has made clear, the United States has both the will and capability to meet the full range of our security and deterrent commitments to allies like South Korea and Japan," she said. "This trip is an opportunity to reaffirm our reciprocal obligations."

Rice Trip To Push Full Sanctions For N. Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that she will push for full implementation of U.N. sanctions against North Korea as punishment for its recent nuclear test when she makes a critical visit to Asia and Russia this week.

The sanctions prohibit trade with North Korea in illicit materials, weapons and luxury items.

"Every country in the region must share the burdens as well as the benefits of our common security," Rice said in comments aimed at China and South Korea, Pyongyang's two largest trading partners. She called on nations to "collectively isolate" North Korea, adding that it "cannot destabilize the international system and then expect to exploit elaborate financial networks built for peaceful commerce."

Rice also warned Iran -- which faces possible U.N. sanctions over its nascent nuclear enrichment program -- that the Security Council will begin work on a resolution condemning Tehran for not suspending that effort. Iran "can now see that the international community will respond to threats from nuclear proliferation," Rice said, adding that Iran's current course "could lead simply to further isolation."

Rice, who departs today, held a news conference on her trip to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia a few hours after the head of U.S. intelligence agencies announced that analysts had confirmed North Korea's nuclear test through radiation samples detected in the air two days after the blast.

A two-sentence statement released by Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said an analysis of radioactive debris "confirms that North Korea conducted an underground nuclear explosion in the vicinity of P'unggye on October 9, 2006. The explosion yield was less than a kiloton."

The extremely small yield surprised U.S. nuclear scientists and intelligence analysts, who had expected a large explosion typical of a first test. The U.S. military dropped a bomb of 20 to 23 kilotons on Nagasaki, Japan, more than 60 years ago.

Although the radiation samples confirm the nuclear test, officials at the CIA, the Department of Energy and national nuclear laboratories are still trying to determine the cause of the low yield. The prevailing theory is that North Korea managed to implode only a fraction of the plutonium during the test.

If the test was less successful than the North Koreans hoped, U.S. analysts believe they will conduct another one to determine what went wrong. Officials said they are on the lookout with satellite imagery and communications intercepts for any signs of a new test.

But some scientists and weapons designers are beginning to wonder whether North Korea tested a sophisticated, miniaturized device.

DOJ_NMG_0082224

North Korea's nuclear arsenal is believed by U.S. intelligence to have grown significantly during President Bush's tenure, but little is known about the exact design of the device that Pyongyang may have built. U.S. intelligence has judged, however, that North Korea could be as long as 10 years away from being able to marry a nuclear warhead to a missile delivery system.

Rice told reporters that on her trip she will reassure Japan and South Korea that "the United States has both the will and capability to meet the full range of our security and deterrent commitments." That is a diplomatic way of saying that the U.S. nuclear umbrella will make it unnecessary for those nations to consider developing their own nuclear weapons.

Although Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe has flatly rejected building a nuclear arsenal, the country's ruling party policy chief said Sunday that it is necessary to have a debate over whether Japan should obtain the bomb.

U.S. officials are privately concerned that if North Korea is not restrained, Japan in particular might rethink its position on nuclear weapons. During a speech in Shanghai in 2004, Vice President Cheney made an unusually stark public warning that, if faced with a reality that North Korea has a stockpile of nuclear and ballistic weapons, other nations in the region "may conclude their only option is to develop their own capabilities, and then we have a nuclear arms race unleashed in Asia."

Despite Rice's public warning to Iran yesterday, several U.S. and European diplomats concluded privately that any Security Council resolution on Iran would need to be toned down as a result of the action on North Korea over the weekend.

"The DPRK resolution set a standard that the Iranian resolution will be set against, and since Iran hasn't set off a nuclear device, it'll be quite hard to get away with a tougher one than we got on North Korea," said one official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of diplomatic sensitivities. "In any case, Iran just isn't North Korea. Nothing about these issues are the same."

"Iran has really been on the backburner for the last two weeks," said another U.S. government official whose work focuses on Iranian nuclear issues. "Although the secretary said we can walk and chew gum at the same time, in reality we are only taking baby steps and chewing half a piece of gum."

Rice: World United Against North Korea (AP)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

U.S. spy agencies confirmed North Korea's nuclear test on Monday, even as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice declared that U.N. sanctions prove the world is united in opposing Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions.

Such strong opposition should be a warning to Iran, too, said Rice, who is leaving Tuesday morning for an Asian trip that is expected to be dominated by the nuclear issue. She will visit Japan, South Korea, China and Russia.

Providing the government's first definitive confirmation that North Korea detonated a nuclear device one week ago, National Intelligence Director John Negroponte's office said in a statement that air samples collected on Wednesday showed evidence of radioactivity. That verified North Korea's claims.

"The explosion yield was less than a kiloton," the statement said, smaller than many experts had expected.

Each kiloton is equal to the force produced by 1,000 tons of TNT. An intelligence official said the North Korean device was believed to be roughly the equivalent of 200 tons of TNT, suggesting to analysts that it was probably a partial failure. Experts in and out of government had anticipated a detonation of at least several thousand tons.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive situation with Pyongyang.

At the State Department, Rice said the world "has responded calmly and firmly" to the test.

"North Korea cannot endanger the world and then expect other nations to conduct business as usual in arms or missile parts," Rice said, previewing her message for the Asia trip. "It cannot destabilize the international system and then expect to exploit elaborate financial networks built for peaceful commerce."

She said Iran — another government accused of running an illicit nuclear program — should pay attention to the global reaction. That would include the U.N. Security Council's sanctions adopted on Saturday, aimed at making life difficult for the North Korean government and its weapons proliferation business.

"The Iranian government is watching, and it can now see that the international community will respond to threats from nuclear proliferation," said Rice, who added that she believes the Security Council will begin working on a sanctions resolution against Iran this week. "The Iranian government should consider the course that it is on."

The United States, North Korea and seven other nations are now believed to have nuclear arms. Yet North Korea's unpredictable behavior and its history of trading weapons and components makes its nuclear advancements particularly worrisome to its neighbors and the international community.

The U.S.-sponsored United Nations resolution on North Korea demands that Pyongyang eliminate nuclear weapons. But it also rules out military action against the country, as the Russians and Chinese demanded.

DOJ_NMG_0082225

It calls on countries to block North Korea from receiving equipment or materials to build weapons of mass destruction and other advanced weaponry. It also would clamp down on travel for North Koreans involved in the weapons program and freeze many of the international assets of people or businesses connected to that program.

After the resolution was unanimously passed, North Korea's U.N. ambassador accused council members of a "gangster-like" action that neglects the nuclear threat posed by the United States.

Rice acknowledged international concerns of escalating the crisis and said she would address that on her trip. Countries in the region worry that the collapse of North Korea's government could send millions of refugees streaming toward their borders. South Koreans also worry about a conventional attack by their neighbor.

"We have no desire to ratchet up conflict," Rice said. "But we'll have some discussions on precisely how this will be carried out."

While China has been inspecting cargo trucks headed for its communist ally, its U.N. ambassador indicated its inspectors will not board ships to search for suspicious equipment or material, raising questions about how strictly it and South Korea will enforce the U.N. resolution. Both countries have significant trade relations with North Korea, whose economy is perpetually on the verge of collapse.

"Actions are more powerful than words, and we expect the actions will be powerful," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

Many in the U.S. government would not be surprised if North Korea were to attempt a second nuclear test sometime soon. The decision to test is considered a political one, and officials say North Korea will be monitoring action at the United Nations and elsewhere.

Rice said a new test "would further deepen the isolation of North Korea."

A key clue on the nature of North Korea's nuclear detonation — its first — came from air samples collected by the Air Force's WC-135 Constant Phoenix, a jet designed to collect particles and gases after a nuclear test. Samples are rushed back to labs in the United States for study before they lose their radioactive properties.

The first reading last Tuesday was negative, but a test on a second sample collected Wednesday was positive, according to the intelligence official.

When scientists evaluate air samples, they are looking for the presence of certain materials and gasses such as xenon, which is released after the fission of uranium or plutonium.

While xenon is one indicator, "you'd like to get a leakage where you have many more fission products — mixed in with plutonium or highly enriched uranium," said David Albright, president of the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security and a former U.N. weapons inspector.

U.S. intelligence has concluded that the North Korean device likely used plutonium.

Albright, who has followed North Korea's program for two decades, believes its scientists are trying to miniaturize a nuclear device to put it atop a missile. While the test was likely a partial fizzle, those scientists may not have been after a large nuclear blast, he said.

"It doesn't mean that it failed by any means," Albright said. "If it failed, you would see no yield at all."

Rice Adds Moscow Stop To Asia Tour On NKorea Crisis (AFP)

AFP, October 17, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced she would visit Russia later this week as part of a foreign tour focussed on enacting tough UN sanctions against North Korea over its nuclear test.

Rice said she would travel to Moscow following visits to Japan, South Korea and China in the wake of a UN Security Council vote this weekend imposing wide-ranging punitive sanctions against North Korea.

"The purpose of my trip is to rally the support of our friends and allies in Northeast Asia for a comprehensive strategy," she said.

Russia, alongside China, Japan, South Korea and the United States, launched six-party talks with North Korea last year aimed at convincing the reclusive communist state to give up its nuclear weapons program in return for economic and diplomatic rewards.

The six-party talks appeared to have won Pyongyang's agreement last year to give up its nuclear ambitions.

But the talks fell apart when the North withdrew after Washington imposed sanctions on a Macau bank it accused of laundering money and passing counterfeit US dollars for the regime of Kim Jong-Il.

Russia and China were the most reluctant members of the group to support sanctions against North Korea, but both ultimately voted for the US resolution that followed Pyongyang's first test explosion of a nuclear device on October 9.

DOJ_NMG_0082226

US And China At Odds Over N Korea Cargo (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, October 17, 2006

The US insisted on Monday on the right to intercept suspicious North Korean cargo under the authority of the UN Security Council resolution passed on Saturday, setting the stage for a difficult trip to Asia for Condoleezza Rice this week.

As the US secretary of state prepared to leave for talks in Japan, China, South Korea and Russia, US intelligence said air samples it had collected confirmed North Korea's claim to have carried out an underground nuclear test last Monday.

Describing resolution 1718 passed unanimously as "a very powerful tool", Ms Rice said it made possible the "interdiction of dangerous and suspicious cargo".

"We expect every member of the international community to fully implement all aspects of this resolution and we expect the Security Council to aggressively monitor the process," she said.

However, Wang Guangya, China's ambassador to the UN, disagreed, telling reporters: "Inspections yes, but inspections are different from interception and interdiction."

He said the resolution did not make it mandatory for all nations to inspect cargo going to and from North Korea. States could carry out such an operation as necessary "in accordance with their national legal authorities", he said.

Kim Holmes, a former senior US official who dealt with North Korea and the UN and is now vice-president of the conservative Heritage Foundation in Washington, appeared to concur with the Chinese interpretation, saying the resolution did not approve the use of force needed for interdiction. The resolution speaks of inspection, not interdiction.

China had succeeded in watering down the resolution in a week of debate, by insisting that inspections also required the "co-operation" of North Korea, Mr Holmes said.

Ms Rice said she would discuss how to design "a practical architecture for detecting and screening" dangerous materials.

Dismissing the notion of differences with China, she said: "I am not concerned that the Chinese are going to turn their backs on their obligations. I don't think they would have voted for a resolution that they did not intend to carry through on."

China had already started checking North Korean trucks crossing its border, Nicholas Burns, under-secretary of state, commented.

Ms Rice repeated that the US was ready to hold talks with North Korea if it returned to the six-party forum mediated by China.

"My goal on this trip is, certainly, to reiterate that we're prepared to return to the talks. But North Korea also needs to understand . . . that they will pay a price here," she said.

North Korea becomes the ninth state believed to possess a nuclear weapon, although it is not widely thought to have perfected the process needed to deliver one by missile.

Iran as a potential customer of nuclear materials is the Bush administration's greatest concern. Senior US officials are visiting Gulf allies this week to prepare for naval exercises testing their joint ability to intercept North Korean ships bound for Iran.

"The Iranian government is watching and it can now see that the international community will respond to threats from nuclear proliferation," Ms Rice told reporters.

Later this week the US is expected to table a draft Security Council resolution that seeks to impose sanctions on Iran for rejecting a UN demand that it suspend its nuclear fuel cycle programme. US officials said they expect tough negotiations with China and Russia.

Yasuhisa Shiozaki, chief cabinet secretary, said Monday Japan had no plans to change its ban on nuclear weapons. Thomas Schieffer, US ambassador to Japan, said that, as long as Japan believed the US remained prepared to "trade New York for Tokyo", an independent nuclear deterrent would not make it any safer. "This is not a new situation for Japan. We have been here for 50 years."

Australia – one of the few western countries to have diplomatic relations with Pyongyang as well as being Washington's most important defence ally in the Asia-Pacific region – said it would go beyond the UN resolution by banning North Korean ships from entering its ports.

Additional reporting by David Pilling in Tokyo and Virginia Marsh in Sydney

China Boosts N. Korea Border Inspections (AP)

By Ng Han Guan And Audra Ang, Associated Press Writers

AP, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082227

Customs officials examined trucks at the North Korean border Monday as China complied with new U.N. sanctions on Pyongyang for its nuclear test. But China's U.N. ambassador indicated its inspectors will not board ships to search for suspicious equipment or material.

The United States began a new round of diplomacy in Asia to address divisions over how to impose the sanctions, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to arrive in Japan on Wednesday before traveling to South Korea and China. The U.S. announced that air samples gathered last week contain radioactive materials confirming that North Korea conducted an underground nuclear explosion, as it claimed.

China's support is key to whether the measures will have any impact on neighboring North Korea. Beijing's mixed response on implementing the sanctions, approved Saturday by a unanimous U.N. Security Council including China, demonstrates the difficulties U.S. diplomats will encounter as they tour the region.

China and Russia contend that interdicting ships might needlessly provoke the North and at the very least discourage it from returning to talks on its nuclear program — though the U.S. and Britain say most inspections of ships would be done at ports rather than on the high seas. Australia announced it was banning the North's ships from entering its ports, except in dire emergencies.

While China is angry over its communist ally's behavior and is loath to appear out of step with other powers, it has been reluctant to support or implement tough measures. The leadership is concerned that tightening the squeeze on Pyongyang might trigger a collapse of the North Korean regime, sending refugees streaming across the border.

In a sign of Beijing's wariness about refugees, construction of a massive concrete and barbed wire fence along parts of its 880-mile border with the North has picked up in recent days. Scores of soldiers have arrived in communities along the banks of the Yalu River, up from Dandong, over the past week to erect the barrier, farmers and visitors to the area said.

"The move is mainly aimed at North Korean defectors," said Professor Kim Woo-jun at the Institute of East and West Studies in Seoul, South Korea. "As the U.N. sanctions are enforced ... the number of defectors are likely to increase as the regime can't take care of its people."

The sanctions ban trade with the North in major weapons and materials that could be used in its ballistic missile and weapons of mass destruction programs. They call for all countries to inspect cargo to and from North Korea to enforce the prohibition, "as necessary," and consistent with each nation's laws.

In some areas of the border, the Chinese seem to have stepped up inspections, though elsewhere a police officer said nothing had changed and inspections were continuing as usual.

At a border-crossing post in the Chinese city of Dandong, about 30 Chinese trucks were seen being checked on Monday morning while 50 empty North Korean trucks waited in line to enter China to pick up cargo.

Customs officers opened the back of each truck and looked at its cargo as it rolled up, though they didn't open individual boxes or bags. By contrast, reporters who visited the border post last week didn't see inspectors open any trucks.

In the afternoon, the officers repeated the process as loaded North Korean trucks returned home. They climbed into the back of the vehicles, but observers couldn't see whether they opened any containers.

Trading companies in Dandong, at the western end of the border, and in Tumen, near the eastern end, said the sanctions were not affecting shipments.

"Today, we just sent a batch of agricultural tools to North Korea by truck," said Huang Kelin, manager of Wanshida Trading Co., a Dandong-based firm that has an office in Pyongyang.

At the Nanping crossing, in an eastern valley surrounded by mountains, inspectors were going through a standard regimen, looking at both cargo and passengers, a police officer said. "The inspections are routine and conducted by quarantine officials," said the officer, Li Canhao.

Chinese goods reach the North by road and rail, while oil is delivered mainly via pipeline. It wasn't immediately clear what China was doing to inspect rail shipments. A lone locomotive headed into North Korea on Monday afternoon, apparently to pull a cargo train back to China. The North also has a rail link to Russia in the east, though it wasn't clear how that was being policed.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said his country would implement the Security Council resolution and inspect cargo from North Korea for illegal weapons and missiles, but he indicated Chinese inspectors would not board ships. He noted that inspections are not mandatory under the resolution, intended to punish the North for its Oct. 9 nuclear test.

"This is a resolution we have to implement," Wang told reporters at the U.N. "The question was raised whether China will do inspections. Inspections yes, but inspection is different then interdiction and interception. I think different countries will do it different ways."

Wang's remarks represented a change from those he made Saturday after joining the council in voting to impose tough sanctions on North Korea for its Oct. 9 nuclear test. He initially objected to China's conducting inspections because of concerns that cargo checks would raise tensions with the North rather than persuade Pyongyang to return to six-party talks on its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0082228

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin, when asked about interdicting ships, said Monday that "one has to be very careful about it."

"When you go into inspection and things like that, cargo, one has to be very careful to avoid any kind of semblance of provocation," Churkin said.

North Korea's total foreign trade was less than $4 billion last year, though it is growing quickly, according to Chinese and South Korean figures. China accounted for a major portion of that trade, with $1.7 billion in exports and $500 million in imports, according to the Commerce Ministry in Beijing. China also provides up to 90 percent of the North's oil.

There are also questions about how strictly South Korea will enforce the U.N. resolution. The South has significant trade relations with North Korea and its citizens worry about a conventional attack by their unpredictable neighbor.

North Korea's No. 2 ranking leader, Kim Yong Nam, defiantly said the regime would strengthen its military and "achieve a final victory in the historic standoff with the U.S."

The North found a sympathetic ear in Iran, which has also been condemned for its nuclear program. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Monday rejected the American-initiated measures and accused the U.S. of using the U.N. Security Council as a "weapon to impose its hegemony."

In Washington, Rice warned that U.N. sanctions on North Korea should also be seen by Iran as a strong signal to abandon its nuclear ambitions or face a rebuke from a united international community.

"The Iranian government is watching," she said. "It can now see that the international community will respond" to efforts to acquire nuclear weapons.

Ng Han Guan reported from Dandong and Audra Ang reported from Beijing. AP writer Edith M. Lederer contributed from the United Nations.

U.S. Confirms N. Korea Blast Was Nuclear (USAT)

By Bill Nichols And Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration confirmed on Monday for the first time that North Korea conducted an underground nuclear test last week. The office of National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said radioactive materials found in air samples confirmed the test.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed concern that North Korea might be planning a second test. “We're watching it,” she told reporters. “I hope they would not take such a provocative act.”

In a statement, Negroponte's office said the blast was small by standards of nuclear tests; less than 1 kiloton. Each kiloton is equal to the force produced by 1,000 tons of TNT. The bomb the United States dropped on Hiroshima was 15 kilotons.

The confirmation came as Rice prepared to visit Japan, South Korea and China this week to try to shore up efforts by Asian allies to punish North Korea.

A United Nations Security Council resolution passed Saturday calls for nations to prevent North Korea from buying or selling specified weapons and technology. The measure also bans some luxury goods from North Korea and freezes funds outside the country that are associated with weapons programs.

North Korea's neighbors pledged to abide by the resolution. Even China, which had expressed concerns about inspecting cargo bound for North Korea, on Monday checked trucks going to North Korea from the city of Dandong.

China's U.N. ambassador said Beijing would not stop and board ships, however. “The question was raised whether China will do inspections,” Ambassador Wang Guangya told reporters. “Inspections yes, but inspection is different then interdiction and interception.”

China historically has opposed actions that might destabilize the North Korean regime and send thousands of refugees across the 880-mile border the nations share.

Rice, who is to arrive in Japan on Wednesday, said she was “not concerned that the Chinese are going to turn their backs on their obligations.”

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Monday that his country was considering more sanctions. Australia said it would also ban North Korea's ships from entering its ports, except in emergencies.

North Korea remained defiant. The No. 2 ranking leader, Kim Yong Nam, said the country would strengthen its military and “achieve a final victory in the historic standoff with the U.S.”

DOJ_NMG_0082229

U.S. Expects China's Backing On N. Korea (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug

AP, October 17, 2006

The Bush administration, citing new inspections by the Chinese of trucks bound for North Korea, said Monday it expected China would do its part in enforcing a U.N. resolution punishing its reclusive ally for its nuclear program.

The United States is pressing China for tough action against North Korea ahead of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's trip this week to Asia.

R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, pointed to the fact that Chinese customs inspectors had begun inspecting cargo trucks bound for North Korea in the border city of Dandong. Japan and Australia, meanwhile, announced Monday that they might take measures beyond the new U.N. sanctions against North Korea for that country's reported nuclear test.

"We have indications this morning the Chinese are beginning to apply this to their very long land border" with North Korea, Burns said on CBS' "The Early Show." "We also have announcements from Japan and Australia. I spoke to both governments this morning. They are both implementing this."

He said there will be "enormous pressure on China to live up to their responsibility" in enforcing United Nations punishment of its ally, North Korea. "We are all banking on that."

White House press secretary Tony Snow said President Bush had not personally been making any calls Monday on the matter. Snow urged patience before judging China's commitment to the inspections.

"The parties have committed to fulfilling its conditions," Snow said. "Let's see what happens, all right?"

Rice travels to the region Tuesday for a series of talks aimed at easing tensions among countries already on edge from the North's claimed nuclear test.

China, which voted Saturday for the U.N. penalties, has balked at cargo inspections to prevent trafficking of certain banned weapons and technology.

"I'm quite certain that China is going to live up to its responsibilities," Rice said Sunday, adding she was willing to have "conversations" during her trip on how best to enforce the resolution.

The United States' U.N. ambassador portrayed North Korea's detonation last week as a public humiliation for China, which shares a long border with North Korea and is the North's chief ally and supplier of crucial shipments of food and energy aid.

If China were to cut its support, John Bolton said, it "would be powerfully persuasive in Pyongyang," the North's capital. "They've not yet been willing to do it. I think that China has a heavy responsibility here."

Rice, who joined Bolton in making the rounds of the Sunday talk shows, plans to visit Asian partners this week to consult about the resolution. "I understand that people are concerned about how it might work so it doesn't enhance tensions in the region, and we're perfectly willing to have those conversations," Rice said.

Bolton said the United States' concept of the resolution "is that the overwhelming predominance of the inspections would take place in ports or at land crossings or that sort of thing. But the resolution neither increases nor decreases existing authority to interdict on the high seas."

The U.S.-sponsored resolution demands North Korea eliminate nuclear weapons but rules out military action against the country, as the Russians and Chinese demanded.

After the resolution unanimously passed, North Korea's U.N. ambassador accused council members of a "gangster-like" action that neglects the nuclear threat posed by the United States.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said his country "strongly urges the countries concerned to adopt a prudent and responsible attitude in this regard and refrain from taking any provocative steps that may intensify the tensions."

Meanwhile, a leading Senate Republican urged direct talks with North Korea, as the reclusive nation has sought. "We do need to engage the North Koreans" because the U.N. resolution is weak and limited, said Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, the second-ranking Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

But Rice brushed aside such calls, reaffirming the U.S. commitment to six-nation disarmament talks, which have stalled.

Critics said the U.N. penalties will not curb North Korea's nuclear ambitions and stemmed from what they saw as President Bush's failed foreign policy.

Democratic Sen. John Kerry said the Bush administration is "living in a complete fantasy with respect to the foreign policy they put in place. It is a failure." He said U.S. involvement in Iraq has undermined America's credibility to deal with nuclear threats in North Korea and Iran.

Japan's Pacifism Is Tested Anew By U.N. Sanctions (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0082230

By Yuka Hayashi

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

Efforts to Take Active Role In Steps Against North Korea Pose Constitutional Dilemma

TOKYO -- A United Nations resolution to impose sanctions on North Korea for its apparent testing of a nuclear weapon provides a new test for Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe: how to play an assertive role without straying from the nation's nonmilitaristic constitution.

Saturday, the U.N. Security Council voted to ban trade of most weapons and all luxury goods with North Korea. Yesterday, the U.S. said air samples gathered last week contain radioactive materials that confirm North Korea conducted an underground nuclear explosion in Kilu County, North Hamkyung province.

Amid concern about the lengths to which China would go to enforce the resolution, China's U.N. ambassador said yesterday that Beijing would inspect cargo from North Korea for illegal weapons and missiles. He also indicated China wouldn't stop and board ships to conduct searches.

China already has begun inspecting cargo trucks bound for North Korea, the Associated Press reported, evidence that U.S. Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns cited as an encouraging sign.

Meanwhile, Japan is trying to figure out how to participate in a provision of the resolution -- pushed for by Washington and Tokyo despite opposition from China and South Korea -- that allows nations to board North Korean ships suspected of carrying banned items and inspect their cargo.

Preparing to depart for Japan today on an Asian trip focused almost completely on addressing the North Korea situation, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she plans to confirm U.S. commitments to help defend both Japan and South Korea in the face of any threats. While in Seoul and Beijing, Ms. Rice also plans to urge China and South Korea to participate in sharing intelligence and interdicting suspect shipments of arms or nuclear material to or from North Korea, as sketched out in the U.N. resolution.

Japan's pacifist constitution would make it difficult for it to inspect any ships. Japan limits its military forces to self-defense only and is allowed to dispatch troops overseas only for peacekeeping or disaster relief or when Japan encounters serious threat of attack. If Japan sent soldiers aboard a North Korean ship and they were attacked, the current rules provide no clear guidelines on how they should respond.

Officials are considering invoking for the first time a clause in a 1999 law that allows its self-defense forces to provide support functions to the U.S. military under a special situation: if Japan faces an emergency situation in the Asian region in which a direct military attack on the country seems imminent.

Foreign Minister Taro Aso says the current situation is indeed an emergency, since Japan could be the first target of any potential North Korean attack. "We are being asked to take cooperative action" by the U.N., Mr. Aso said in a talk show televised on Sunday. "Naturally, we will respond by doing everything we can." For example, Japan may be able to use its surveillance system to alert the U.S. of the approach of suspicious North Korean ships, he said.

Japan's attempt to play an active role in condemning North Korea reflects an attempt by the 52-year-old Mr. Abe, who became prime minister last month, to give Japan greater influence in East Asia. Mr. Abe has visited China and South Korea in an effort to improve its relations with neighboring countries.

It also is the latest example of Japan's effort to have its military, known as Self-Defense Forces, take on greater responsibility outside its borders. In the aftermath of the 2001 terrorist attacks in the U.S., Japan passed a special law that allowed its forces to assist U.S. ships patrolling the Indian Ocean by providing fuel and transporting supplies. In the most dangerous and largest overseas deployment of its forces since World War II, Japan in 2004 sent 550 troops to southern Iraq to rebuild infrastructure.

J. Thomas Schieffer, the U.S. ambassador to Japan, reiterated yesterday that he expects Japan to make a substantial contribution in the sanctions against North Korea. Japan's pacifist constitution means that "it's not as easy for them to participate in a sanction regime," he told reporters. "But I'm confident that the Japanese will be able to figure out a way to participate in a meaningful way."

In addition to the U.N.-approved measures, Japan has imposed sanctions of its own, including closing its ports to all North Korean ships.

--Neil King Jr. in Washington contributed to this article.

Russia Demands U.S. Lift Sanctions (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082231

Russia demanded Monday that the United States lift sanctions against two Russian companies accused of making deals with Iran involving sensitive technology and hinted that a U.S. refusal could affect negotiations on a U.N. sanctions resolution against Tehran.

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said the sanctions against state arms exporter Rosoboronexport and top aircraft maker Sukhoi for allegedly violating a U.S. law known as the Iran Nonproliferation Act of 2000, create a "predicament" for Moscow.

If Russia is asked to vote on a Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on Iran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment at the same time that Russian companies are subject to U.S. sanctions, it would be voting on a measure "which at least by implication supports sanctions which have already been imposed on us," he said.

"So it is a somewhat ridiculous, bizarre political predicament," Churkin said. "The other side of it is that we don't know why those sanctions were imposed on the two organizations back in Russia."

Churkin said Russia wants the sanctions lifted off the two companies, whether or not U.N. sanctions are leveled against Iran. He made his comments as France, Britain and Germany were consulting on elements for a U.N. sanctions resolution against Iran.

The U.S. alleges the Russian companies have made deals with Iran involving sensitive technology.

Russia has objected to the U.S. law, and both Russian companies deny any violation.

Iran insists its uranium enrichment program is purely for peaceful means — to provide nuclear energy — but Washington and its European allies suspect Tehran's real goal is nuclear weapons.

Under the sanctions imposed against the Russian companies in early August, the U.S. government is prohibited from dealing with them. The sanctions also suspend any export licenses to the companies for certain products considered sensitive, and prohibit issuance of new licenses.

In late August, U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Moscow and Washington disagreed over the facts in the case and that he agreed to have the matter reconsidered.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said Churkin had not spoken to him about lifting U.S. sanctions against the two Russian companies. "We are going to be moving this week on the Iran sanctions question and I suppose I'll hear it at that point," he said.

China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said he was told that the French might share their ideas of possible elements for a Security Council resolution against Iran by the end of the week. Diplomats said the elements would likely be presented by both France and Britain.

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said Monday the European Union would back imposing sanctions against Iran while keeping the door open to future negotiations to resolve the nuclear standoff.

Churkin softened his stance somewhat when asked if Russia would block an Iran sanctions resolution if U.S. sanctions against the two companies weren't lifted.

"I don't want to make any strong statements to that effect," he said.

Churkin also signaled that Moscow is in no hurry to adopt a resolution against Iran.

Unlike North Korea, which conducted a nuclear test, he said, "the current state of things" with Iran doesn't require a vote within days.

U.S. Eases Push For Egypt Reforms (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 17, 2006

CAIRO — Last year, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice canceled a visit to Cairo to protest the arrest of an Egyptian opposition leader, Ayman Nour.

A few months later, she gave a speech at the American University of Cairo in which she called on Egypt to “put its faith in its own people” and enact democratic reforms.

When Rice visited here earlier this month during a tour of the Middle East, not much had changed: Nour was back in jail, along with thousands of other political prisoners; and political reforms seemed to be on hold.

Critics, including two Egyptian political analysts, say Egypt has retreated on the democracy front since it permitted several candidates to run for president last year. Last week, the government accused Talaat Sadat, a member of parliament and nephew of slain Egyptian leader Anwar Sadat, of defaming the Egyptian military by alleging that officers were involved in his uncle's 1981 assassination. Gonzalo Gallegos, a State Department spokesman, said the Bush administration “is keeping an eye on the case and will see how things progress.”

“The mood here is very despondent,” said Hani Shukrallah of the Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo.

DOJ_NMG_0082232

The most populous nation in the Arab world, with a history that goes back thousands of years, Egypt has been a political and cultural trendsetter in the region. In the 1950s, a military coup led by army Col. Gamal Abdel Nasser overthrew a British-backed monarchy and established an authoritarian government. Similar coups followed in Iraq and Syria. When Nasser died, he was succeeded by his vice president, Anwar Sadat.

The current president, Hosni Mubarak, was Sadat's vice president and took power in 1981 when Sadat was assassinated by Muslim extremists opposed to Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel.

Shukrallah said many Egyptians believe Mubarak, 78, elected to a fifth six-year term last year, will orchestrate his succession within the next few years. His preferred replacement: his son, Gamal, 42.

Asked about the succession, Rice said it was "not something that the U.S. should, can or will have an opinion" about.

Shukrallah said U.S. reluctance to challenge the younger Mubarak reflects the U.S. need for Egyptian cooperation to try to restart the Palestinian-Israeli peace process and deal with the rising challenge from Iran.

"There is a sense that the inheritance of power will happen, and nothing is happening in terms of political reform," he said.

Amr Hamzawy, an Egyptian scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, said Gamal Mubarak took a leading role in a recent convention of Egypt's ruling National Democratic Party.

The younger Mubarak gave a major speech in which he said Egypt would develop nuclear power. Hamzawy said this was an attempt to attract popular support. "There is lots of speculation that President Mubarak will resign in 2008," he said.

The Bush administration, like its predecessors — Republican and Democratic — has supported Egypt with an annual $2 billion in aid since Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel. In the aftermath of 9/11, however, President Bush began calling for democratic reforms in Egypt and the wider Middle East, arguing that U.S. support for authoritarian governments helped foster the rage and frustration that produced al-Qaeda and other terrorist groups.

Rice says that there has been no change in policy. She spoke in Cairo about "the non-negotiable demands of human dignity, which means the right to choose those who will govern you, the right to worship as you please, the right to educate your girls and your boys, the right to be free from the arbitrary power of the state."

Recent events in the Middle East, however, have complicated U.S. efforts to push democracy here. The United States does not want to annoy allied governments at a time when the region is increasingly unstable, says Rashid Khalidi, director of Middle East studies at Columbia University.

Iraq is increasingly chaotic and violent despite having several successful elections. Iran is growing in influence, partly because of its support for Shiite militias in Iraq and its backing of Hezbollah, which battled Israel last summer in Lebanon. Elections have strengthened the militant Hamas movement in the Palestinian territories and the Muslim Brotherhood, a veteran fundamentalist group, in Egypt. The United States refuses to deal with either group, branding them as terrorists.

Khalidi says the U.S. government has quietly "shelved its democracy-promotion efforts" because it now understands that "democracy would put in power policies and groups opposed to almost everything the administration stands for."

The Muslim Brotherhood, although outlawed, won 88 of 444 seats in parliamentary elections earlier this year by running independent candidates — the strongest showing ever by an Egyptian opposition group. Abdel Moneim Abul Fottouh, a member of the brotherhood's 15-member leadership council, said the party would have done even better had the government allowed truly free elections. More than 90 members of the organization remain in jail of thousands arrested during the elections, he said, even though the group renounced violence more than a decade ago.

Secular parties in Egypt are weaker. Nour was one of a handful of opposition candidates allowed to run against Mubarak last year. He was jailed after the elections. Founder of a party called "Tomorrow," Nour was sentenced to five years in prison on charges he forged petition signatures to register the party.

Rice said the Bush administration has not given up on democratic reforms but that each country has to move at its own pace. "The process of democracy has its ups and its downs," she said. "It remains a part of our agenda. Ultimately we believe that a democratic Middle East is going to be a more peaceful Middle East."

Israeli Premier Says He Would Talk To Lebanese And Palestinians (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 16 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told the Israeli Parliament on Monday that he was willing to meet the leaders of Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority in an effort to ease regional tensions, though no such meetings appear imminent.

It was the first day of Parliament's winter session, and was marked by the absence of the president, Moshe Katsav, who would normally address legislators.

DOJ_NMG_0082233

The Israeli police recommended Sunday that Mr. Katsav face charges of rape and sexual assault committed against women who worked for him. With the attorney general now reviewing the case to determine whether to file charges, Mr. Katsav canceled plans to attend Monday's session at the Knesset, or Parliament, in Jerusalem.

Israeli prime ministers often use the opening of Parliament's winter session to set out a diplomatic agenda, and Mr. Olmert raised the possibility of talks with Lebanon's prime minister, Fouad Siniora, and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas.

"I want to take this opportunity to call on Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora to meet with me face to face," Mr. Olmert said.

Mr. Olmert has broached the possibility on several occasions, and Mr. Siniora has shot it down each time, and did so again on Monday.

In Beirut, Mr. Siniora's office issued a statement saying that he had "announced more than once that Lebanon will be the last Arab country to sign a peace deal with Israel."

"I pledge to work tirelessly to take advantage of any opportunity, any crack, any possibility of holding negotiations that will lead to real dialogue with responsible representatives of the Palestinian people," Mr. Olmert said.

But he reiterated that no real progress was possible until Cpl. Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier was released. He was captured by Palestinian militants on June 25. The Palestinians, in turn, are seeking freedom for a large number of Palestinian prisoners held by Israel.

In a wide-ranging speech, Mr. Olmert made no mention of his plan to withdraw from some Jewish settlements in the West Bank. That was the dominant theme of his election campaign in the spring.

But since then, Mr. Olmert's popularity has fallen sharply, with many Israelis critical of his handling of the war in Lebanon. His failure to mention the West Bank withdrawal plan appeared to confirm the widespread belief that it was on hold indefinitely.

On other issues, Mr. Olmert said he believed that moderate Arab countries were building closer ties to guard against what he called threats from Iran and Islamic militants.

He also repeated his call for the international community to act against Iran's nuclear program. Israel says that Iran is aggressively seeking nuclear weapons, which Iran denies.

Mr. Olmert will travel to Russia on Tuesday and is expected to raise the issue with President Vladimir V. Putin. Russia has helped Iran develop its nuclear program and has opposed sanctions.

Meanwhile, Mr. Katsav, who has served in the mostly ceremonial position of president since 2000, is facing increasing pressure to step down.

"There is a sense that corruption has reached the highest level of Israeli society, and that this must be cleaned up," said Shlomo Aronson, a political science professor at Hebrew University.

Nahum Barnea, a leading newspaper columnist, wrote in Yediot Aharonot: "The man Moshe Katsav is innocent as long as it has not been proven otherwise. But the man is one thing and the president another. President Moshe Katsav cannot continue in his position much longer."

Israel Rejects Syrian Offer On The Golan Heights (MCT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

McClatchy Newspapers, October 17, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria - The first and last thing that Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem looks at each day at work is a large map of the Middle East with the Israeli-occupied Golan Heights shaded in distinctive brown.

"This is my territory," Moallem said as he pointed to the land at the heart of chilly relations between Syria and Israel. "This is my life."

In the wake of this summer's war in Lebanon, the Golan Heights have re-emerged at the center of the latest land-for-peace proposal that some see as a chance to reshape regional dynamics. In an unexpected move, Syrian President Bashar Assad has offered to end his conflict with Israel if it gives back the disputed territory it's held for nearly 40 years.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and influential U.S. diplomats have rejected the proposal as a meaningless feint from a weak authoritarian ruler. But others, including a growing number of influential Israelis, see the offer as an opportunity to jump-start dormant negotiations at a time when the Middle East is drifting towards further instability.

Israel's defense minister, internal security minister and some of its veteran peace negotiators have urged Olmert to use the opening to lure Syria away from its alliance with hard-line groups that they think pose a greater threat to regional stability.

DOJ_NMG_0082234

"I believe it is imperative for Israel to penetrate and shatter the vicious triangle comprised of Iran, Syria and Hamas by creating an impenetrable channel of communication," Uri Savir, Israel's chief negotiator of the Oslo peace accords with the Palestinians, wrote in The Jerusalem Post.

Assad surprised Israel with the offer. Only weeks earlier, as Israeli soldiers began withdrawing from Lebanon after a stalemated fight with the militant group Hezbollah, Assad delivered a derisive speech in which he hailed Hezbollah and said it had "shattered the myth of an invincible army."

Now the 40-year-old Syrian president is offering to sit down with Israel and talk.

In an interview with McClatchy Newspapers, Moallem said Syria was willing to normalize relations with Israel for the first time in history if Israel returned the Golan Heights, a vast swath of mountains that it captured during the 1967 Six Day War.

"Between Syria and Israel, the issue that stands between us is the Golan Heights," Moallem said. "After each war there is a narrow window of opportunity for peace, and it depends on what effort and message you do to enlarge it."

Moallem said the Syrian offer was likely to stand for only a few months, and Assad has warned that he may consider attacking Israel if his entreaties are rebuffed.

"My hope for peace could change one day," Assad told the German magazine Der Spiegel late last month. "And when hope disappears, then maybe war really is the only answer."

That threat has kept Israel's military on alert along the Syrian border, although few expect Syria to attack anytime soon, if at all.

Assad's offer has been rejected by Olmert, who wants to see Syria sever its links to Hezbollah and the militant group Hamas before they agree to peace talks.

On Monday, Olmert repeated his rejection in a speech before the Israeli parliament.

U.S. officials also have rejected Assad's gesture.

"We ask him to step outside his office and do something about the situation in his capital city, where there are enemies of peace who operate freely from Damascus and conduct terror activities in the Palestinian territories and in Israel," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State David C. Welch told the U.S.-backed Alhurra Television network last week. "If his desire and vision for peace are accurate and real, he would do something about those things."

Moallem dismissed such demands as the unrealistic rhetoric of an American administration that's done nothing but destabilize the Middle East with its uncompromising policies.

"When the Americans are moderate, Syria will be moderate," he said.

Even if Israel were to launch talks with Syria, the initiative could be derailed quickly by the probe into last year's assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. A preliminary investigation suggested that high-level Syrian officials were behind the attack, which forced Assad to pull his troops out of Lebanon.

Still, coming at a time when there are few peaceful options in the simmering Middle East, a growing number of Israeli officials, Western diplomats in the region and intellectuals see a chance to isolate Iran further and undermine militant groups.

"A peace accord with Syria would deal a mortal blow to the current regime in Tehran and would bring its end closer," Israeli commentator Sever Plocker wrote. "A Syrian-Israeli peace will pull the rug out from beneath the feet of the terrorist organizations that are based in Damascus, will help the Palestinians regain their sanity and will serve as leverage for a comprehensive Israeli-Arab peace."

Assad's offer is Syria's latest attempt to settle the long-standing dispute over the Golan Heights. The president made a similar offer three years ago, which was greeted with the same skepticism. Perhaps the best chance to settle the issue came in 2000, when U.S.-brokered negotiations broke down over whether Israel would give Syria access to the Sea of Galilee.

Suicide Bomber Kills 94 In Northern Sri Lanka (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Oct. 16 — A suicide bomber rammed a truck packed with explosives into a military convoy on Monday, killing at least 94 people and wounding 150. The explosion, about 100 miles northeast of the capital, was one of the deadliest attacks since a 2002 cease-fire between the government and separatist Tamils.

The government blamed the rebels, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, for the attack, a charge the group neither acknowledged nor denied. The vast majority of those killed and wounded were sailors, but a military spokesman said some civilians were caught in the explosion.

“This is a barbaric terrorist act,” said Keheliya Rambukwella, the government’s military spokesman. “It clearly shows that peace is not on the agenda of the L.T.T.E. and they don’t care about international opinion.”

DOJ_NMG_0082235

But he said the government still planned to attend peace talks with the rebels, which are being brokered by Norway and are to resume Oct. 28 in Geneva after an eight-month hiatus. The separatists have said they may back out of the talks.

Monday's attack was yet another sign that the four-year-old cease-fire was no longer being observed, even though neither the government nor the rebels have publicly disavowed it. It was also part of an increase in violence over the last year: more than 2,000 people, half of them civilians, have been killed in fighting since April, according to the Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission.

The explosion occurred on the day that Japan's special envoy to Sri Lanka, Yasushi Akashi, met with President Mahinda Rajapaksa to shore up support for the peace talks. Norway's envoy, Jon Hanssen-Bauer, and an American assistant secretary of state, Richard A. Boucher, are to arrive later in the week to try to ensure that the talks go ahead.

Mr. Hanssen-Bauer is to meet with separatist leaders on Thursday to encourage them to attend; the rebels said they would give their final answer then.

The truck bomber on Monday crashed into a convoy of 24 buses carrying unarmed navy personnel going on leave or returning to duty. The convoy was stopped at a transit center outside Habarana. About 340 navy personnel were at the center.

Brig. Prasad Samarasinghe, a military spokesman, said he believed that the attack was an act of revenge against the navy, which he said had succeeded in many recent attempts to stop the rebels from smuggling arms and explosives. On Sunday, the navy sank a suspected Tiger vessel that it said was transporting weapons off the northwestern coast.

Hours after the attack, Kfir fighter jets attacked a northern rebel stronghold, said Air Chief Marshal Donald Perera, head of Sri Lanka's armed forces.

Tamil rebels say they need their own state because the Sinhalese majority discriminates against Tamils.

Attack Kills 93 Sailors In Sri Lanka (WP/AP)

By Krishan Francis

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Oct. 16 -- Suspected Tamil rebels rammed a truck packed with explosives into a convoy of military buses Monday, killing at least 93 sailors in one of the deadliest insurgent attacks since a 2002 cease-fire.

The military said more than 150 were wounded in the attack near the town of Dambulla, about 90 miles northeast of the capital, Colombo.

President Mahinda Rajapakse's office said in a statement that the attack "was further proof" that the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam had an "unmitigated commitment to violence to achieve its ends."

The rebel group, the president's office said, is "in total disregard of international demands for it to abandon violence and seek peaceful means to achieve its goals."

The attack came as a Japanese envoy met with the president Monday amid intensified diplomatic efforts to strengthen the peace process between the government and rebels ahead of scheduled talks between the two sides this month in Switzerland.

It was not clear what effect the attack would have on those talks. There was no immediate comment on the attack from the rebels, although they routinely deny involvement.

The Japanese envoy, Yasushi Akashi, was also scheduled to travel to the rebels' stronghold in the north to talk with the Tiger leadership. A Japanese Embassy spokesman said he had no information yet on whether those plans would change following the attack.

Thorfinnur Omarsson, a spokesman for the Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission, urged the government and rebels to keep their commitment to the peace talks.

"Obviously, this is a brutal attack and a serious threat to the peace process," Omarsson said. "But the people of Sri Lanka deserve that the talks will take place as planned."

Norwegian peace envoy Jon Hanssen-Bauer was scheduled to return to the island this week. U.S. envoy Richard Boucher will make a two-day visit to Sri Lanka starting Thursday.

Sri Lanka recently has seen some of the bloodiest fighting since a Norwegian-brokered cease-fire was signed in 2002, temporarily ending nearly two decades of civil war. Heavy battles last Wednesday on the northern Jaffna Peninsula left hundreds of combatants dead, despite commitments by both the government and rebels to return to the negotiating table.

The rebel Tamil Tigers have been fighting since 1983 for a separate homeland for the Tamil minority in the north and east, citing decades of discrimination by the majority Sinhalese. About 65,000 people were killed before the 2002 cease-fire.

Venezuela Is Denied Security Council Seat (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Juan Forero, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082236

New Vote Scheduled Today as Intensive Campaign Fails to Win Two-Thirds of Ballots

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 16 -- Venezuela was stymied Monday in its bid to win a seat on the U.N. Security Council, a result that shocked diplomats who had expected President Hugo Chavez's leftist, oil-rich government to gain a platform on the international stage.

Guatemala finished ahead of Venezuela in nine of the first 10 rounds of secret voting held by the U.N. General Assembly. But neither secured the required two-thirds vote to succeed Argentina on Jan. 1 in the open Latin American seat on the 15-nation council.

Voting will resume Tuesday.

Delegates at the United Nations had predicted that Venezuela would easily receive enough support for the seat, but the opening ballot showed Guatemala ahead 114 to 74. Venezuela gained votes through the day but never did better than a 93 to 93 tie with Guatemala. Afterward, several envoys expressed surprise that Venezuela had fared so poorly.

The result came as a relief to the United States, which had lobbied actively on behalf of Guatemala. Chavez's government, U.S. officials warned, would play a destructive role on the council, lending its support to those countries, including Iran, Sudan and North Korea, that have defied the United Nations.

It also represented a personal blow to Chavez, who had run a costly political campaign that involved millions of dollars in aid to poor countries as well as state visits to Russia, China and the Middle East.

Chavez may have undercut his country's chances with a provocative speech last month before the General Assembly, in which he described President Bush as "the devil." And once-solid support for Venezuela in South America, from countries including Chile and Paraguay, wavered after Chavez's government entered into a military pact with Bolivia, which has lost territory to both those countries.

The United States, Britain, China, Russia and France enjoy permanent membership on the 15-member Security Council. The other 10 seats are distributed regionally for two-year terms; a vote by the General Assembly fills five seats each year. South Africa, Indonesia, Italy and Belgium were easily elected Monday for their regions.

But the deadlock over the Latin American seat raised the prospect of a long election and that a compromise candidate -- possibly Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay or Chile -- might enter the race. Mexico and Cuba received single votes on some ballots Monday.

Chavez has been hostile to Washington for years, but he has been particularly antagonistic since the White House offered tacit support for a 2002 coup that briefly removed him from power. Venezuela's U.N. ambassador, Francisco Javier Arias Cardenas, characterized the race as a challenge between a fearless champion of the developing world and the world's lone superpower.

"We are not competing with a brother country. We are competing with the biggest power on the planet," he said.

Some delegates said Chavez's Sept. 20 speech alienated moderate members who felt he had violated U.N. protocol.

For those who view the General Assembly chamber as "a very sacrosanct place," Chavez's performance exhibited "bad taste," said Tanzania's ambassador, Augustine P. Mahiga. "It can be a platform for the battle of ideas but not for the vilification of one country."

Mahiga said, however, that Washington's intensive promotion of Guatemala's bid may have helped its cause in some capitals and "swayed" others to vote against it.

"It's a double-edged sword," he said. The race was "perceived as a contest between the United States and Venezuela."

Alberto Garrido, an author and analyst in Caracas who has written several books on Chavez, said the vote is a serious setback for Chavez's campaign to project Venezuelan influence beyond Latin America.

Venezuela has bought foreign debt from Argentina, sold crude oil at cut-rate prices to smaller Caribbean islands and provided aid to Africa -- all efforts designed, in part, to counter U.S. influence.

"This is a big setback in Chavez's strategy," said Garrido, whose latest book, "Chavez's Wars," deals with the president's conflicts with the Bush administration and other foes. "He had a plan to become the institutionalized voice of the south, if he had gotten that seat. This is a blow, perhaps the biggest blow in his geopolitical strategy."

In Venezuela, the government's failure to secure a seat was called "an embarrassing defeat" by Manuel Rosales, who is running against Chavez in December's presidential election. The president retains the support of a majority of Venezuelans, recent polls have shown, but opponents accuse him of ignoring spiraling crime, chronic unemployment and poverty while he focuses on making a name for himself abroad.

Chavez has spent much of his presidency outside Venezuela. But since July, as the Security Council campaign has built, his travel schedule has become feverish, with trips to Russia, China, Vietnam, Iran and Belarus.

DOJ_NMG_0082237

The Venezuelan government's argument that it would be a voice for those countries suffering at the hands of U.S. imperialism did not strike a chord with enough nations, said Milos Alcalay, a former Venezuelan ambassador to the United Nations.

"To argue that Venezuela would go to the Security Council to be the counterweight against imperialism didn't mesh with the philosophy that this is a body that aims to find things in common," said Alcalay, who resigned his post because of opposition to Chavez's policies.

"This was firstly a rejection of combative language, but it was also a rejection of Venezuela's claim to be the voice of those who do not have a voice, of Africa, the nonaligned," he said. "And really, they do have a voice. Africa elected South Africa as its spokesman."

Forero reported from Quito, Ecuador.

Venezuela Slips In Voting For U.N. Seat (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 16 — Venezuela's campaign to gain Latin America's open seat on the Security Council next year suffered a setback on Monday when Guatemala, backed by the United States, established a wide lead and maintained it after 10 ballots.

Neither country obtained the necessary 125 votes — two-thirds of those voting — to win the seat outright, but Guatemala ended the day with a lead of 110 to 77.

The balloting, which at one point had the countries tied with 93 votes each, resumes Tuesday and could last days, until one prevails or the Latin American group decides to bring forth a compromise candidate.

The initial outcome was a distinct blow to the ambitions of Hugo Chávez, the fiery populist leader of Venezuela, who has turned the contest into a focus of his campaign against Washington, and traveled widely and spent his country's oil largess liberally to promote its candidacy.

Francisco Arias Cárdenas, Venezuela's ambassador, said his country was not battling Guatemala, which he called "a brother country," but "fighting against the owners of the universe."

A Venezuelan victory, he said, would give small and impoverished nations "an independent voice needed on the Security Council to fight against the power of money."

A Security Council seat would also give Mr. Chávez a global platform to vent his grievances against Washington, a reason why the United States has conducted its own vigorous lobbying against the idea.

Mr. Chávez gave a histrionic preview of what could be expected when he addressed the opening of the General Assembly last month and called President Bush "the devil," adding that he could still smell sulfur on the podium where Mr. Bush had spoken the day before.

While the real power on the 15-nation Security Council is exercised by the five permanent members with vetoes — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — Venezuela could be a spoiler in the Council's efforts at consensus and its ability to draft its frequent policy statements, a process that requires unanimity.

While potentially disruptive, Venezuela's presence would have little real effect on resolutions, which need only nine votes (and no vetoes) to pass.

Monday's vote was held to fill the seat being vacated by Argentina, one of the five elected members of the panel finishing their two-year terms at the end of the year.

In uncontested races on Monday, South Africa was named to replace Tanzania, and Belgium and Italy were endorsed to replace Denmark and Greece. Indonesia defeated Nepal for the seat held by Japan.

United Nations rules permit marathon ballots, and a battle between Cuba and Colombia in 1979 continued for two months and 155 rounds until the election of a third candidate, Mexico.

"In the year 2000, I was in Florida for 31 days," said John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, recalling the post-election fight of President Bush to win the presidency that year. "This has just begun."

Guatemala, Venezuela Even For U.N. Seat (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

Venezuela and Guatemala hit a deadlock Monday in their battle for a seat on the powerful U.N. Security Council, after 10 rounds of voting failed to anoint a winner to fill the spot reserved for Latin America.

DOJ_NMG_0082238

Guatemala led in nine of the 10 ballots, but could not get the two-thirds majority necessary to win. Nonetheless, the results were a defeat for Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who had campaigned by railing against the United States and promised to use his nation's voice on the 15-member council to counter Washington's influence.

The other four seats that will come open on the council were filled easily. South Africa, Indonesia, Italy and Belgium will start their terms on the council on Jan. 1, replacing Tanzania, Japan, Denmark and Greece.

Neither Venezuela nor Guatemala appeared willing to drop out of the election, which resumes on Tuesday with another round of balloting. Venezuela's U.N. Ambassador Francisco Arias Cardenas complained the United States has pressured countries worldwide to prevent Venezuela from winning the two-year rotating seat.

"Venezuela will not withdraw — we're fighting until the end," Cardenas said. "We are fighting against the first power of the world, the owners of the universe. We're happy, we're strong and we will continue."

The voting pattern fluctuated through the day. In the early rounds, Guatemala got 116 votes and Venezuela just 70. Then, in the sixth round of voting, they tied at 93 each. On the last vote, Guatemala led again, with 110 to Venezuela's 77. That was still short of the 125 needed to win.

Diplomats said Chavez may have hurt his nation's chances with a bombastic speech at the General Assembly debate in September, when he railed against the United States and called President George W. Bush "the devil" — a speech criticized even by U.S. politicians who had reached out to Chavez.

Yet the vote also reflected the ambivalence toward Guatemala, the preferred American candidate. Even Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal had earlier expressed discomfort about the highly public American campaign against Venezuela and in support of Guatemala.

After the voting ended Monday, Rosenthal said his nation was an "independent voice" that would vote according to its own policies.

"We are an independent country and frankly we resent it a bit being told we are going to toe the line of not only the United States but any other power," Rosenthal said. "We make our own decisions."

Diplomats said it was far too early to think of a compromise candidate to come forward to fill the seat that Argentina will vacate at the end of the year. Peru holds the other seat reserved for Latin America until Dec. 31, 2007.

The record number of ballots for a Security Council seat occurred in 1979, when the General Assembly held 154 unsuccessful votes to choose between Cuba and Colombia. Mexico was then put forward and won in the 155th round.

"Experience here in New York has been that in some cases they've done over 100 ballots," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said. "We've done 10 today, that's just really beginning to get your adrenaline going a little bit, we'll just see how it goes."

After that, Latin American states could agree to put forward a new candidate — but only if the other two agree to step down. Rosenthal acknowledged that the deadlock could not last forever.

"If this goes on for several days and we can see that there's no movement in either of the candidates being able to get two-thirds of the vote, we probably would have to think of a third consensus candidate for the region," Rosenthal said. "But we think the time hasn't come for that yet."

Possible other candidates include Uruguay, Costa Rica, Mexico or Chile, though Chilean Foreign Minister Alejandro Foxley has said his nation is not seeking a spot on the council. That does not rule out Chile being put forward by someone else.

Venezuela has served four times on the Security Council. Guatemala, emerging from years of a brutal U.S.-backed dictatorship, has never had a seat but is a leading contributor of troops to U.N. peacekeeping missions.

In recent months, Chavez has collected pledges of support as he visited about a dozen countries from eastern Europe to Africa. Venezuela's opposition leaders have accused Chavez of squandering millions of dollars on his Security Council campaign while neglecting domestic problems such as rampant crime and acute poverty.

The 10 non-permanent seats on the council are filled by the regional groups for two-year stretches. The other five are occupied by the veto-wielding permanent members: Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

Associated Press Writer Christopher Toothaker in Caracas, Venezuela, contributed to this report.

Link To Chávez May Have Hurt Ecuadorean Candidate (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Oct. 16 — Rafael Correa, the charismatic economist who garnered a surprisingly weak showing Sunday in the first round of voting for president, finds himself in a situation that has plagued leftists in other Latin American elections this year: defending his ties to President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela.

DOJ_NMG_0082239

Álvaro Noboa, a conservative banking and banana magnate, surged ahead by attacking Mr. Correa's admiration for Mr. Chávez and his advocacy of nationalistic economic proposals that seemed inspired by Mr. Chávez's policies. The two candidates are expected to compete in a runoff election on Nov. 26.

"Noboa saw the advantage of running against Correa but also against Chávez," said Simón Cueva, an economist and political analyst at the Corporation for Development Studies, an Ecuadorean research institute.

Mr. Noboa won about 27 percent of the vote and Mr. Correa 22 percent, with about 70 percent of the votes counted on Monday. Mr. Correa challenged the results and said fraud might have marred the count, which suffered from delays. Election officials suspended a contract with the Brazilian company overseeing electronic tabulations.

Mr. Noboa called Mr. Correa a "friend of terrorists, a friend of Chávez, a friend of Cuba." Mr. Correa said Mr. Noboa would rule Ecuador like a "banana plantation."

It has been a challenging week for Mr. Chávez. Venezuela failed to win enough votes on Monday for a seat on the United Nations Security Council, possibly depriving its president of an international platform he desires.

The unexpected results in the election here, meanwhile, point to growing unease in some parts of Latin America with political projects whose ambitions coincide too closely with those of Mr. Chávez.

"Daniel Ortega must be a little nervous," said Michael Shifter, an analyst at Inter-American Dialogue, a policy institute in Washington. Mr. Ortega, who is considered the front-runner in Nicaragua's presidential election next month, has been endorsed by Mr. Chávez, who has been relatively quiet about Mr. Correa's campaign in Ecuador.

The perception of support from Mr. Chávez has been a mixed blessing in other recent elections. Alan García, whose first term as Peru's president ended in hyperinflation, mounted a comeback this year to defeat Ollanta Humala, an ultranationalist former army officer who had been endorsed by Mr. Chávez.

Venezuela's relations with Mexico remain tense after Felipe Calderón, a conservative, defeated Andrés Manuel López Obrador, a leftist, for the presidency this year. Mr. Calderón used images of Mr. Chávez in television ads during the campaign to criticize Mr. López Obrador.

Now Mr. Noboa, a billionaire who controls more than 100 companies in Ecuador and other countries, signaled that he would end diplomatic relations with Venezuela and Cuba if elected. "I'm not a hypocrite," he said in televised comments. "I don't like the double standard."

Issues other than Venezuela have also dominated Ecuador's presidential race. Mr. Noboa wants to negotiate a trade agreement with Washington and favors extending an agreement that would allow American soldiers to remain in Manta, an air base used by the United States military for drug surveillance flights.

Mr. Correa, like most of the other Ecuadorean presidential candidates, disagreed with Mr. Noboa on those issues. Drawing inspiration from Argentina, Mr. Correa also said he wanted to renegotiate Ecuador's foreign debt, a move that worried foreign banks about dealing with another messy default.

Mr. Noboa and Mr. Correa both campaigned as populists, as did Gilmar Gutiérrez, the brother of a deposed former president, who finished third. Mr. Noboa campaigned from the right as a God-fearing businessman, promising cheap housing and handing out free wheelchairs to handicapped supporters.

Mr. Correa promises a "citizen's revolution" by rewriting Ecuador's Constitution. He also evoked an affinity with Mr. Chávez by professing admiration for the Venezuelan's "Bolivarian" ideals.

Mr. Correa said during the campaign that Mr. Chávez was a friend and acknowledged meeting with him in Venezuela as recently as August. He repeatedly denied receiving campaign financing from Venezuela's government.

Almost until the voting on Sunday, the election seemed Mr. Correa's to lose. One opinion poll by Cedatos/Gallup put his support at 37 percent at the start of October, within grasp of winning the 40 percent necessary for a first-round victory. He would also have needed a 10 percentage point lead to win.

Mexican Leftist Suffers Setback In Local Race (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Oct. 16 — The leader of the Mexican left, who has refused to accept his defeat in the summer's presidential race, saw his party take a beating over the weekend in a governor's race widely viewed as a referendum on his charisma and power as a populist.

Though aides to the leftist leader, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, dismissed the loss as a minor setback, his detractors noted that it was the latest in a string of signs that he is losing public support, even in his home state, Tabasco.

DOJ_NMG_0082240

Mr. López Obrador has charged that the July 2 presidential election was fraudulent and declared himself "the legitimate president," after a show-of-hands vote among his supporters at a mass rally last month. The gathering came after Mr. López Obrador's supporters had blockaded major avenues in the capital for six weeks to demand a recount.

The courts, however, awarded a narrow victory to Felipe Calderón, a conservative from President Vicente Fox's party. Leftists loyal to Mr. López Obrador have vowed to keep Mr. Calderón from taking office on Dec. 1, while the leftist leader has promised to set up a parallel government.

But Sunday's election for governor in Tabasco, in the south, suggested that Mr. López Obrador's ability to sway voters has waned since the presidential race. Returning to his home state, Mr. López Obrador, the former mayor of Mexico City, campaigned hard for weeks on behalf of his party's candidate, César Raúl Ojeda. He often upstaged the candidate during the final days of the campaign.

Many Mexicans saw the race as a test of Mr. López Obrador's strength. But with 96 percent of the precincts counted on Monday, the candidate of the centrist Institutional Revolutionary Party, Andrés Rafael Granier, was winning by 10 points.

The election was ugly, however, and leaders of Mr. López Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party said they would challenge the results. Supporters of the rival candidates engaged in street battles and fired guns at the houses of influential politicians as a scare tactic. The voting was also plagued by allegations of vote buying.

Some political analysts said the results showed that the public was fed up with Mr. López Obrador's stubborn reluctance to concede defeat and his reliance on street protests.

"It seems to me to be a catastrophe for him," said Raymundo Riva Palacio, a political columnist for the newspaper El Universal .

Óscar Luis Rodríguez, a longtime member of Mr. López Obrador's party in Tabasco, put it more bluntly. "Andrés Manuel has lost credibility," he told the daily newspaper El Sol. "He has lost respect. Here Andrés Manuel was born, and here he has been buried."

César Yáñez, a spokesman for Mr. López Obrador, said such political obituaries were premature. Mr. López Obrador still plans to hold a faux inauguration on Nov. 21 and then tour the country as an alternative president, he said.

Daniel Lund, a pollster and political analyst, said the loss owed more to Mr. Ojeda's weakness as a candidate and to the low turnout than to Mr. López Obrador's fall from favor.

There have been other signs of cracks in the support for Mr. López Obrador. The party's founder, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, has repudiated him, and its four governors have refused his request not to recognize Mr. Calderón as president.

Most politicians and strategists here still expect some kind of mass protest from Mr. López Obrador's supporters in December, and a steady drumbeat of criticism in the future. But few now predict that Mr. Calderón will be unable to take office or govern.

"From my point of view, the protests that the deputies and senators of the P.R.D. carry out will be more symbolic than real," said Jaime Sánchez Susarrey, a conservative columnist.

State Race Signals Big Defeat For Mexican Leftist (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana

The Christian Science Monitor, October 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY

Andrés Manuel López Obrador jolted Mexico City when he moved protesters to close down main streets in the wake of the nation's disputed July 2 presidential election. The dissent reached its peak when supporters named the defeated leftist president of a "parallel government" at a mass demonstration this fall.

But a month later, his supporters have packed up their tents, traffic is flowing, and many are wondering if his protest movement - which emerged amid allegations of massive electoral fraud - is now losing steam.

This weekend, a gubernatorial race in Tabasco - which voted heavily for Mr. Obrador, a native of the southern state - ended in defeat for the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD) candidate, despite Obrador having campaigned hard for his fellow party member. The loss is being viewed as a referendum on the future of Obrador's national protest movement.

"This is a reflection of his losing track with voters," says Rafael Fernandez de Castro, dean of international affairs at the Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico. "The consequences are not going to be very good for [Obrador] or his movement."

The July 2006 presidential election was the closest in the nation's history, with the two main candidates split by half a percentage point. In September, after a lengthy and tense court review and partial recount, electoral officials finally certified

DOJ_NMG_0082241

Felipe Calderón, of President Vicente Fox's conservative National Action Party (PAN), as the official president-elect. Parallel government?

Leading up to the certification, Obrador and his supporters, who halted downtown traffic for seven weeks, pledged never to accept Calderón as president. Calling him a "usurper," they voted last month to establish their own government, causing columnists to question the stability of the country.

But these days even Obrador's supporters doubt that his parallel movement will amount to much. Although Mario Gutierrez, a valet in Mexico City, says he believes in Obrador's ideals and voted for him in the election, he also believes the movement is petering out. "It's a lost cause," he says. "They aren't going to gain anything."

Asked whether he believes a parallel government will be effective in helping the nation's poor, he says matter-of-factly: "I don't think there will be a parallel government."

Indeed, the defeat in Tabasco state could hinder efforts to forge a national movement. Obrador won 56 percent of the presidential vote in Tabasco, and spent recent weeks with PRD candidate César Raúl Ojeda. When the Monitor went to press, 94 percent of the votes had been counted and Andrés Granier, of the long-ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) had 53 percent of the vote compared with 42.8 percent for Ojeda, making it statistically impossible for Ojeda to win. Ojeda alleges fraud and is threatening to challenge the results.

Obrador himself seemed to anticipate a loss ahead of the elections by telling reporters: "If the PRI wins Tabasco, then our adversaries will laugh at us and say that we even lose in our own land."

Obrador spokesperson César Yañez disputes the fact that a defeat in Tabasco spells trouble for the movement. "Its success does not depend on a state election," he says, "no matter what state it is."

But some say Obrador's protests after the presidential vote this summer may have hurt Ojeda's chances, and could deter others from linking themselves to his movement. "It will make some of the PRD leaders start distancing themselves from [Obrador]," says Mr. Fernandez de Castro.

Mr. Gutierrez says he believes Obrador's barricades in Mexico City backfired. This sentiment is backed by polls, such as one in the newspaper Reforma this summer that showed that if the election had occurred in the midst of Obrador's mass sit-ins, Calderón would have won the race easily.

According to the Associated Press, Oscar Luis Rodriguez, a founding member of the PRD in Villahermosa, the capital of Tabasco, told the local daily El Sol de Tabasco: "[Obrador] has lost credibility. He has lost respect. Here [he] was born, and here he has been buried."

There will be a second tally of the vote Wednesday, standard procedure in Mexico, which could change results, but for most here, the writing is on the wall.

"The PRD's loss in Lopez Obrador's home state clearly undermines his public image and will make some in the party more likely to challenge him on specific issues, says Andrew Selee, director of the Mexico Institute at the Woodrow Wilson Center in Washington, D.C., "but it is far too early to discount [Obrador] as a significant political force in Mexico." Some supporters remain hopeful

Indeed many PRD members say the movement will survive. "The movement can't be over because of an election loss; it will prevail because of the reality of inequality in the country," says Juan Vazquez Patilla, the sub-secretary for social movements within the PRD at his family taco stand in Mexico City over the weekend. "Those who say it's now dead are the same people who don't want change."

But specific plans of what Obrador hopes to accomplish as a parallel president remain uncertain, and Mexico City residents out on a Sunday afternoon, say they have no idea what to expect.

Mr. Yañez says Obrador will begin a national tour next month, not "to show muscle," but to inform the country of his plans ahead of November 20, when he is to be inaugurated as the "legitimate" president-elect of the country. That will be his movement's next big test.

Then comes the official inauguration of Calderón on Dec. 1, which PRD members, like Vazquez Patilla, have promised to protest.

Tabasco Defeat Deals Setback To Lopez Obrador (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY — The defeat of the gubernatorial candidate handpicked by leftist politician Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador to run in his home state of Tabasco has dealt a serious blow to Lopez Obrador's emerging opposition movement.

DOJ_NMG_0082242

After spending a month stumping for candidates, Lopez Obrador, who lost the recent Mexican presidential election by less than a percentage point, saw his Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD, trounced in Sunday's election.

Gubernatorial candidate Cesar Raul Ojeda was beaten by 10 percentage points, according to preliminary results, and the PRD gave up five of its 11 mayoral offices.

Just as with the presidential election, Ojeda and the PRD are expected to file legal challenges to Sunday's results.

Lopez Obrador had campaigned with Ojeda, promising that an Ojeda victory would also be a victory for Lopez Obrador and his campaign to raise up Mexico's poor.

Lopez Obrador supporters warned against putting too much stock in the Tabasco results because Ojeda had lost two previous races for governor.

Ojeda won about 43% of Sunday's vote against Andres Granier of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI. Granier, a biochemist by training and a popular former mayor of the state capital, said voters could expect only trouble from Lopez Obrador and his movement.

Lopez Obrador broke into national politics after losing a controversial 1994 Tabasco governor's race, and Sunday's election appears to be another turning point. But rather than a career springboard, this one appeared closer to a bookend.

After gaining notoriety for his protests against cheating in the 1994 race, Lopez Obrador made his greatest political advances during the late 1990s with a string of election victories while serving as the PRD's national president. In 2000, he was elected mayor of Mexico City before stepping down last year to run for president of Mexico.

Mexico City Mayor Alejandro Encinas, a close ally of Lopez Obrador, said Monday that the party needed to reexamine its electoral strategy.

The idea that Tabasco's gubernatorial election would be a referendum on Lopez Obrador took root early among political analysts and newspaper columnists. For one thing, it came only weeks after the electoral court dismissed PRD allegations that President-elect Felipe Calderon won by fraud.

Lopez Obrador himself took the message center stage.

"They robbed us of our victory, but your support will not be in vain," he said during a campaign appearance last week. "The movement continues … if it fractures, there will be no more hope for millions of Mexicans."

Ojeda had joined Lopez Obrador's postelection protests this summer, and he had also denounced Calderon's victory. Granier, on the other hand, said he could work with Calderon of the National Action Party.

Lopez Obrador and Ojeda had hoped to boost voter turnout in Tabasco with their joint appearances. Instead, turnout fell 8 percentage points from the July 2 presidential election, in which 56% of Tabasco voters cast ballots for Lopez Obrador.

Ojeda alleges that Granier received illegal state government help and tried to buy votes with money and giveaways. Ojeda won a similar challenge in the 2000 election, and an elections tribunal ordered a new election in 2001, which he also lost.

Ojeda had worked on the Lopez Obrador presidential campaign, which was built on the idea that Mexico's decade-long embrace of the free market had paid off for the wealthy and well-educated, but left half the country in poverty and lousy jobs.

While still polling strongly among the poor and working-class, Lopez Obrador began to bleed support from left-leaning middle- and upper-class voters when his postelection protests closed capital streets and disrupted thousands of businesses over the summer.

Lingering civil unrest in Oaxaca by striking teachers and their leftist supporters may also have frightened some people who generally agree with Lopez Obrador, according to interviews with voters last week in Tabasco.

Ojeda's victory would have avenged Lopez Obrador's 1994 gubernatorial loss to Roberto Madrazo, whose PRI campaign illegally overspent millions of dollars, according to evidence later delivered to Lopez Obrador and federal authorities.

Instead, Sunday's election was an embarrassing defeat that could not come at a worse time for Lopez Obrador. He's planning an event in the capital next month to install himself as the country's "legitimate" president. Rather than a crowning moment for his movement, the ceremony now risks ridicule.

"He can still fill a plaza, but with increasingly desperate companions," said Benito Nacif, a political analyst at Mexico's Center for Economic Research.

In Colombia, A Dubious Disarmament (WP)

By Juan Forero, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Demobilized Paramilitaries Are Sidestepping Justice, Critics and Victims Say

DOJ_NMG_0082243

BARRANCABERMEJA, Colombia -- In the midst of a relentless conflict, Colombia's government and its ally, the Bush administration, are hailing the demobilization of 32,000 fighters from right-wing paramilitary groups -- a disarmament that authorities here say is larger than any of those that closed out Central America's civil wars in the 1990s.

But another, far more critical picture of the disarmament has emerged in recent months, drawn from the accounts of rights groups, victims of Colombia's murky, drug-fueled conflict, and even a report from the Attorney General's Office. Paramilitary commanders, according to these accounts, have killed hundreds of people in violation of a cease-fire, trafficked cocaine and stolen millions of dollars from state institutions they had infiltrated.

A handful of lawmakers on Capitol Hill have also voiced concerns about the disarmament, which is partly funded by the United States.

"The demobilization process has been as much about avoiding justice and consolidating ill-gotten gains as it has been about disarming the paramilitaries," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), the ranking member of the subcommittee on foreign operations. "The government needs to stop appeasing the leaders of these outlaw militias and listen more to their victims."

Critics acknowledge that the disarmament has yielded benefits. It has removed a loose confederation of paramilitary militias from a 42-year-old war, leaving the state facing one powerful Marxist rebel organization and a second, much weaker guerrilla group. It has also lowered Colombia's homicide rate, officials here say, and given President Alvaro Uribe's government leverage in its efforts to prod the guerrillas to the negotiating table.

Now, two months after the last paramilitary fighter laid down his weapon in a carefully choreographed ceremony, Colombian officials are pledging to conduct exhaustive investigations of paramilitary atrocities and launch trials of the militias' most bloodthirsty commanders. They say the proceedings will bring justice and recompense for thousands of families who lost relatives or land to the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia, known by its Spanish initials, AUC.

But in communities hit hard by paramilitary violence, including this grimy, oil-refining city in northern Colombia, victims are incredulous about the government's lofty claims. Once fearful that speaking out could get them killed, they are increasingly organized and assertive. And they are sharply criticizing a process that they say is tilted more toward whitewashing crimes than punishing perpetrators.

"The victims haven't had a voice," said Jaime PeÃ±a, whose son, Jaime Yesid, 16, was killed by paramilitaries during a 1998 massacre here. "How can there be reparations and reconciliation if we don't know the truth and if there isn't any justice?"

Across Colombia, victims and rights groups have been shaken by revelations in the press about paramilitary-related outrages, from wealthy commanders patronizing elegant stores in shopping malls to disclosures of paramilitary ties to Colombia's Congress.

In the latest scandal, one of the more powerful paramilitary commanders, Rodrigo Tovar, recruited peasants to play the part of paramilitary fighters in demobilization ceremonies, according to a 29-page internal investigative report by the Attorney General's Office. The report, based on records that were kept in Tovar's computer and that detailed crimes committed by his paramilitary unit, was first disclosed in El Tiempo, the country's leading newspaper.

According to its findings, a special bank account was set up to disburse money to unemployed peasants so they could "pass themselves off as militiamen, the more the better."

Tovar, the report continues, "gives instructions so that they are ready for demobilization day, that they know how to march, sing the hymn [of the AUC] and respond to prosecutors' questions." At the same time, Tovar ordered underlings to make sure some bands of fighters remain armed to guard "vulnerable zones."

Tovar's hit men killed 558 people in one coastal province, Atlantico, at the same time he was participating in disarmament negotiations, according to the report. The victims included shopkeepers who failed to deliver extortion payments, leftist activists, common criminals and even a university professor. The report says that "men, women, children and passersby from all social and professional levels have become victimized."

Tovar kept detailed records of cocaine shipments to the United States and Europe, the Attorney General's Office said. The office's report also recounted how rogue police units took payoffs to permit cocaine deliveries and how Tovar helped senators and congressmen close to him win reelection.

In this city in a key region of the mighty Magdalena River, paramilitary fighters entered with fury in 2000, rooting out guerrillas and killing their supporters. Caught in the crossfire were villagers and the residents of Barrancabermeja, where lush neighborhoods filled with fruit trees and tropical birds sprawl over the hillsides.

In a massacre here in 1998, paramilitaries kidnapped 32 people at gunpoint. Twenty-five disappeared, and seven were later found dead. PeÃ±a still chokes up as he recalls how he looked out his window to see two gunmen abducting his son.

DOJ_NMG_0082244

A neighbor, Luz Almanza, tears up as she recounts how her husband, Ricky Nelson GarcÃ-a, was also led away for good that night. Luz Marina LÃ³pez, a shop owner, can barely keep her composure when she tells how her 20-year-old twins, a son and a daughter, were killed in the same incident.

All that the victims' relatives ever learned was that the paramilitaries suspected the neighborhood of close ties to the guerrillas.

"What I want from the state is to know what happened to these people," Almanza said. "What we want is for them to tell us the truth."

Under the government's Justice and Peace Law, approved by Congress last year, generous benefits were granted to commanders accused of atrocities in exchange for disarming units of fighters. The government also announced that those who participated in the process would not be extradited to the United States on drug-trafficking charges -- the paramilitary commanders' greatest fear.

In the face of international outrage, Colombia's highest court struck down some provisions in May and made the terms more stringent. Most of the commanders, including Tovar, also turned themselves in and are now housed in a spacious facility in Antioquia province.

Under the revised law, commanders must pay reparations to victims out of both their legal and ill-gotten gains. And they must confess to their crimes -- losing benefits if prosecutors later determine that they lied or omitted information.

"What we want is that there be a recognition of the victims' right to truth, to justice and reparation," said Eduardo Pizarro, who heads the government's reparations commission. "And to guarantee that it won't happen again."

Still, the law shields the commanders from serving time in prison, and they remain protected from extradition.

Though officials in Uribe's government pledge to come down hard on commanders, the state appears ill-prepared to follow through, said Sergio Jaramillo, director of the Ideas for Peace analysis group in Bogota. There are only 20 prosecutors to investigate 2,695 paramilitary commanders who are believed to have committed atrocities.

Asked about the capacity of his office to investigate, Mario IguarÃ¡n, the attorney general, said in an interview: "You'd have to say it's not sufficient. The Justice and Peace Law did not create positions for prosecutors."

The sheer complexity of the cases helps paramilitary commanders not only to sidestep criminal investigators but to shield their properties. The commanders have already claimed that they own far less than authorities believe they do. Determining the truth is a formidable task, since the properties they own are registered under third parties' names.

Though there are no exact figures, government officials have calculated that Colombian paramilitaries and drug traffickers control a swath of territory three times the size of New Jersey.

"The government has no clue about what these guys own, how they've operated for all these years, who's supported them, where their assets are, and it hasn't really set up an effective system to figure that out," said Maria McFarland, who tracks Colombia for New York-based Human Rights Watch.

In Barrancabermeja, groups such as the Popular Women's Organization, which runs soup kitchens and works on human rights issues, have no illusions about what the process with the paramilitaries will deliver.

Paramilitaries have slain three members of the group, including one this year, and its president, Yolanda Becerra, said that threats continue. Becerra, a slight woman who races around town meeting with members, said her group is still poised to lead protests and lobby for a tough approach to the paramilitaries.

"We're doing what we've always done -- maintain a hope for a new country," she said. "A people can save themselves when they're united."

Wal-Mart Said To Be Acquiring Chain In China (NYT)

By David Barboza And Michael Barbaro

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

SHANGHAI, Tuesday, Oct. 17 — Wal-Mart Stores, the largest retailer in the United States, is laying the groundwork to become the biggest foreign chain in China with the $1 billion purchase of a major retailer here, according to people briefed on the deal.

The move represents a large step for Wal-Mart's strategy in China, allowing the American retailer to more than double its presence in a country that, despite its size and growing middle class, remains largely untapped by foreign retailers.

Though the size of the acquisition — of a Taiwanese-owned supermarket chain called Trust-Mart — may be modest for Wal-Mart, it is a critical one because the Chinese market is becoming much more pivotal in the retailer's overall international strategy. For Wal-Mart, China represents an opportunity to tap a vast and fast-growing market abroad at a time when the company's sales are lagging elsewhere and it has run into obstacles to expansion at home.

DOJ_NMG_0082245

"China is the only country in the world that offers Wal-Mart the chance to replicate what they have accomplished in the U.S.," said Bill Dreher, an analyst at Deutsche Bank Securities.

Wal-Mart expects to close the deal for Trust-Mart by the end of the year, but it still needs approval by Chinese authorities, according to a person briefed on the transaction.

The acquisition is likely to trigger an intense battle among foreign and domestic retailers to gain a strong foothold in the world's fastest-growing economy.

The deal puts Wal-Mart neck-and-neck in China with Carrefour, the giant French retailer, which also bid for Trust-Mart. Wal-Mart, which has only 66 stores in China compared with Carrefour's more than 200, outbid not only Carrefour, but also Tesco of Britain and one of China's large retailers, Lianhua.

The purchase also highlights the staggering reach of the $300 billion Wal-Mart empire. The company started in rural Arkansas 45 years ago and has become the largest foreign retailer in Mexico and Canada. In numerous other foreign markets, however, Wal-Mart has been stymied, pulling out of Germany and South Korea, or has met strong challenges, as in Japan, where it has struggled to gain a share of the market.

By acquiring Trust-Mart, Wal-Mart will not only be able to match Carrefour, but also to compete with much bigger Chinese retailers, like China Resources and the Shanghai Brilliance Group, which are the country's largest retailers with more than $3 billion in sales and more than 8,000 stores combined.

Trust-Mart has more than 100 stores with 30,000 employees in more than 20 Chinese provinces, but it operates mainly at the low end of the supermarket chains. One challenge for Wal-Mart will to determine where it will position itself in the retailing market.

China's economy is expanding at a rate of 10 percent to 11 percent a year, making it by far the world's fastest-growing major economy. Retail sales are even more robust, jumping by about 15 percent a year for the last several years.

Big retailers are fairly new in China, which for decades has been dominated by small regional chains. Indeed, China has no dominant national players in the retail market, which is why Wal-Mart and other international retailers are battling aggressively to expand there.

"China's a very fragmented market and very diverse," says George Svinos, head of Asia Pacific retail at KPMG's office in Australia. "So in order to get any penetration into that market you'd need to make a big move."

China, however, is a tricky market for American retailers. Chinese consumers spend less than Americans when they go into stores, but they shop more frequently.

The average Chinese shopper spends about $4 at Wal-Mart, compared with $20 for the average American, according to Wal-Mart.

But Wal-Mart and other retailers hope to lure the middle-class Chinese, one of the fastest-growing segments of the population. Already, middle-class shoppers crowd into Carrefour, Wal-Mart and Ikea.

Other retailers, like Toys "R" Us, Home Depot and Best Buy, have just announced plans to open outlets in China.

The government has opened its retail market to foreigners, but at the same time, it has also encouraged Chinese companies to merge. In one example, the Shanghai Bailian Group struck a deal with Dashang, which operates the second-largest chain store group, to create new stores.

Moreover, China's biggest state-owned retailers and a handful of aggressive entrepreneurs are pushing to create national chains, like Beijing-based WuMart and Gome, the country's largest consumer electronics store, which is owned by one of the country's wealthiest men.

Carrefour, which is the largest foreign retailer in China by sales, with more than $2 billion, has been expanding much more aggressively than Wal-Mart. Carrefour plans to open 100 new superstores this year, which will raise its total to more than 300.

Analysts say that Wal-Mart's expansion has stepped up only in recent years. Up until now, they say, the retailer has not had great advantages over its bigger competitors. It has had high costs in China because systems for purchasing, transportation and distribution are clogged and complicated in a country that is still largely inefficient and without a strong national highway grid.

Wal-Mart appeared to smooth the way for expansion in China in July when, for the first time, it allowed employees to form a trade union, the company's first in China. The retailer has long battled unions in the United States, arguing they will make the company less efficient.

In the United States, where Wal-Mart has more than 4,000 mostly suburban stores, its performance has begun to trail that of major competitors, like Target, particularly in sales at stores open at least a year. And Wal-Mart has encountered growing resistance to locating new stores in urban areas.

A Wal-Mart spokeswoman, Beth Keck, declined to comment on the Trust-Mart transaction.

DOJ_NMG_0082246

Wal-Mart entered China in 1996 with a supercenter under its own name and a Sam's Club in Shenzhen, near Hong Kong. In a departure from its practice of buying domestic chains with strong local name recognition, Wal-Mart started by building its business in China on its own.

But the pace of Wal-Mart's growth in China has been slow. A decade after arriving, it has just 66 stores, failing to crack the list of the country's top 20 retailers; hence, the move to acquire Trust-Mart.

Wal-Mart operates stores in 13 countries, including Brazil, Japan, and England, but foreign sales represent just $64 billion, or 20 percent, of its more than $300 billion in annual sales.

In several countries, it has discovered its American formula for success — rock-bottom prices, zealous control of inventory and a wide array of products — simply does not translate.

In Germany, for example, Wal-Mart never established comfortable relations with the powerful unions, which dominate retail in the country. In South Korea, it failed to satisfy the tastes of finicky local consumers.

Thus, in a stinging admission of defeat, Wal-Mart pulled out of Germany and South Korea this year after failing to turn around poor sales.

Wal-Mart, however, remains committed to Japan, where it operates stores under the name Seiyu, despite lackluster performance.

A major obstacle overseas for Wal-Mart has been building a big enough network of stores to compete with local chains and to secure low prices from suppliers. That may explain, in part, why Wal-Mart is eager to grow in China.

Mr. Dreher, of Deutsche Bank, expects Wal-Mart to expand aggressively there. By the year 2010, he predicts the company will have as many as 400 stores in China.

Wal-Mart Closing In On $1bn Deal For China's Trust-Mart (FT)

By James Politi And Lauren Foster

Financial Times, October 17, 2006

Wal-Mart appeared close to sealing a $1bn (£539m) acquisition in China last night.

The world's largest retailer emerged as the leading bidder in a year-long auction for Trust-Mart, China's second-largest hypermarket chain. People close to the talks said Wal-Mart had edged out France's Carrefour and local competitors but warned that details remained to be finalised and the deal could collapse..

A purchase of Trust-Mart, which is privately owned byTaiwanese entrepreneurs, would represent one of Wal-Mart's largest recent acquisitions. It highlights how China has become an important battleground for international supermarket chains as its rapid urbanisation and rising living standards create a new consumer class.

Although Wal-Mart recently exited Germany and South Korea, it considers China a priority for its international expansion. It owns 66 stores in China.

Amy Wyatt, a Wal-Mart spokeswoman, called the deal "speculation" and declined to comment. Regulatory approval by China's Ministry of Commerce could delay the acquisition.

Many international retailers have been looking to expand in China to take advantage of the country's rapid economic growth.

Office Depot, the US office products retailer, said last month that it planned to take a controlling stake in AsiaEC, one of China's largest dealers of office supplies and services. This year Best Buy, the US consumer electronics retailer, took a controlling stake in Jiangsu Five Star, a Shanghai-based store chain. Home Depot, the second-largest US retailer, has also been looking for partners in China.

Meanwhile, it was disclosed that Wal-Mart was in talks to buy Koc Holding AS's supermarket chain, Turkey's biggest retailer.

France In Denial (NYT)

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

We've argued many times that Turkey must come to grips with the crimes of its past and stop prosecuting writers who mention the Armenian genocide of the early 20th century. But we found it as absurd and as cynical when the French National Assembly voted overwhelmingly last week to make it illegal — on pain of a fine and imprisonment — to deny that there was an Armenian genocide.

France's Senate still has a chance to throw out this outrageous bill, and we hope it does. We hope, too, that the Turks do not retaliate with something similarly nutty, like making it a crime to deny French colonial atrocities in Algeria, as some legislators have suggested. Enough damage has already been done.

DOJ_NMG_0082247

There is no doubt that the sooner Turks confront their past the better. They are beginning to, in large part because of the lure of membership in the European Union. That does not excuse the way French politicians are trying to exploit anti-Turkish feelings while playing up to the large Armenian-French constituency.

There are a lot of reasons why this is wrong. It could further fan anti-Muslim feelings in France, and we've already seen the potential for a violent backlash. It is also a blow to freedom of expression — not exactly the standard that E.U. members want to set while they lecture the Turks about being more respectful of human rights and democratic norms.

Yes, France is one of a dozen European countries that have laws against denying the Holocaust. There is an argument that they, too, violate freedom of expression. But those laws at least are based on the threat posed by die-hard anti-Semites who still subscribe to Hitler's racist theories. The Armenian question poses no dangers in France. Playing politics with it trivializes not only the Holocaust, but also the Armenian genocide.

DOJ_NMG_0082248

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, OCTOBER 17, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

N.Y. Civil Rights Lawyer Sentenced To Prison (USAT/AP) 4
Stewart Gets 28 Months On Terror Charge (NSDY) 4
WRIST SLAP FOR SMIRK JERK TERROR ATTORNEY (NYPOST) 5
Lawyer Sentenced For Aiding Terrorist Client (WP) 6
Lawyer, Facing 30 Years, Gets 28 Months, To Dismay Of U.S. (NYT) 7
Radical US Lawyer Gets Jail Term For Terrorism Conviction (AFP-Y) 9
Defense Attorney Stewart Gets 26-Month Sentence (LAW) 9
The Sheik's Apprentice (WSJ) 11
Judge Goes Soft On Terror Lawyer (NYDN) 12
Jury Chosen For Chicago Terrorism Trial (BVND) 13
U.S. Faces Obstacles To Freeing Detainees (WP) 13
Why Democrats Oppose Military Commissions Act (WSJ) 15
Will The Supreme Court Shackle New Tribunal Law? (CSM) 15
Interrogators Beware (WP) 17
Sami's Shame, And Ours (NYT) 18

Homeland Response:

Mandatory Anthrax Shots To Return (WP) 19
Luck May Have Spared Aides In Anthrax Attack (RC) 20
Heavy Load Port-Security Plan, A Bid To Foil Terror, May Slow Deliveries (WSJ) 22
Ashcroft Criticized For Book On 9/11 Panel (AP) 25
In 3rd Storm, FEMA Trailer Is A Charm (NYT) 26

War News:

Bush Reassures Iraqi U.S. Troops Are Staying (WT) 26
Sectarian Fighting Kills 91 In Balad; Sunnis Flee City (USAT) 27
Bush Pledges To Keep U.S. Troops In Iraq (AP-Y) 27
Bush Reassures Iraqi That There Is No Timetable For Withdrawal (NYT) 28
Can You Tell A Sunni From A Shiite? (NYT) 29
Ongoing Iraqi Violence Claims New Lives (LAT) 31
Families Flee Iraqi River Towns On 4th Day Of Sectarian Warfare (WP) 31
Iraqis Ask Why U.S. Forces Didn't Intervene In Balad (NYT) 33
Iraq's Christians Flee As Extremist Threat Worsens (NYT) 34

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney To Join Gibson Dunn (WSJ) 36

Corporate Scandals:

KLA-Tencor Officials Depart Over Options Dating (WSJ) 36
KLA-Tencor Finds More Option Costs; Counsel Resigns (Update2) (BLOOM) 37
KLA Tencor Braces For $400 Million Blow For Mishandled Options (AP) 38
Two More Companies Probing Stock-option Dates Announce Management Changes (MERCN) 39
Stock Options Scandal Spreads (USAT) 39
UnitedHealth Shares Down As CEO Departs (AP-Y) 40
Old Options Still Haunt An Insurer (NYT) 41
McGuire's Options (WSJ) 42
More Exits Likely Over Stock Option Backdating (AP) 43
Comverse CEO Faces Additional Charges (LAW) 44
U.S. Suit Claims Agway Trustees Mishandled Assets (WSJ) 44
Schnitzer Settles With SEC Over Corruption Overseas (DOW) 44
Freddie Mac Names New Finance Chief (WP) 45

Criminal Law:

Attorney General Wants Study Of U.S. Cities' Rising Crime Rates (AP) 46
US Attorney To Study Cities With Violent Crime Issues (BOS) 46
Justice Dept. Will Gauge Need For Additional Funding To Fight Rise In Violent Crime (MCT) 47
Chertoff, Gonzales Tell IACP Cooperation Is Imperative DHS Will Create (OFFICER) 47
FBI Raids Home Of Rep. Weldon's Daughter (USAT) 48
FBI Raids Home Of Weldon's Daughter (AP) 48
FBI Raids Lobbyists' Homes, Office (LAT) 49
FBI Raid Deals New Blow To Republicans (FT) 50
FBI Raids Four Homes, Two Offices In Weldon Probe (PHI) 50
Homes Raided In Rep. Weldon Influence Probe (WP) 51
Searches Carried Out In Influence Inquiry (NYT) 53
FBI Ups Ante On Weldon (RC) 53
FBI Targets Weldon In Influence-peddling Probe (WT) 55
FBI: Weldon Under Investigation (NORRISTH) 55
Editorial: FBI Raid Spurs More Questions Than Answers (DCDN) 57
Doolittle's Lawyers Talking To Justice Department (SACBEE) 58
Doolittle Paid Lawyer To Talk To Agency (AP-Y) 58
Five Years After Killing Of Prosecutor, A Stumped FBI Asks The Public For Help (WP) 59

Betonsports, Prosecutors Strike Tentative Deal, Lawyers Say (BLOOM) ... 60
Former FDA Head Is Charged Over Stock Holdings (WSJ) ... 61
Former F.D.A. Chief Is Charged With Conflict (NYT) ... 62
Former FDA Chief Illegally Held Stocks (WP) ... 63
McLaughlin To Face Corruption Charges (WNBC) ... 63
Labor Leader Is Expected To Face U.S. Corruption Charges (NYT) ... 64
Murdered Teen's Family Wants FBI Probe (LCJ) ... 65
Pellicano Resists Effort To Delay Trial (LAT) ... 65
Coin Dealer Trial Begins In Ohio Scandal (FINDLAW/AP) ... 66
Ralphs To Pay $70 Million, In Strike Settlement (LAT) ... 67
In Shadows Of Net, War On Child Porn Rages (USAT) ... 68
Business Group Wants More Money To Fight Intellectual Piracy (CONGDAILY) ... 70
Victims' Families Sentenced To Silence (LAT) ... 70
Criminal Records Erased By Courts Live To Tell Tales (NYT) ... 72
State Investigates Spending By Suspended Mayor (WP) ... 73
Hit-run Deaths See 20% Increase (USAT) ... 74

Civil Law:

Bankruptcy Cases Down In Wake Of New Law (MH) ... 75
Bankruptcy's New Era (WP) ... 76
Chapter 13 Filings Grow In Gulf Region (USAT) ... 77
6 States Stand Up To Divest From Sudan (USAT) ... 78

Civil Rights:

Monitor Faults Detroit Police (DEN) ... 79
Feds Sue City Over Voting Rights Of Spanish-speakers (PHDN) 80
FBI Reports Slide In Hate Crimes In U.S. (AP-Y) ... 80
Most Hate Crimes Spurred By Racial Bias, FBI Says (WT) ... 81
NAACP To Monitor Elections Following Primary Problems (AP) 81
NAACP To Monitor Mich. Polls (DEN) ... 82
NAACP To Watch Polling Places (BSUN) ... 83
NAACP To Monitor Polls For Problems In 10 States (WT) ... 84
NAACP Will Monitor Polls For Voting Irregularities (WP) ... 85
Barnes Sues Perdue Over Voter Letter Photo ID Information May Have Misinformed (AJC) ... 85
Missouri State Supreme Court Strikes Down Voter ID Law (FINDLAW/AP) ... 86
Agents Take Jail Records (BSH) ... 86
Supreme Court Turns Away Scouts Appeal (LAT) ... 87
53% Of Voters Say They Back Va. Same-Sex Marriage Ban (WP) ... 88

Antitrust:

U.S. Extends SRAM Antitrust Probe To Samsung (IDG) ... 90
Microsoft Sharing Security Data (SEAPI) ... 90
HP Extends Tender Offer For Mercury (FT) ... 91
E.On Lawsuit Claims Acciona Misled SEC On Interest In Endesa (WSJ) ... 91
Silverman Testifies On Walter Forbes' Role In Cendant Merger (USAT) ... 92
Oshkosh Truck To Buy JLG Industries For $3 Billion (NYT/AP) . 92
Macquarie Wins Battle For Thames Water (FT) ... 93
Steeling Jobs (WSJ) ... 94

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Judge To Decide On Setting Deadlines For Everglades Restoration (AP) ... 95
ConocoPhillips Will Pay More Than $2.3 Million For Dalco Spill (SEAPI) ... 95

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Money-laundering Scheme Puts Lawyer Through The Ringer (SEAPI) ... 96
Clogged Sinuses? Sign In, Please (HARTC) ... 96
White House Commends Montana Meth Project (AP) ... 97
Larimer/Weld Summit Takes On Meth Issue (COL) ... 97
Officials Discuss Growing Problem Of Meth Use At Regional Summit (GT) ... 98
Plan Called A Meth Gateway (DENP) ... 98
Colombian Man Gets 15 Years In Cocaine Bust (NDN) ... 99
Border Patrol, Lawmen Outgunned By Cartels (HC) ... 99
Rebel Head Said Plotted To Keep Hostages (AP) ... 100
US General: Military Aid To Colombia Should Be Reduced (AP) 101
U.S. Taking Wait-and-see Approach On Ecuador, General Says (MCT) ... 102
Moonshiners Nearly Extinct In W.Va. (CDM) ... 103

Immigration:

Child Abuse Lawsuit Creates Immigration Waves (CBS2CHI) . 104
Some Democrats Send A More Conservative Immigration Message (NYT) ... 104
Law On Overseas Brides Is Keeping Couples Apart (NYT) ... 106

Congress-Administration:

Losing Faith In The President (WP) ... 108
A Faith-Based Battle For Voters (WP) ... 109
The Reliable Source (WP) ... 109
Internal Specter Review Found No Wrongdoing (RC) ... 110
Hastings Leads Way In Page Investigation (AP-Y) ... 111
Page Board Said Discussed Other Charges (AP-Y) ... 112
The GOP: Slugged On The Nose (WP) ... 112
Reid To Amend Ethics Reports To Fully Account For Land Deal (WP) ... 113
Reid Rewrite (RC) ... 113
Senator Reid Used Donations For Condo Tips (NYT/AP) ... 114
Reid To Reimburse Campaign For Donations (AP-Y) ... 114
Reid Used Campaign Funds To Pay Bonuses To Staff (WT/AP) 115
Relatives Have 'inside Track' In Lobbying For Tax Dollars (USAT) ... 117
Little Accountability In Earmarks (USAT) ... 120
Congress's Charity Cases (NYT) ... 121
President Bush To Visit Greensboro Elementary (News14NC) 121
President To Visit Greensboro Students (WGHP) ... 122
As TSP Grows, Participants Get Chance To Chart Future (WP) 122
Our View On Higher Education: Time To Grade Colleges (USAT) ... 123
Don't Invade Student Privacy (USAT) ... 123
Sen. Brownback's Litmus Test (WP) ... 124

Other News:

Lower Deficit Sparks Debate Over Tax Cuts' Role (WP) ... 125

DOJ_NMG_0082250

It's A Faith Thing (WSJ) 126
Dow Industrials Inch Closer ... Ever Closer (WSJ) 128
Stock Market Surge May Boost Charities (USAT)..... 128
Consumers Face Test As Gas Prices Fall (WSJ)..... 129
Energy Shortage (NYT) 130
As Talk Radio Wavers, Bush Moves To Firm Up Support (NYT)131
Bush's Appearances Revolve Around Core Themes (USAT)... 132
What's Behind Bush's Stump Speech (USAT) 133
Cheney Hits Heartland, And He Can Feel The Love (NYT)..... 134
Backstory: 14 Hours, Really, With Dick Cheney (CSM) 135
Report Indicates Democrats Out-raising In Key House Races (USAT) 137
In Close House Races, GOP Incumbents Hold Advantage In Funds (WP)..... 137
Committee TV Spending Rises (RC) 139
Why Your Vote Doesn't Matter As Much (USAT) 141
Handicapping Long Shots And Late Shots (RC) 142
In Senate Fund Drive, Democrats Are Ahead (WSJ) 143
Lieberman Likes Bolton For UN Job (NYDN) 143
In 2nd Debate, Whitehouse, Chafee Return To Familiar Themes (BOS/AP) 143
Chafee, Whitehouse Debate Along Familiar Lines (PROJO).... 144
Allen Touts Conservative Record, Ideas (WT) 145
Ex-Gov. Warner Puts Weight Behind Webb (WT/AP)..... 146
Boxing's King Throws Jabs For Steele, GOP (WT)..... 147
Senate Hopes To Hinge On Corruption Charges In N.J. (WT) . 147
The Columnist Who Shut Up To Speak Out (WP) 149
Politicians' Campaigns Invade MySpace (USAT)..... 153
With Tactical Itinerary, Mrs. Clinton Skirts Iowa (NYT)..... 153
States Considering Privatizing Highways Can Study Indiana Toll Road Experience (USAT) 154
Cloning Double Talk (PTR) 155
Crime And Punishment (WP)..... 156
And The Winner Is ... Me (NYT) 157
Paying For Better Parenting (NYT)..... 157
North Korean Fuel Identified As Plutonium (NYT)..... 157
Nations Discuss Second Nuke Test Reports (AP) 159
Rice: N.Korea Sanctions Serve As Warning (AP-Y)..... 159
Rice Trip To Push Full Sanctions For N. Korea (WP) 160
Rice: World United Against North Korea (AP) 161
Rice Adds Moscow Stop To Asia Tour On NKorea Crisis (AFP)162
US And China At Odds Over N Korea Cargo (FT) 163
China Boosts N. Korea Border Inspections (AP)..... 164
U.S. Confirms N. Korea Blast Was Nuclear (USAT) 165
U.S. Expects China's Backing On N. Korea (AP-Y) 166
Japan's Pacifism Is Tested Anew By U.N. Sanctions (WSJ) 167
Russia Demands U.S. Lift Sanctions (AP)..... 168
U.S. Eases Push For Egypt Reforms (USAT) 168
Israeli Premier Says He Would Talk To Lebanese And Palestinians (NYT)..... 170
Israel Rejects Syrian Offer On The Golan Heights (MCT)..... 170
Suicide Bomber Kills 94 In Northern Sri Lanka (NYT)..... 171
Attack Kills 93 Sailors In Sri Lanka (WP/AP)..... 172
Venezuela Is Denied Security Council Seat (WP)..... 173
Venezuela Slips In Voting For U.N. Seat (NYT) 174
Guatemala, Venezuela Even For U.N. Seat (AP)..... 175
Link To Chávez May Have Hurt Ecuadorean Candidate (NYT) 176
Mexican Leftist Suffers Setback In Local Race (NYT)..... 176
State Race Signals Big Defeat For Mexican Leftist (CSM) 177
Tabasco Defeat Deals Setback To Lopez Obrador (LAT)..... 178
In Colombia, A Dubious Disarmament (WP) 179
Wal-Mart Said To Be Acquiring Chain In China (NYT)..... 181
Wal-Mart Closing In On $1bn Deal For China's Trust-Mart (FT)183
France In Denial (NYT) 183

DOJ_NMG_0082251

TERRORISM NEWS:

N.Y. Civil Rights Lawyer Sentenced To Prison (USAT/AP)

By Larry Neumeister

USA Today, October 17, 2006

NEW YORK — A firebrand civil rights lawyer who has defended Black Panthers and anti-war radicals was sentenced Monday to nearly 2½ years in prison — far less than the 30 years prosecutors wanted — for helping an imprisoned terrorist sheik communicate with his followers on the outside.

Lynne Stewart, 67, smiled, cried and hugged supporters after U.S. District Judge John Koeltl pronounced the sentence of 28 months.

The judge said Stewart was guilty of smuggling messages between the sheik and his followers that could have "potentially lethal consequences."

However, in departing from federal guidelines that called for 30 years behind bars, Koeltl cited Stewart's more than three decades of dedication to poor, disadvantaged and unpopular clients.

"Ms. Stewart performed a public service, not only to her clients, but to the nation," Koeltl said. The judge said Stewart could remain free while she appeals, a process that could take more than a year.

Stewart was diagnosed with breast cancer last year. Her lawyer Elizabeth Fink warned Koeltl: "If you send her to prison, she's going to die. It's as simple as that."

Outside court, Stewart said she thought the sentence was "a victory for doing good work all one's life."

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia had no comment.

Stewart was convicted in 2005 of providing material support to terrorists. She had released a statement issued by one of her clients, Omar Abdel-Rahman, a blind sheik sentenced to life in prison for plotting to blow up five New York landmarks and assassinate Egypt's president.

Stewart said she did not intentionally enter into any conspiracy to help a terrorist organization.

Earlier, about 150 Stewart supporters stood outside the courthouse, chanting, "Free Lynne!"

Stewart Gets 28 Months On Terror Charge (NSDY)

By ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO, NEWSDAY STAFF WRITER

Long Island Newsday, October 17, 2006

Lynne Stewart, the feisty 67-year-old civil rights lawyer who spent a lifetime helping unpopular defendants and political causes, was sentenced Monday to 28 months in prison for helping a blind, imprisoned Egyptian sheik unlawfully communicate with followers.

Stewart, who lost her law license after her 2005 conviction in the case, was facing up to 30 years in prison but caught a break from U.S. District Judge John G. Koeltl. He cited her years of advocacy for the poor and down-trodden as a reason for a more lenient term behind bars.

"Ms. Stewart performed a public service, not only to her clients but to the nation," said Koeltl, who refused a prosecution request to sentence Stewart, who is battling breast cancer, to a 30-year term.

Stewart, a Manhattan grandmother, herself made an impassioned plea for leniency and said she had suffered greatly after losing the privilege of practicing law.

"At the end of my career, this is truly like a sword in my side," said Stewart. "Permit me to live out the rest of my life productively, lovingly, righteously."

Outside the federal courthouse in lower Manhattan, cheers and applause rippled through a crowd of 200 Stewart supporters as word spread of her sentence.

Around 3:30 p.m., Stewart exited the courthouse, free on bail, and told the crowd she saw the sentence as vindication of her work as an attorney for the unpopular.

"You get time off for good behavior usually at the end of your prison term," Stewart quipped. "I got it at the beginning."

"I am thrilled she is coming home," said Stewart's sister, Laurel Freedman, 47, of Huntington.

If there was any chill for Stewart it was in a statement by Manhattan U.S. attorney Michael Garcia, who said the government was disappointed in the sentence and was considering an appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0082252

Stewart was convicted largely for her involvement in releasing a statement by Omar Abdel-Rahman, the Muslim cleric sentenced to life in prison after his 1995 conviction for plotting to blow up New York City landmarks and assassinate the president of Egypt. Koeltl noted that the smuggled messages could have "potential lethal consequences."

Also convicted in the 2005 trial with Stewart were paralegal Ahmed Abdel Sattar and Mohammed Yousry, an Arabic interpreter. The three were indicted in 2002 during the tenure of former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft.

The 24-year prison term for Sattar, who was convicted of negotiating with militants overseas, was less than the life term called for under federal sentencing guidelines. In handing down the sentence Monday, Koetl noted that the defendant lacked a criminal record and no one was killed or injured because of his crimes.

"I am not a terrorist, your honor," Sattar said. "I am not a violent person. I am a human being. I am an American. I am a Muslim who practices and believes strongly in his religion."

Yousry, who was convicted of helping Stewart smuggle the sheik's messages out of prison, received a sentence of 20 months.

While the allegations against Stewart had nothing to do with the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, she has said she was charged because of what she called a climate of hysteria. However, assistant U.S. attorney Andrew Dember said the case had nothing to do with the attacks.

"What she was doing was smuggling terrorism messages and smuggling out Abdel-Rahman's responses," Dember said."

WRIST SLAP FOR SMIRK JERK TERROR ATTORNEY (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, October 17, 2006

October 17, 2006 -- A grinning, gloating Lynne Stewart declared "victory" yesterday after a federal judge sentenced the civil-rights lawyer to just 28 months behind bars for helping a U.S.-hating terror mastermind communicate with his jihadi warriors.

The sentence was a sliver of the 30 years sought by prosecutors.

"I can do that standing on my head!" Stewart boasted of the light prison term.

Judge John Koeltl's extraordinary leniency was a blow to the federal prosecutors who had won a conviction against the 67-year-old Stewart.

She had been found guilty of providing material support to terrorists by helping her jailed client - blind Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, the suspected mastermind of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing - communicate with his followers.

Koeltl said Stewart was guilty of "extraordinarily severe criminal conduct" with "potentially lethal consequences" by smuggling messages for Abdel-Rahman and issuing inflammatory public statements.

Yet he ruled that a light sentence was justified, given Stewart's treatment for breast cancer and her 30-year career representing poor and unpopular clients.

"Ms. Stewart performed a public service not only to her clients, but to the nation," he said. "It is clear that prison will be particularly difficult for this defendant."

In addition to imposing the light term, Koeltl also ruled that Stewart could remain free on bail while she appeals her conviction.

"Thank you, Judge," said a teary-eyed Stewart, who briefly rested her head on the table in relief.

Outside court, a beaming Stewart said, "I hope the government realizes their error because I am back out - and I'm staying out pending an appeal that I hope will vindicate me and make me back into the lawyer I was.

"I feel that it's a victory for doing good works all one's life. You get time off for good behavior usually at the end of your prison term. I got it at the beginning."

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia issued a statement saying he was "disappointed" in the sentence. "We will be exploring our appellate options."

But Stewart crowed to more than 100 cheering supporters outside Manhattan federal court: "This is a great victory against an overreaching government."

Stewart was arrested six months after the 9/11 terrorist attacks and accused of violating strict prison rules by helping the Egyptian-born Abdel-Rahman spread the word to kill those who did not buy into his extremist interpretation of Islamic law.

The sheik was serving a life sentence for plotting to blow up five New York landmarks, including the Holland Tunnel and George Washington Bridge, and to assassinate Egypt's president when Stewart helped him communicate with his followers and leaders of an Egyptian-based terrorist organization.

Former Attorney General John Ashcroft brought the indictment against Stewart, as well as against Mohamed Yousry, an Arabic interpreter, and Ahmed Abdel Sattar, a postal worker.

DOJ_NMG_0082253

With the possibility of life behind bars still looming large yesterday morning, an emotional Stewart appeared to tremble as she entered the packed courtroom.

Prepared for the worst, her husband, Ralph Poynter, brought along a bag containing medication for his wife, who has undergone radiation and surgery for her cancer.

He also had with him a Robert Goddard book, "Play to the End," and a pair of sweatpants for her because, she said, "I wasn't going to jail in a dress."

Meanwhile, a throng of Stewart's supporters who could not get seats filled the courthouse hallway, chanting, "Set Lynne free!"

"The end of my career truly is like a sword in my side," Stewart told the judge before the sentence was imposed. "I don't want to be in prison. I don't believe I need to be in prison. I believe I still have contributions to make to society."

Defense lawyer Josh Dratel said: "This situation is already tragic."

Stewart has admitted to knowingly violating prison rules, but denies condoning violence and claims she was just trying to do her job as a lawyer by looking after Abdel-Rahman's interests.

Defense lawyer Elizabeth Fink argued that Stewart made "foolish" mistakes by violating prison rules and begged the judge, "Please don't send her to prison, because if you send her to prison, she's going to die."

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Dember refuted Stewart's defense that she was wrongly targeted by the feds in the wake of 9/11.

"This case had nothing to do with Sept. 11, Your Honor," Dember said. "She knew full well what she was doing was a criminal act, and she didn't want to be caught."

Also yesterday, Koeltl sentenced Sattar to 24 years behind bars for conspiring to kill and kidnap people in a foreign country.

Sattar, 47, was convicted of conspiring to kill people overseas by helping to compose a chilling "fatwa" that prosecutors said called for "the killing of Jews everywhere."

"I am not a terrorist, Your Honor," said Sattar, who faced a maximum sentence of life behind bars.

The third defendant, Yousry, 51, an Arabic interpreter, received a 20-month prison term.

"He is kind of a footnote in this case," said defense lawyer David Stern, whose client could have faced up to 20 years behind bars.

When it came to Stewart, Koeltl found that prison time was necessary as punishment, but praised the longtime civil-rights lawyer for her dedication to her clients over the past three decades - and noted that no one was hurt as the result of the crimes in the case.

In a letter Stewart sent to Koeltl last month, she wrote: "If I have a tragic flaw, it is that I care too much for my clients. I am soft-hearted to the point of self-abnegation," according to the New York Times.

As supporters showered Stewart with bouquets of red roses outside court, she said, "I don't think anybody would say going to jail for 28 months is anything anyone would look forward to, but as my clients have told me, 'I can do that standing on my head.' "

Members of the law-enforcement community expressed outrage at the light sentence.

Gus Danese, president of the Port Authority's Police Benevolent Association, said, "She deserved the maximum penalty. As far as I'm concerned, in light of the 1993 bombing and the 9/11 attack, she's a terrorist herself."

"Anyone who believes in helping terrorists and their cause should be willing to serve the maximum penalty. With a 28-month sentence, she'll soon be out doing it again."

An investigator who worked on the case said, "It's a shame she's getting off so lightly. If a cop or some other law-enforcement person did the same thing, they'd throw the book at him. Isn't a lawyer supposed to know what she's doing?"

Additional reporting by Marsha Kranes and Murray Weiss

kati.cornell@nypost.com

Lawyer Sentenced For Aiding Terrorist Client (WP)

By Michael Powell, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

28 Months Is Far Less Than Prosecutors Sought

NEW YORK, Oct. 16 -- Lawyer Lynne Stewart was sentenced Monday to 28 months in prison for helping a terrorist client communicate with his followers, a far less severe sentence than the 30 years sought by federal prosecutors.

As U.S. District Judge John G. Koeltl delivered his sentence in a packed federal courtroom in Manhattan, Stewart lifted her glasses and dabbed at tears while her husband gave a tight hug to their daughter. An hour later, the 67-year-old lawyer emerged from the federal courthouse holding hands with her granddaughter and grandson and, to loud cheers and applause from hundreds of supporters, declared a victory of sorts over the Bush administration.

"The judge did a fair and right thing," she told a thicket of reporters and television cameras, as a supporter placed a bouquet of roses in her arms. "This is a great victory against an overreaching government."

And of her sentence, she sounded almost jaunty: "As my clients say to me, 'I could do that standing on my head.' "

In fact, Koeltl made it clear that Stewart had committed a serious offense by smuggling messages between her client, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, and his followers in the Middle East, including a statement withdrawing the sheik's support for a cease-fire with the Egyptian government. Stewart's actions, Koeltl said, constituted "extraordinarily severe criminal conduct" and material support for terrorism, and could have had "lethal consequences."

Koeltl noted, however, that neither Stewart's actions nor those of her co-defendants, translator Mohammed Yousry and Rahman aide Ahmed Abdel Sattar, resulted in violence in the United States or overseas. Having lashed Stewart for her criminal conduct, the judge executed a pivot, commending her for leading an otherwise exemplary life as a legal advocate for the poor, despised and dispossessed. Many of her clients have been known for their radical views.

"Ms. Stewart performed a public service, not only to her clients but to the nation," Koeltl said. "She's made an extraordinary contribution."

Taken as a whole, the judge argued, her accomplishments amounted to a strong argument for departing from nonbinding federal guidelines that otherwise might have led him to impose a 30-year sentence.

Koeltl's decision to mete out a comparatively mild sentence amounted to a slap at federal prosecutors in a case that former attorney general John D. Ashcroft repeatedly had hailed as a nationwide model. U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia released a statement expressing disappointment and held out the possibility of appealing the sentence. It is not unusual for a federal appeals court to reverse a sentence handed out by a lower court.

More than a few legal observers divined a message in the judge's sentences.

"There's no doubt the government has tried to use this case to chill effective advocacy in terror cases," said Neal R. Sonnett, a former federal prosecutor, past chair of the American Bar Association's criminal justice section and current chair of the association's task force on the treatment of enemy combatants. "I'm delighted the judge was not swayed by the frenzy over terrorism."

More conservative legal commentators -- including Andrew McCarthy, who prosecuted Rahman -- had urged the court to impose a stiff sentence on Stewart.

When the government convicted Rahman in 1995 of plotting to blow up New York landmarks, prosecutors and prison officials imposed stringent restrictions on his contact with the outside world. By smuggling out the sheik's messages, they said, Stewart strayed far across the invisible boundary between zealous advocacy and criminal conspiracy.

Stewart acknowledged as much in a letter to Koeltl before her sentencing. "I inadvertently allowed those with other agendas to corrupt the most precious and inviolate basis of our profession -- the attorney-client relationship," she wrote.

Koeltl also rejected the government's request for a 20-year sentence for Yousry, the translator, meting out a far shorter sentence of 20 months. Yousry, prosecutors acknowledged during the trial, was not a practicing Muslim, disliked fundamentalism and did not believe in violence; nonetheless they successfully argued that he -- at Stewart's direction -- had helped Rahman take his messages to the outside world.

Koeltl gave a far more substantial 24-year sentence to Sattar, a postal worker and legal aide who was found to have spoken by phone with known terrorists in the Middle East. This sentence, however, still fell short of the sentence requested by prosecutors.

The judge allowed Stewart and Yousry to remain free while they appeal their convictions, a process that could stretch for more than a year. This will enable Stewart, who was recently diagnosed with breast cancer, to continue to receive treatment.

"Am I surprised? I'm happy," Stewart's attorney, Elizabeth Fink, said afterward as she walked north from the courthouse toward a celebration in Chinatown. "It could have been much, much worse."

Lawyer, Facing 30 Years, Gets 28 Months, To Dismay Of U.S. (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

Lynne F. Stewart, the radical defense lawyer, was sentenced yesterday to two years and four months in prison on charges that she smuggled messages from an imprisoned terrorist client to his violent followers in Egypt.

The sentence, handed down by Judge John G. Koeltl in Federal District Court in Manhattan, was significantly lower than the 30 years sought by prosecutors. He cited the service Ms. Stewart, who is 67, had provided in her three-decade career as a government-appointed lawyer for unsavory criminals and penniless outcasts.

The judge allowed her to remain free on bail while a higher court hears her appeal, saying there was a possibility that her conviction might be overturned.

The sentence was an unexpected setback for the Justice Department in a case the Bush administration has frequently highlighted to show the effectiveness of its tough policy on terror prosecutions. Former Attorney General John Ashcroft devoted a chapter to it in his recent memoir. Defense lawyers and other supporters of Ms. Stewart had warned that a severe sentence would have a chilling effect, dissuading others from representing clients accused of terrorism.

In a brief statement to the judge before the sentence, Ms. Stewart, shaking and barely suppressing tears, refrained from political comment or discussion of her case, but noted that she would never be permitted to practice law again.

"The end of my career is truly like a sword in my side," she said. "I don't want to be in prison," she pleaded. "Permit me to live in the world and live out my life, productively, lovingly, righteously."

Ms. Stewart's lawyers, citing her recent bout of breast cancer, had asked the judge not to give her any prison time.

But Judge Koeltl said there had been "an irreducible core of extraordinarily severe criminal conduct" in her actions on behalf of the client, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, a blind fundamentalist Islamic cleric who is serving a life sentence for plotting to bomb New York City landmarks. Ms. Stewart was convicted on Feb. 10, 2005, of conspiring to provide material aid to terrorism by smuggling the sheik's messages encouraging violence by his militant followers in Egypt.

While agreeing that Ms. Stewart had flouted the law and deceived the government by breaking prison rules to publicize the sheik's messages, Judge Koeltl broadly rejected the prosecutors' portrayal of her as a serial liar and terrorist conspirator who would be a danger to society if she remained free.

Instead, he focused on her past service as a lawyer. "She has represented the poor, the disadvantaged and the unpopular," Judge Koeltl said, adding that Ms. Stewart had demonstrated "enormous skill and dedication" in her legal work and earned little money from it.

"It is no exaggeration to say that Ms. Stewart performed a public service not only to her clients but to the nation," Judge Koeltl told a crowded but hushed courtroom.

The judge acknowledged that Ms. Stewart's crimes were "serious, involved dishonesty and breach of trust," and led to "potentially lethal consequences." But he appears to have been impressed by about 1,100 letters of support she received from law professors, former prosecutors, retired judges and former clients. Among the clients was Matias Reyes, a federal inmate who told how she helped him confess that he was the true attacker in the infamous Central Park jogger case, after others had been wrongfully convicted.

The judge pointed out that Ms. Stewart would lose her license to practice law as a result of her conviction and sentence, which he said was a form of punishment, and that she is barred from having any contact with Mr. Abdel Rahman. He said the chance that her crimes would recur was "nil," and noted there had been no evidence that anyone was harmed as a result of her actions.

He also mentioned that there was a "statistically significant" chance that Ms. Stewart's breast cancer would recur.

As the judge read the sentence, Ms. Stewart's face brightened with a grin of surprised relief. She flashed a quick clenched fist of victory to her relatives in the gallery.

Judge Koeltl imposed a relatively tough sentence on one of Ms. Stewart's co-defendants, though it also fell short of what the government had sought. A former Staten Island postal worker, Ahmed Abdel Sattar, 46, was sentenced to 24 years in prison for negotiating by telephone with a follower of the sheik's who was an associate of Osama bin Laden's to try to bring an end to a cease-fire by Mr. Abdel Rahman's group in Egypt. Mr. Sattar also wrote and released a statement he called a fatwa, or religious edict, calling for the killing of Jews. Prosecutors had asked for a life sentence.

The third co-defendant, Mohamed Yousry, 51, Ms. Stewart's Arabic translator in her discussions with the sheik, was sentenced to one year and eight months in prison.

Judge Koeltl said that Mr. Yousry was "the necessary link" in a conspiracy with Ms. Stewart to smuggle prohibited letters into prison for the sheik and convey his replies to his followers. Prosecutors wanted Mr. Yousry to serve 20 years in prison.

Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, attended the sentencing yesterday. He and his prosecutors left the courtroom without comment. "The government is disappointed in the sentences imposed today," Mr. Garcia said in a statement later. "We will be exploring our appellate options."

One of his assistants, Andrew Dember, had said before the sentencing that Ms. Stewart knew that she was smuggling terrorist messages. "She stepped over the line from being a lawyer to being a clear-cut criminal," he said, who had "endangered the lives of innocents."

Mr. Dember dismissed the notion that Ms. Stewart's sentence could have a chilling effect, saying that none of her actions "had anything to do with legitimate lawyering or legal representation of her client."

DOJ_NMG_0082256

One of Ms. Stewart's lawyers, Joshua L. Dratel, said the judge did not need to impose a severe sentence because "the message has been sent loud and clear" that Ms. Stewart committed serious mistakes and lapses of judgment in representing the sheik, as she acknowledged in recent weeks.

When Ms. Stewart emerged from the courthouse, a few blocks from the World Trade Center site in Lower Manhattan, she was greeted with bouquets of roses from a crowded of elated, cheering supporters who had waited outside for hours after being blocked by federal marshals from attending the proceedings.

"This is a great victory against an overreaching government," Ms. Stewart said, returning to her familiar feisty rhetoric, as she was embraced by her husband, Ralph Poynter, and her three grandchildren. "I hope the government realizes their error, because I am back out," she said. "And I am staying out until after an appeal that I hope will vindicate me, that I hope will make me back into the lawyer that I was."

Ms. Stewart said she was grateful to the judge for giving her "time off for good behavior." She had been ready to go straight to jail when she came to court, she said, carrying a pair of sweat pants in a plastic bag. She said if she eventually has to serve the 28-month sentence, "I could do it standing on my head."

Radical US Lawyer Gets Jail Term For Terrorism Conviction (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 17, 2006

A radical US rights lawyer convicted of conspiring with terrorists by acting as a go-between for a jailed Egyptian cleric and his militant followers was sentenced to 28 months in jail.

Lynne Stewart, 67, was convicted in February 2005 of lying to the government and conspiring with her client, Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman, to convey messages to his militant disciples in Egypt and inciting them to violence.

The sentence was far below prosecutors' requests for a 30-year term.

Her sentencing had been delayed while the veteran attorney and grandmother underwent treatment for breast cancer.

In a letter to Judge John Koeltl before her sentencing Monday, Stewart pleaded for a lenient sentence, insisting she was a well-intentioned lawyer who had made a lapse in judgement.

"I am not a traitor. The government's characterisation of me and what occurred is inaccurate and untrue. It takes unfair advantage of the climate of urgency and hysteria that followed 9/11," she wrote, referring to the September 11, 2001 attacks on New York and Washington.

Neither Stewart's supporters nor prosecutors offered any immediate reaction to the sentence.

Abdel Rahman was jailed for life after being convicted in 1995 of conspiring to blow up New York landmarks and assassinate Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Stewart's two co-defendants, US postal worker Ahmed Sattar and Arabic translator Mohammed Yousry were also up for sentencing Monday.

Ever since she was charged, Stewart has insisted she was being unfairly targeted for her unorthodox choice of clients over a 30-year career that has seen her represent mobsters and political radicals.

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at the time the verdict was an "important step" in the Department of Justice's "war on terror".

Giving testimony during the trial, Stewart had insisted that she neither abetted nor endorsed the concept of Islamic holy war held by Abdel Rahman.

Prosecutors held that between 1997 and 2002, Stewart and her co-defendants helped Abdel Rahman pass messages to his followers in violation of government restrictions on his right to communicate with the outside world.

In particular, the prosecutors said, Abdel Rahman used the three defendants to exhort his militant Islamic group to break a ceasefire with the Egyptian government.

Defense Attorney Stewart Gets 26-Month Sentence (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 17, 2006

Veteran defense attorney Lynne Stewart cried tears of relief Monday as a federal judge ordered her to serve a dramatically lower sentence than prosecutors had requested for her conviction on providing material support to a terrorist conspiracy.

Southern District Judge John Koeltl gave Stewart a sentence of only 28 months. The government had asked for 30 years behind bars.

Weighing in Stewart's favor, the judge said, were her years of service to the poor, the disadvantaged and the unpopular; her battle with cancer and the fact that her actions, though reprehensible, did not result in violence.

DOJ_NMG_0082257

Stewart was also allowed to remain free on bail pending her appeal for convictions for providing and concealing material support, conspiring to do so, making false statements and defrauding the government.

The result produced the bizarre spectacle of a victory celebration following a criminal sentencing, with Stewart holding flowers and chanting "yes" with supporters outside the Daniel Patrick Moynihan Courthouse. The rulings came after emotional pleas by defense lawyers Elizabeth Fink, Joshua Dratel and Jill Shellow-Levine, who argued that the federal sentencing guidelines' call for a lengthy prison term did not fit the circumstances of the crimes Stewart actually committed.

Indeed, Judge Koeltl, before he announced he was giving Stewart a "non-guidelines" sentence, pronounced a guidelines enhancement for a crime of terrorism, one that would have increased her prison term significantly, "dramatically unreasonable in the case of Ms. Stewart."

The judge made the same finding for co-defendant Ahmed Abdel Sattar, who was convicted of the more serious crime of conspiracy to kill or kidnap people in another country, as he gave him a 24-year prison term. The government had sought life behind bars for Sattar.

Monday, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia released a statement saying he was "disappointed" in the sentences and was weighing an appeal.

The sentences came 4 1/2 years after Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the indictment of Stewart, Sattar and interpreter Mohamed Yousry in a plot to pass messages to and from the Egyptian-based Islamic Group to imprisoned Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman. Yousry was sentenced Monday to 20 months in prison.

Sheik Abdel-Rahman, considered the spiritual leader of Islamic Group, was serving a life sentence for a terror plot against the United States. He had been placed under Special Administrative Measures (SAMs) by the Bureau of Prisons to prevent him from communicating with his followers in the group.

Stewart was convicted of defrauding the government by signing attorney affirmations promising to abide by the SAMs and of providing material support along with Yousry by helping the sheik send and receive messages in prison.

'POTENTIALLY LETHAL'

Her most "potentially lethal" action, Judge Koeltl said, was in June 2000, when she read a press release to a reporter indicating that the sheik was withdrawing his support for a "cease-fire" or cessation of attacks against the Egyptian government.

Sattar served as a paralegal for Stewart and other defense lawyers at the sheik's 1995 trial for seditious conspiracy against the United States in connection with a plot to bomb New York City landmarks. At this trial, Sattar was accused by the government of being the "communications hub" for Islamic Group and the spearhead of efforts to have the sheik freed from prison.

Sattar was recorded on government surveillance tapes as plotting with a high-ranking militant in Islamic Group named Taha to resume the group's campaign against the Egyptian government -- a campaign that, before the cease-fire became widely accepted by the membership, included the 1997 massacre of 62 people at an archeological site in Luxor, Egypt.

He also admitted that he drafted a religious edict, or fatwa, in Sheik Abdel-Rahman's name calling for the murder of Jews around the world.

Stewart and Yousry were convicted of assisting this effort by acting as a conduit to the sheik, transporting messages from Taha to him. Stewart was caught on tape making, and bragging about making, covering noises to distract corrections officers while Yousry and the sheik communicated. Prosecutors Andrew Dember and Robin Baker objected to the judge's decision to give the trio non-guidelines sentences.

'DOWNWARD VARIANCE'

Instead of giving a guidelines sentence to Stewart and her co-defendants and downwardly departing within the framework of the guidelines, Judge Koeltl adopted what he called a "downward variance."

The judge seemed to vindicate the contention of Stewart's attorneys that the indictment against her, and the possibility of the rest of her life in prison, was wholly disproportionate to her actions.

But Judge Koeltl, while commending Stewart for a life of public service, also had some harsh words for the 67-year-old grandmother, saying she "abused her position as a lawyer to gain access to Sheik Abdel-Rahman and used that access" to smuggle messages to terrorists.

In the end, the judge said the impending loss of her license to practice law, and the fact that she would therefore no longer be in a position to repeat her crime, was a factor in his decision.

So too was Stewart's treatment for breast cancer.

Fink seemed to test the judge's patience by arguing that Stewart would receive poor medical treatment in prison and by claiming her client would be "tortured" behind bars because she was convicted of a terrorist offense.

The lower-than-expected sentence given to Sattar set the stage for Stewart's lawyers to confidently argue she should receive no prison time at all.

DOJ_NMG_0082258

It also gave Dember warning that he was fighting an uphill battle in arguing for a longer sentence. Dember reminded the court that Stewart "repeatedly lied to and deceived the government" -- first when she smuggled in a message from Taha urging the sheik to withdraw his support for the cease-fire on terror attacks in 1999, then again when she signed an affirmation in 2000 promising to comply with the SAMs, and then still again after she issued the press release and "was confronted, and required to sign a new affirmation."

Dember aggressively rejected Stewart's claim that she was merely advocating for her client, saying that "smuggling terrorist messages" into and out of prison "has nothing to do with legitimate legal representation."

'SERIOUS CRIMINAL CONDUCT'

This was not merely "a violation of some administrative rule" but "serious criminal conduct," he said, and Stewart knew it because she spoke on the phone to Yousry after the press release was issued, and before a "clarifying" press release on the sheik's position was to be issued and said "she didn't do this lightly" and was "risking her whole career."

"She didn't step over a line that was fine, or thin, or blurry," Dember said. "She stepped over a line that was clear."

Dratel answered by arguing that the government "robs this case of context."

Dember ridiculed the defense claim that the prosecution of Stewart was meant to send a message to lawyers willing to defend the rights of those accused of, or convicted of, terrorist plots.

The prosecution, he said, was brought "not because she represents unpopular clients nor to deter defense counsel from involvement in terrorist-related cases ... or to chill them," he said. "And this had nothing whatsoever to do with 9/11."

He reminded the judge that terrorism prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald had wanted to launch a criminal investigation into Stewart's actions, but was told to "stand down" because there was an ongoing "intelligence investigation under way."

But Dratel insisted that the government wanted to "chill" aggressive defense tactics in terror cases and make an example of Stewart.

'UNWARRANTED OVERKILL'

Among the some 400 letters sent to the judge in support of Stewart was one that came from Jo Ann Harris, former assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Criminal Division and now in private practice. Harris' letter accused the government of "unwarranted overkill" in charging Stewart. It is not every day that a criminal defendant celebrates a prison sentence, but Stewart walked out of the courthouse acting like a champ.

She had entered 500 Pearl St. somber and appearing shaken -- even after she was serenaded by dozens of supporters who had been denied admission to the overcrowded 12th floor courtroom. Some in the crowd sang the "Glory Hallelujah" refrain from "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" while others chanted, "Set Lynne free."

But as Judge Koeltl began to hint at a low sentence, Stewart and members of her legal team began to perk up. When he finally announced his decision, there were broad smiles and, once a break was announced, Stewart was enveloped in hugs from her family, friends and attorneys.

Later, outside the courthouse, addressing a crowd of about 150 supporters chanted, "The people, united, will never be defeated." Stewart was handed a bouquet of red roses and told the gathering, "I love you." Stewart quoted one of her former clients on the old saw of receiving a light sentence, saying she could serve the 28 months "standing" on her "head."

She then checked herself and said she did not want to be seen as being "in the face" of the government and was humbled by the experience.

Her relief was shared by lawyers David Stern and David Ruhnke for Yousry.

Attorneys Kenneth Paul and Barry Fallick, representing Sattar, were more subdued, but nonetheless gratified the judge did not embrace the recommendations of the government and the U.S. Probation Department. "We were expecting life," Paul said.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

The Sheik's Apprentice (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

It was a case of radical chic and the radical sheik. Yesterday in New York, Lynne Stewart, a self-styled "civil rights" attorney whose past clients include the Black Panthers and Weather Underground, was sentenced to 28 months in prison for illegally passing messages between her imprisoned client, Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, and his followers in Egypt's Al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya, the terrorist group responsible for killing 62 mostly European and Japanese tourists in Luxor in 1997. Some of those tourists were beheaded; others were disemboweled. The Sheik was also involved in planning terror attacks in New York, for which he is serving a life sentence.

In an age when courts routinely impose five-year prison terms for drug offenders, and life sentences on former CEOs, 28 months may not seem an appropriate sentence for a terrorist accomplice, especially when the government sought 30 years. Ms. Stewart certainly had the sympathy of the judge, John Koeltl, who praised her as a champion of "the poor, the disadvantaged and the unpopular." She herself seems to have had few misgivings about her actions: "The government's characterization of me and what occurred is inaccurate and untrue," she told the judge. "It takes unfair advantage of the climate of urgency and hysteria that followed 9/11."

In similar circumstances -- albeit with a different defendant -- a case could be made for leniency. Ms. Stewart is 67 and recovering from breast cancer. But remorse is also a prerequisite for mercy, and Ms. Stewart shows none, either for her crime or for the arc of a career which flows too naturally from championing the "liberation" movements of the 1960s to the Islamists of the present day. What her clients have in common is that they loathe America.

Now she basks in the pity and praise of her fellow radical travelers, who haven't seemed to spare much thought for the victims of Luxor. It says everything about her, and about them.

Judge Goes Soft On Terror Lawyer (NYDN)

New York Daily News, October 17, 2006

<USnew_edit>Ah, mercy has a human heart, pity a human face. No hangin' judge is John Koeltl of the federal bench, who yesterday outrageously handed radical lawyer Lynne Stewart just 28 months in prison, rather less than the 30 years prosecutors wanted her to serve for helping a terrorist bomber transmit messages to fanatic followers.

Perhaps kindly Judge Koeltl was touched by the sight of Stewart, all her revolutionary bravado fled, blubbering that the end of her legal career "is like a sword in my side." Perhaps he was moved by the defense argument that Stewart, who is 67 and ailing, would die behind bars if a sentence of any reasonable length were imposed.

Or perhaps he just felt that two-something years is enough for the very grave crime she committed. He seemed to say so, on the one hand finding Stewart guilty of "extraordinarily severe criminal conduct" while on the other hand portraying her as a sainted provider of lawyering to "poor, disadvantaged and unpopular clients." Stewart had provided "a public service, not only to her clients but to the nation," Koeltl concluded. Sort of like Mother Teresa with a law degree.

Let us disagree. It will never be known what secret codes might have been in those communications she enabled Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman to dispatch from his cell or how many jihadist plots they resulted in. The sheik was only the man who had plotted to blow up city landmarks and assassinate the president of Egypt. And Lynne Stewart, consciously and knowingly, gave him material assistance. It is jaw-dropping that she ended up standing before a soft touch like Koeltl. From somewhere across the sea, we believe we hear a few terrorists chuckling in delighted satisfaction.

"I am not a traitor," she wailed, and presumably by her own lights, she sincerely believes that. But even some underworld mouthpiece caught carrying some imprisoned mob czar's instructions to his torpedoes outside gets more than 28 months.

Lynne Stewart has never been one to appreciate the many blessings of this system she has for so long ranted and railed against. We do not expect her to be more than fleetingly grateful at this time for the absurd pass this system has just given her.

<USnew_edit>Calling all bravest

The Fire Department has extended the application deadline for one of the best and most respected jobs, that being a city firefighter. If you are interested in good-paying public service and believe you have what it takes to do the heroic, the deadline for submitting papers is now Nov. 3. And if you are minority or female, all the better.

The FDNY is conducting one of the most aggressive recruitment drives in its history, searching for the most qualified candidates and hoping in the process that the force becomes more reflective of the city's population. The early signs offer some grounds for optimism.

More than 42,000 people have inquired about taking the hiring exam, two-thirds of whom were minorities or women. Of those, more than 12,000 have paid the $30 application fee, and 30% were minorities or women. That's double the minority representation when the fire exam was last given. And the number suggests that the FDNY's community outreach has paid off, at least preliminarily.

But there is a long way to go. Jobs will go only to those who ace the written and physical exams. The FDNY is planning test prep courses. These must be as thorough as the department's recruitment has been so all candidates have the chance to do their best. The word is out, New Yorkers: The FDNY wants you.

<USnew_edit>Hevesi, original recipe

Democrat Andrew Cuomo and Republican Jeanine Pirro debated Sunday and they will discuss the issues in the race for attorney general again today. Sen. Hillary Clinton and GOP challenger John Spencer are scheduled to have back-and-forths Friday and Sunday. Gubernatorial contenders Eliot Spitzer and John Faso have gone two rounds, and Spitzer said yesterday that fellow Democrat Alan Hevesi (left) should step forth to debate the GOP's Chris Callaghan. That would mean braving an appearance with a rival who flat-out calls Hevesi a thief for assigning a state worker to chauffeur Hevesi's wife at a cost of at least $82,688. And so Hevesi is staying cooped up. "Cluck, cluck," said his spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0082260

You can e-mail the Daily News editors at voicers@edit.nydailynews.com. Please include your full name, address and phone number. The Daily News reserves the right to edit letters. The shorter the letter, the better the chance it will be used.

Jury Chosen For Chicago Terrorism Trial (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 17, 2006

CHICAGO - A jury was chosen Monday for the federal trial of two men accused of supplying money and recruits to the Palestinian terrorist organization Hamas.

Opening statements were set for 9:30 a.m. Thursday at the trial of suburban Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, and former university professor Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, of Alexandria, Va.

U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve overruled objections from federal prosecutors that defense attorneys had acted to keep whites from serving on the jury.

The defense was allowed to strike 10 prospective jurors from the list without showing cause as to why they should not serve. Such strikes cannot be for reasons such as race or ethnicity.

Prosecutors noted that nine of the 10 struck by the defense were white and asked St. Eve to restore four of them to the list. But the judge held that in each case there was a non-racial explanation.

Salah and Ashqar are accused of taking part in a 15-year conspiracy in which money was funneled into U.S. bank accounts and delivered to Hamas military cells.

Recruits also are suspected of being mustered in the United States and sent to join Hamas forces trying to topple the Israeli government.

Both men deny they are members of Hamas and say they are innocent of the federal racketeering conspiracy charges.

U.S. Faces Obstacles To Freeing Detainees (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Allies Block Returns From Guantanamo

BERLIN -- British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett last week issued the latest European demand to close down the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The existence of the prison is "unacceptable" and fuels Islamic radicalism around the world, she said, echoing a recent chorus of complaints from Europe about U.S. counterterrorism policy.

Behind the scenes, however, the British government has repeatedly blocked efforts to let some prisoners leave Guantanamo and return home.

According to documents made public this month in London, officials there recently rejected a U.S. offer to transfer 10 former British residents from Guantanamo to the United Kingdom, arguing that it would be too expensive to keep them under surveillance. Britain has also staved off a legal challenge by the relatives of some prisoners who sued to require the British government to seek their release.

Other European governments, which have been equally vocal in assailing Guantanamo as a human rights liability, have also balked at accepting prisoner transfers. A Turkish citizen who was born and raised in Germany was finally permitted to return from Guantanamo in August, four years after the German government turned down a U.S. proposal to release him.

In addition, virtually every country in Europe refused to grant asylum to several Guantanamo prisoners from China who were not being sent home because of fears they could face political harassment there. The Balkan nation of Albania agreed to take in five of the Chinese in May, but only after more than 100 other nations rebuffed U.S. pleas to accept them on humanitarian grounds, State Department officials said.

"In practical terms, it's not enough to say, 'Guantanamo should be closed,' without suggesting the next sentence: What do you do with the people who are there?" John B. Bellinger III, the State Department's chief legal adviser, said during a visit to Berlin last week to meet with German counterterrorism officials.

There are about 435 prisoners from about 40 countries at Guantanamo, according to the Pentagon. Military tribunals have concluded that about one-quarter of the prisoners are not a security risk, or are otherwise eligible for release or transfer.

Ultimately, Bellinger said, U.S. officials expect 60 to 80 prisoners to face trial by military commission. The rest will be released, though many of them might face charges or other restrictions in their home countries.

But those whom the Pentagon wants to free often have nowhere to go. In many cases, their native countries don't want them or have challenged their nationalities. Also slowing the process is a U.S. policy stipulating that prisoners cannot be transferred to nations with a record of human rights violations unless there are written assurances that they won't be mistreated.

DOJ_NMG_0082261

The Pentagon has already freed all but a few European citizens from Guantanamo. But U.S. officials have struggled to persuade Britain, Germany and other allies in Europe to accept prisoners who once had legal residency there, or who are effectively stateless.

"We think countries whose nationals are in Guantanamo ought to take responsibility for them," Bellinger said. "We have also, in certain cases, encouraged European governments to see if they would be eager to take detainees of other nationalities."

So far, there have been few takers.

Although Albania agreed to accept the five Chinese prisoners -- all ethnic Uighur Muslims -- the United States is still looking for a home for 17 Uighurs who remain at Guantanamo. Several European countries with small Uighur immigrant populations declined to give the prisoners asylum after receiving pressure from the Chinese government, which wants to extradite the Uighurs and try them on terrorism charges, according to U.S. and European officials.

Among those countries is Germany, which also balked for years at allowing a German native, Murat Kurnaz, to return even though U.S. military intelligence and German law enforcement officials had largely concluded there was no information tying him to al-Qaeda or terrorist activities, U.S. and German documents show.

In 2002, U.S. officials indicated they were willing to release Kurnaz, who was born and raised in Germany but holds Turkish citizenship. But the German government barred him from returning.

The official explanation: Kurnaz had failed to renew his German residency permit while he was locked up at Guantanamo. But German diplomats acknowledged that they saw no reason to take Kurnaz back and that they considered him an American problem.

"It was a shame what happened," said one of his attorneys, Bernhard Docke. "It was a kind of excuse for being passive and just watching what was going on. If Germany had done something then, it would have kept him from having to spend another four years in Guantanamo."

European officials say the United States deserves the bulk of the blame for delaying the release of inmates who have been found not to be a threat.

In January, new German Chancellor Angela Merkel raised Kurnaz's case in visits to the White House and said her country had changed its mind. But it took until August to secure his release, largely because U.S. officials insisted he be indicted or placed under 24-hour surveillance. The Bush administration ultimately relented after Germany refused, according to German officials and Kurnaz's lawyers.

Some of the strongest resistance to helping Guantanamo inmates has come from Britain, America's closest ally on counterterrorism matters.

Despite the presence of British troops in Afghanistan and Iraq, as well as a longtime special relationship between U.S. and British intelligence agencies, British officials have become increasingly blunt in their calls for the closure of Guantanamo on moral and legal grounds.

Beckett, the foreign secretary, said Thursday that Guantanamo was "unacceptable in terms of human rights" and added that it was "ineffective in terms of counterterrorism."

In an interview last month with The Washington Post, Charles Falconer, one of the highest-ranking justice officials in Britain, accused the United States of a willingness "to do things beyond the law." He has also called Guantanamo "an affront to the principles of democracy."

While all British citizens in Guantanamo were freed starting in 2004, Britain has balked at allowing former legal residents of the country to return. British officials say they are under no legal obligation to intercede on their behalf because they lack citizenship.

It's unclear exactly how many British residents remain in prison at the U.S. military base in Cuba. British officials said there are nine who were residents of the United Kingdom at one time, four of them illegally. U.S. officials say there are 10, court papers show.

According to an affidavit filed in a London court case by David F. Richmond, director general of defense and intelligence for the British Foreign Office, U.S. officials informally floated a proposal in June to see whether Britain would be willing to accept the transfer of all 10 prisoners. Court papers show that Britain nixed the idea, saying it would be too costly and difficult to meet U.S. conditions to keep the men under constant surveillance.

George Brent Mickum IV, a Washington lawyer, represents two of the British residents, Jamil el-Banna, a Palestinian with Jordanian citizenship who legally moved to Britain in 1994, and Bisher al-Rawi, an Iraqi citizen who immigrated to Britain as a teenager in 1984. He said his clients would much rather return to London, even if it meant restrictions on their liberty there. But he said Britain was clearly opposed to the idea, under any circumstances.

"As far as I'm concerned, they can put them under whatever surveillance they want -- they're infinitely better off in Britain," Mickum said. "But the British have indicated to me that they are adamant. They do not want these guys back."

DOJ_NMG_0082262

The British security service known as MI5 played an instrumental role in sending Banna and Rawi to Guantanamo in the first place.

The men were seized in 2002 during a business trip to West Africa, taken to a secret CIA prison in Afghanistan and later shipped to Cuba. Documents show that British agents tipped off the CIA to the men's whereabouts after they had refused to work as informants for MI5 in London.

Researcher Julie Tate in Washington contributed to this report.

Why Democrats Oppose Military Commissions Act (WSJ)

By Steny Hoyer and Ike Skelton

Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

Your assertion ("Democrats on al Qaeda," Review & Outlook, Oct. 2) that Democrats will not be tough on terrorism because many of us opposed the Republicans' Military Commissions Act is offensive and untrue. The party of Wilson, Roosevelt, Truman, Kennedy and Clinton takes a back seat to no one in protecting our nation and our people. We have always fought for freedom and confronted tyranny -- and do so today.

Our national security interests are best served when we interrogate and try terrorist suspects in a manner that comports with our American values; produces convictions that will withstand appeals; and honors our international commitments, thereby protecting our troops who fall into enemy hands. We believe the Republican bill failed on each point.

If anything, the Military Commissions Act is not tough enough on terrorists because there is no certainty the act will withstand the scrutiny of the Supreme Court. If the act is tied up in litigation and eventually struck down, convicted terrorists could have a "get-out-of-jail-free" card. During the debate on the legislation, we pointed to numerous constitutional challenges that will likely be brought against the act, such as that it unlawfully strips federal courts of jurisdiction over habeas corpus claims; creates ex post facto laws in violation of Article I; purports to make the president the final arbiter of the Geneva Conventions, in violation of Article 3; and because of the way it is written, may apply to U.S. citizens -- as well as non-citizens -- and allow coerced testimony in violation of the 5th, 8th and 14th Amendments.

Will The Supreme Court Shackle New Tribunal Law? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, October 17, 2006

The terror legislation set to be signed into law Tuesday by President Bush sits atop an ideological fault line that sharply divides the US Supreme Court and highlights the emerging power of Justice Anthony Kennedy.

The new law rejects at least five key holdings by the liberal wing of the court and sets the stage for what many analysts believe will be yet another historic showdown between the courts, the president, and Congress.

Mr. Bush's authorization of the Military Commissions Act of 2006 will trigger a barrage of challenges asking judges to strike down the law as illegal, unconstitutional, or both. And it has sparked a heated debate among legal scholars and lawmakers.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, who voted for the law, nonetheless told his colleagues just prior to its passage that he doubted the Military Commissions Act would survive judicial scrutiny. Others disagreed. "I bet you dollars to doughnuts when the Supreme Court gets hold of our work product, they are going to approve it," Sen. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina said in a speech on the Senate floor.

The Military Commissions Act of 2006 establishes rules for trying Al Qaeda suspects for war crimes before special military tribunals. It somewhat narrows the protections of the Geneva Conventions available to detainees in the war on terror. And it tosses several hundred detainee lawsuits out of the federal courts, replacing rigorous habeas corpus review with a more constrained and streamlined appeals process.

The sharp divide at the Supreme Court is driven by a fundamental disagreement over the proper level of judicial oversight of the war on terror. Liberal justices seek more aggressive oversight to protect individual liberties. Conservatives favor granting more deference and flexibility to the president/ commander in chief during times of war. Kennedy's key role

Although the votes of specific justices have sometimes been difficult to predict, there are signs that a familiar pattern is emerging in cases dealing with the war on terror. Just as in hot-button social issues like affirmative action and so-called partial-birth abortion, the balance of power in potential landmark national-security cases appears increasingly to rest in the hands of Justice Kennedy.

Of the three major high-court precedents dealing with the war on terror - the Hamdi and Rasul decisions announced in 2004 and the Hamdan decision in June 2006 - Kennedy voted in the majority in all three. Most important, his was the least restrictive opinion of the five-justice liberal majority that struck down Bush's military commission process in June. That is,

DOJ_NMG_0082263

Kennedy was reluctant to go as far as Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Stephen Breyer in limiting Bush's options in the war on terror.

However, he was even more reluctant to grant the president the broad discretion that analysts say would have resulted in the approach favored by Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas, and Samuel Alito.

Instead, Kennedy joined the liberal wing in the Hamdan decision, but once there, he adopted a more centrist stance. He invited Congress to strike the proper balance between protecting national security while also upholding international human rights treaties. "Congress, not the court, is the branch in the better position to undertake the sensitive task of establishing a principle not inconsistent with the national interest or international justice," Kennedy wrote in his concurrence to the Hamdan decision.

The Republican-controlled Congress eagerly accepted the invitation. But if Justice Stevens's Hamdan decision was a rebuke of Bush's terror policies, as many analysts have opined, the Military Commissions Act is a counterrebuke of the liberal wing of the high court - including Kennedy.

The new law rejects much of the liberal wing's approach in the Rasul and Hamdan decisions.

· It rejects the high court's view (in the Rasul decision) that suspected Al Qaeda members detained at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, must be afforded the right to file habeas corpus challenges in US courts.

· It rejects Stevens's majority opinion (in the Hamdan decision) that the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 did not retroactively strip the Supreme Court (and other federal courts) of jurisdiction to hear habeas corpus challenges filed by Guantánamo detainees.

· It rejects the conclusion of four justices in the liberal wing (in Hamdan) that Al Qaeda defendants on trial before military commissions must be allowed to attend their entire trial and confront all evidence being used against them - even when the evidence is classified.

· It rejects the conclusion of the Stevens plurality in the Hamdan decision that conspiracy is not a war crime and thus cannot be the basis of a trial before a military commission operating under the Law of War.

· And it rejects the liberal wing's more expansive view (in Hamdan) of the applicability of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions to Al Qaeda suspects. That provision gives a base line of human rights protections for detainees.

Although Congress and the Bush administration acknowledge that Common Article 3 applies in the war on terror, the Military Commissions Act interprets the treaty in a way that narrows its protections and retroactively provides a defense for US officials who engaged in harsh interrogation tactics such as simulated drowning and induced hypothermia.

Human rights workers say such harsh tactics violate the treaty. Administration officials deny that US personnel have engaged in torture or unlawfully cruel conduct during interrogations. What a new case could revolve around

Ultimately, if the Military Commissions Act winds up before the high court, the outcome may turn on how Kennedy interprets a single paragraph in the 2004 Hamdi decision. At issue in that case was whether a US citizen could be held indefinitely as an enemy combatant. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor (who has since retired) wrote a plurality opinion joined by Kennedy. It said that a citizen-detainee accused of being an enemy combatant must be able to examine the factual basis for his detention and be given a fair opportunity to rebut the government's allegations before a neutral decisionmaker.

Allowing a detainee to file a habeas corpus petition to a federal judge would satisfy this standard, the court said. But the Hamdi opinion continues: "There remains the possibility that the standards we have articulated could be met by an appropriately authorized and properly constituted military tribunal." The opinion cites Army Regulation 190-8 as an appropriate substitute.

In the aftermath of both the Hamdi and Rasul decisions, the Defense Department was searching for a way to avoid a flood of habeas corpus petitions filed on behalf of Guantánamo detainees to federal judges in Washington. Defense officials relied on that key paragraph in the Hamdi decision and created the Combat Status Review Tribunal system, modeled on Army Regulation 190-8. It involves three officers who review evidence supporting a detainee's designation as an enemy combatant.

The thinking was that if the Supreme Court endorsed such a system as a constitutional alternative to habeas corpus review for US citizens in the Hamdi case, the same system should provide more than enough due process to noncitizen enemy combatants being held at Guantánamo.

If Kennedy agrees with this position, the Military Commissions Act would probably survive its most serious legal challenge. But Kennedy's stance on this issue is unclear.

Lawyers for Guantánamo detainees say that Combat Status Review Tribunals (CSRT) fall far short of the fair procedures required in the Hamdi case. "They are a sham," says Thomas Wilner, one of the lead Guantánamo defense lawyers who won the Rasul case and is continuing to litigate related issues at the federal appeals court in Washington. "They did not give what Hamdi said you have to give - the minimal basic due process requirement."

The requirement includes that a detainee receive prior notice of all accusations being made against him and a fair opportunity to confront those charges before a neutral decisionmaker.

DOJ_NMG_0082264

When the evidence is classified, a declassified summary doesn't always provide enough information to enable a detainee to defend himself, defense lawyers say.

In one CSRT hearing, the detainee was accused of associating with a known Al Qaeda operative in Bosnia.

"Give me his name," the detainee said.

The tribunal president said he didn't know the name.

"How can I respond to this?" the detainee asked.

"Did you know of anybody who was a member of Al Qaeda?" the tribunal president asked.

"No, no."

The detainee added, "This is something the interrogators told me a long while ago. I asked the interrogators to tell me who this person was.... If you tell me the name, then I can respond and defend myself against this accusation."

Defense lawyers say that unlike previous wars, most of the US detainees at Guantánamo Bay weren't captured by US soldiers on a battlefield. Many were "sold" to the Americans by Pakistanis and Afghans seeking payment of US bounties for Al Qaeda members even when their Al Qaeda involvement was less than clear. Defense lawyers say this is why there may be a significant number of innocent detainees among those being held at Guantánamo.

This is complicated by the widely held assumption that most bona fide Al Qaeda members will falsely insist during hearings that they are innocent goatherders or hapless students rather than holy warriors. Key parts of the Military Commissions Act

· Establishes special rules for military-commission trials for Al Qaeda suspects accused of committing war crimes. The rules permit the exclusion of a defendant from his trial if classified evidence is being presented, and the admission of hearsay and coerced statements as evidence.

· Authorizes a three-officer military panel to determine a detainee's status as an enemy combatant eligible for indefinite detention in US custody. This is in lieu of the ability to file a habeas corpus petition challenging the legality of the detention in federal court.

· Creates a retroactive legal defense for US personnel who engaged in harsh interrogation tactics from September 2001 to December 2005. Also narrows the range of activities that might constitute a violation of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions outlawing torture and cruel treatment.

· Expands the definition of an unlawful enemy combatant to provide that anyone who offers "material support" to someone engaged in hostilities against the US can be held indefinitely in military detention, regardless of whether he or she actually engaged in hostilities. Also provides that only noncitizens held as unlawful enemy combatants may be tried by a military commission.

Interrogators Beware (WP)

By Stephen Rickard

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

On rare occasions, President Bush and his toughest critics agree on something. That will happen today when Bush signs the Military Commissions Act, while claiming "clear" authorization from Congress for "enhanced" CIA interrogations. Many critics claim the bill authorizes torture. Fortunately, both sides are wrong.

You can't blame the CIA for demanding clear authorization. It reportedly was using waterboarding (a terrifying mock execution in which a prisoner is strapped to a board and convinced he is being drowned), dousing naked prisoners with water in 50-degree cold and forcing shackled prisoners to stand for 40 straight hours.

Should the CIA be worried? Yes. The United States has prosecuted every one of these techniques as a war crime. So when Congress passed the McCain amendment last fall banning cruel treatment, CIA interrogators reportedly stopped working. Vice President Cheney had sought an exemption for the CIA -- but didn't get one. The administration apparently pushed the interrogators hard to resume their tactics, saying these techniques were still legal, but the CIA refused.

It seems the agency had learned an important lesson from the infamous Justice Department "torture memo," which claimed that to be deemed "torture" a procedure had to be capable of causing major organ failure or death. The administration repudiated the memo when it became public. The lesson? Secret, contorted legal opinions don't provide any real protection to CIA officers.

So the CIA demanded "clarity" -- from Congress. No wonder President Bush practically sprinted to the cameras to begin spinning his "compromise" with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) on the Military Commissions Act. He needs to convince CIA interrogators that they now have congressional carte blanche.

They don't. In fact, if they yield to White House pressure to renew brutal interrogations, they will be at greater risk than they were last fall.

DOJ_NMG_0082265

The bill's language on torture is far from perfect, and it has many other objectionable provisions. It should have been rejected. But on its face it criminalizes cruel treatment. An interrogator can go to prison if a court finds that the techniques used caused "serious" mental or physical "suffering," which need not be "prolonged." According to Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), the administration agrees that this rules out waterboarding.

As for hypothermia, prolonged sleep deprivation and stress positions, does the CIA really want to put that question to a jury? Legions of highly qualified experts would line up to testify that these techniques cause severe, prolonged suffering. The CIA knows this. It funded some of the seminal studies on the subject.

As for Congress, administration supporters made general claims about the importance of continuing "the program" and its legality. But Graham said specifically that the bill "reined in the [CIA] program." McCain said it can be interpreted to mean that "extreme deprivation -- sleep deprivation, hypothermia and others -- would be not allowed." Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) said that such abusive techniques are "clearly prohibited by the bill."

"Reined in," "not allowed," "clearly prohibited" -- that's from the bill's Republican sponsors in the Senate. The House was no more supportive. The chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), said it is "absolutely false" to claim that the bill authorizes the "enhanced" techniques. Another senior House Republican, Rep. Christopher Shays of Connecticut, said that "any reasonable person" would conclude that the CIA's techniques "clearly cause 'serious mental and physical suffering.' " That's congressional approval?

Another inconvenient fact for the White House: The bill emphatically reaffirmed the McCain amendment -- the law that led the CIA to demand clear authorization in the first place.

The Bush administration has been pushing the idea that the McCain amendment is infinitely elastic, banning only what "shocks the conscience" -- that no technique is prohibited if interrogators need the information badly enough. Under this preposterous theory, Japanese Americans could have been tortured after Pearl Harbor if authorities thought it would reveal an imminent attack on the West Coast. It's really "in the eye of the beholder," said Cheney.

But if a CIA interrogator is indicted after this administration leaves office, it will not matter whether keeping a naked prisoner standing for 40 straight hours shocks Dick Cheney. It will matter whether it shocks the court.

U.S. courts know cruelty when they see it, even if the Bush Justice Department doesn't. The Supreme Court agreed decades ago that sleep deprivation "is the most effective torture" and said that "the blood of the accused is not the only hallmark of an unconstitutional inquisition . . . the efficiency of the rack and the thumbscrew can be matched . . . by more sophisticated modes of 'persuasion.' "

The administration is trying to convince CIA officers that they won't be indicted -- or at least convicted. But the CIA demanded clarity, not more ambiguity and "plausible deniability."

At the end of the day all the president can honestly tell CIA interrogators is this: "The law has some loose language. We'll give you another memo. Don't worry."

Sure.

The writer is director of the Washington office of the Open Society Institute.

Sami's Shame, And Ours (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

There is no public evidence that Sami al-Hajj committed any crime other than journalism for a television network the Bush administration doesn't like.

But the U.S. has been holding Mr. Hajj, a cameraman for Al Jazeera, for nearly five years without trial, mostly at Guantánamo Bay. With the jailing of Mr. Hajj and of four journalists in Iraq, the U.S. ranked No. 6 in the world in the number of journalists it imprisoned last year, just behind Uzbekistan and tied with Burma, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.

This week, President Bush is expected to sign the Military Commissions Act concerning prisoners at Guantánamo, and he has hailed the law as "a strong signal to the terrorists." But the closer you look at Guantánamo the more you feel that it will be remembered mostly as a national disgrace.

Mr. Hajj is the only journalist known to be there, and, of course, it's possible that he is guilty of terrorist-related crimes. If so, he should be tried, convicted and sentenced.

But so far, the evidence turned up by his lawyers and by the Committee to Protect Journalists — which published an excellent report on Mr. Hajj's case this month — suggests that the U.S. military may be keeping him in hopes of forcing him to become a spy.

Mr. Hajj, 37, who attended university and speaks English, joined Al Jazeera as a cameraman in April 2000 and covered the war in Afghanistan. He was detained on Dec. 15, 2001, and taken to the American military prison in Bagram, Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0082266

"They were the longest days of my life," Mr. Hajj's lawyers quoted him as saying. He told them he was repeatedly beaten, kicked, starved, left out in the freezing cold and subjected to anal cavity searches in public "just to humiliate me."

In June 2002, Mr. Hajj was flown to Guantánamo, where he says the beatings initially were brutal but have since subsided somewhat.

At first, interrogators said Mr. Hajj had shot video of Osama bin Laden during an Al Jazeera interview, but it turned out that they may have mixed him up with another cameraman of a similar name. When that assertion fell apart, the authorities offered accusations that he had ferried a large sum of money to a suspicious Islamic charity, that he had supported Chechen rebels, and that he had once given a car ride and other assistance to an official of Al Qaeda.

One indication that even our government may not take those accusations so seriously is that the interrogations barely touched on them, Mr. Hajj's lawyers say.

"About 95 percent of the interrogations he went through were about Al Jazeera," said one of the lawyers, Zachary Katznelson of London. "Sami would say, 'What about me? Will you ask about me?' "

He added, "It really does seem that the focus of the inquiry is about his employer, Al Jazeera, and not about him or any actions he may have taken."

Mr. Katznelson also says that interrogators told Mr. Hajj they would free him immediately if he would agree to go back to Al Jazeera and spy on it. He once asked what would happen if he backed out of the deal after he was free.

"You would not do that," Mr. Hajj quoted his interrogator as saying, "because it would endanger your child."

The Defense Department declined to comment on Mr. Hajj's case, saying that in general, it does not comment on specific detainees at Guantánamo.

While Mr. Hajj is unknown in the U.S., his case has received wide attention in the Arab world. The Bush administration is thus doing long-term damage to American interests.

Mr. Hajj's lawyers say he has two torn ligaments in his knee from abuse in his first weeks in custody, making it exceptionally painful for him to use the squat toilet in his cell. The lawyers say he has been offered treatment for his knee and a sitting toilet that would be less painful to use — but only if he spills dirt on Al Jazeera. And he says he has none to spill.

And while Defense Department documents indicate that he has been a model inmate at Guantánamo, he protests that he has been called racial epithets (he is black) and that he has seen guards desecrate the Koran.

When Sudan detained an American journalist, Paul Salopek, in August in Darfur, journalists and human rights groups reacted with outrage until he was freed a month later. We should be just as offended when it is our own government that is sinking to Sudanese standards of justice.

This doesn't look like a war on terrorism, but a war on our own values.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Mandatory Anthrax Shots To Return (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

The Defense Department will resume mandatory anthrax vaccinations for more than 200,000 troops and defense contractors within 60 days, a Pentagon official said yesterday, rejecting the concerns of some veterans and service members who say that the vaccine has not been proved safe or effective.

The vaccinations will be required for most military units and civilian contractors assigned to homeland bioterrorism defense or deployed in Iraq, Afghanistan or South Korea, said William Winkenwerder Jr., a physician and the assistant secretary of defense for health affairs. As troops rotate in and out of those regions, the number receiving vaccinations will grow considerably, he said.

A lawsuit filed by six former or current service members had blocked the mandatory vaccinations since October 2004, when U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan ruled that the Food and Drug Administration had erred in approving the vaccine in 2003 without seeking public comment and conducting a full review.

But the FDA then held a 90-day comment period to overcome that hurdle and granted the vaccine final approval last December, clearing a legal path for the Pentagon to resume the controversial program.

"The FDA went out again . . . and came to the very unambiguous and clear conclusion that the vaccine was safe and it was effective against all forms of exposure," Winkenwerder said. "In our view, that has definitively settled the question."

DOJ_NMG_0082267

But Mark Zaid, an attorney for the six plaintiffs, said yesterday that Sullivan's ruling and the Pentagon's remedy both turned on procedural technicalities. The plaintiffs plan to file a new lawsuit challenging the government's contention that human studies from the 1950s and more recent studies in animals demonstrated the safety and efficacy of the vaccine.

"It is an unnecessary, unproven and potentially unsafe vaccine," Zaid said. "Everyone is concerned as to their health, and the fact is that there is no scientific evidence that the vaccine works in humans. . . . I think this program is nothing more than a glorified public relations campaign to demonstrate that they are doing something."

Anthrax is a deadly infectious disease caused by the spore-forming bacterium Bacillus anthracis . A month after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, letters tainted with anthrax infected people in Connecticut, Florida, New Jersey, New York and the District. The unsolved attacks killed five people, sickened 17 and caused about 10,000 to be put on antibiotics.

Although the previous anthrax attacks occurred on U.S. soil, Winkenwerder said troops overseas are believed to be a higher risk, and military personnel in the United States do not have to receive the six shots.

"I have not been vaccinated because I'm not in any of the targeted groups," Winkenwerder said. "If I was, I would receive the vaccine without hesitation."

The Clinton administration began the mandatory vaccinations in 1997. Over the next few years, hundreds of active-duty service members refused to take the vaccine, and more than 100 were court-martialed as a result. Winkenwerder said that 27 people refused the vaccine and left the military in 2003, and that 10 did so in 2004. A voluntary vaccination program that Sullivan allowed last year saw participation rates of 50 percent, Winkenwerder said. In all, more than 1.2 million military and civilian personnel have received the vaccine.

Some who received vaccinations for anthrax and smallpox around the time of the 2003 invasion of Iraq have complained of fatigue, migraines, pain and diseases such as multiple sclerosis.

Winkenwerder said that, as with any vaccine, some who receive the shots develop adverse reactions, but that there is no evidence to indicate a particular problem with the anthrax vaccine.

But as recently as this spring, the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, said questions remain about the vaccine. "The long term safety of the licensed vaccine has not been studied," the agency said in a May 9 report. ". . . Also, there is some evidence that the current anthrax vaccine may have diminished efficacy against certain virulent strains of anthrax."

Barbara Loe Fisher, president of the National Vaccine Information Center, said her nonprofit advocacy group is adding more information to its Web site about the research and development of biological defense vaccines.

"The DOD has a moral duty to fully disclose anthrax vaccine risks, as well as benefits, to soldiers and allow them to make an informed, voluntary decision," she said in a statement.

Luck May Have Spared Aides In Anthrax Attack (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

The letter from the fourth-grade class of the “Greendale School” in Franklin Park, N.J., arrived on a Friday afternoon at Room 509 of the Hart Senate Office Building. It quickly was shipped up to the sixth-floor mailroom — its last stop on a four-day, roughly 160-mile journey that would leave several people dead, more than a dozen injured and the Congressional community in shock.

But no one opened the letter that Friday, as the interns and staff who dealt with mail in then-Sen. Tom Daschle’s (D-S.D.) office were instead getting lectured about the threat of biochemical attacks through the postal service. By Monday morning, Grant Leslie, an intern, had found the seemingly innocent letter, postmarked Oct. 9, 2001, at the top of a pile and made the slightest cut in the envelope, causing a small amount of powder to spill on her skirt, shoes, the intern standing next to her and the office floor.

Five years later, those ex-staffers and health experts who dealt with the medical issues involved in the immediate aftermath of the anthrax attacks largely attribute the fact that those exposed to the deadly biological agent avoided long-term health problems to a single factor: luck.

“We are very lucky that no one died,” said Greg Martin, who at the time was head of the infectious disease center at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda.

Interviews with Daschle, some of his former staffers, other Congressional aides and experts involved with the short-term fallout from the anthrax attacks on Capitol Hill revealed that a series of actions taken along the way — some well-thought-out, others largely accidental — combined to allow for a relatively happy ending rather than a deadly outcome.

Mistakes were made at the outset, and internal fights between agencies continued for months afterward, but each of those setbacks was gradually overcome, some because of hard work and some a result of preparation for just such an attack.

Several of the actions taken at the time were not revealed to the public for months or even years, and in the process created the potential for far greater carnage from the attacks, such as:

· The Daschle intern, Grant Leslie, only partially opened the letter, which was then fully opened minutes later by Capitol Police on the scene, an act that may have further spread the anthrax spores into the air and a ventilation system that didn't stop running for 45 minutes after the first emergency call was placed;

· The initial recommendation to the aides from the Office of the Attending Physician, after several hours of being essentially quarantined in an anthrax-laden office, was that only the staffers on the sixth floor in and around the mail room needed to be tested for exposure, while other staffers in Hart were allowed to go home without monitoring;

· Even after staffers demanded they all be tested — a process which revealed a total of 20 aides were exposed — the experts on the scene allowed the staff to go home without any decontamination, potentially spreading the agent throughout the Washington, D.C., metropolitan region.

In the end, five people died along the East Coast from anthrax-laced letters sent to Daschle, Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), NBC News and the New York Post. Just a few blocks from the Capitol, two employees at the U.S. Postal Service's Brentwood facility, which processed the letter to Daschle and another anthrax-tainted letter to Leahy, discovered a month later, died from anthrax inhalation.

"The luckiest thing was we saw the powder, unlike the postal workers. That's the critical difference between our people living through it and those two postal workers not living through it," said Laura Petrou, Daschle's chief of staff in his Hart office at the time.

…

While federal investigators have failed to apprehend the source of the anthrax attacks, each of the letters was sent from suburban New Jersey, routed through Trenton, and then delivered to Washington. By the time they hit the Capitol, the potential anthrax threat had already become a central topic in discussions of terrorist threats, as the NBC and New York Post letters had already been discovered. Roll Call's lead headline on Oct. 15, 2001, was "Hill Braces for Anthrax."

That morning, according to numerous sources inside the Daschle office at the time, Leslie had only barely opened the letter from the "Greendale School." (It would later be revealed that there is there is no such school in the Garden State.) She sat frozen, refusing to further open the letter and potentially have more powder come out — a fact that runs contrary to the public perception at the time that the intern had ripped open the letter and accidentally sprayed anthrax spores throughout the office.

The first Capitol Police officers on the scene weren't even equipped with hazardous materials suits to handle the letter, according to Daschle and ex-staffers who was in the Hart office that day. According to a book he wrote about the 107th Congress, Daschle said the call to the Capitol Police from his office about the suspicious envelope was the third they'd received that morning.

The officers opened the letter and read aloud: "You cannot stop us. We have this anthrax. You die now. Are you afraid? Death to America. Death to Israel. Allah is great." Within minutes, other officers arrived on the scene in hazardous materials suits, calls to the FBI and Centers for Disease Control went out, and the on-scene officers conducted field tests which immediately came back with the news that would rock the Capitol for months to come: a positive result for anthrax.

In the Capitol, where he was serving as Senate Majority Leader, Daschle received the news from a top aide and began calling family members of the aides exposed to the powder. Even as he was absorbing the news, he took a call from President Bush about other anti-terror matters, during which he informed Bush that the field tests for anthrax were positive. Minutes later, in a press conference, Bush told the world about the letters testing positive, sending a wave of dread throughout the Hart building.

"There was really no knowledge about what should be done. The book had not been written," said Martin, who was brought in as an adviser to the situation by Attending Physician John Eisold.

…

Martin said the officers opening the letter and reading it aloud probably did expose the area around the Daschle mail room to a greater level of contamination, but he added that the two grams of the deadly agent were so potent that everyone on that floor likely had been exposed already. He compared the incident to opening a canister of gasoline in a small room, which would fill the room with its odor in a matter of seconds.

Just as big a problem was the fact that it took 45 minutes to shut down the HVAC system in Hart. Likewise, much of the scientific history regarding anthrax and its interaction with humans came from military testing conducted in the 1950s.

Eisold's office, consulting with other medical experts from the CDC and Bethesda Naval, believed that the aides on the fifth-floor Daschle office would be fine, and dispatched the mail room staff to a ninth-floor office for testing. The remaining 25 or so staffers quarantined in the fifth floor were kept there for the next five hours — long enough that a pizza delivery man was eventually summoned to deliver lunch and accidentally went too far into the office, potentially exposing himself to the agent.

DOJ_NMG_0082269

At one point that afternoon, the staff were told they could go home without getting tested for anthrax exposure, a process which involved using a nasal swab to test for any anthrax spores. A legislative assistant to Daschle, Peter Hanson, dissented, and soon a group of staffers were circulating a petition demanding to be swabbed, according to aides in the room.

Eventually, the clamor led to any concerned staffer being allowed to be tested, and all were eventually tested. But many left their offices that day believing that they were condescended to by police and health officials.

Looking back, Martin said this — letting the staff leave without going through some sort of decontamination process, letting them go to the Capitol and then home wearing the same clothes that they had been wearing — was the most critical mistake made in the entire anthrax ordeal.

Daschle recalled an emotional scene that Monday afternoon when his Capitol-based staff finally got to see their friends from Hart. "We all hugged them, not thinking that their clothes were probably totally saturated with these anthrax spores," he said in a recent interview.

That night, tests came back revealing that more than 20 staffers had tested positive for anthrax exposure (that number would settle at 20 after all the proper tests were done). Additional tests came back showing that the grade of anthrax involved was a more dangerous, more purified form and had spread farther than anyone initially suspected.

Pete Rouse, Daschle's leadership chief of staff, and Petrou began calling aides and telling them to assemble in the Capitol the next morning for the most serious meeting they were ever likely to have. "That was pretty devastating. I was terrified that some of them were going to die," Petrou recalled recently.

They showed up at the Capitol that Tuesday morning with trash bags filled with their clothes from the day before, which were then turned over to the FBI for testing.

Daschle's staff made an immediate decision that they would tackle the issue together, regardless of who among them had tested positive and who hadn't. No one would identify to the media which staffers tested positive, and they went to great lengths to initially conceal Leslie's identity as the person who initially opened the letter.

Daschle identified Leslie, who returned to Capitol Hill to work full time for Daschle, in his book. The then-intern, who now works for Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), has declined all media interviews on the topic.

…

The ensuing days were a back-and-forth of confusion and fear, as thousands in the Capitol complex lined up for nasal swabs and to receive their supply of the powerful antibiotic Cipro.

Briefings were given to chiefs of staff to relay information to anxious aides throughout the Capitol, but many staffers left those meetings confused. "It's easy to Monday-morning quarterb ack, but I think it would have been better if they told us, 'This is our best estimate, we've never done this before.' We didn't get that," said Luke Albee, Leahy's chief of staff at the time.

Several staffers in the offices of Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), next door to 509 Hart, also tested positive for anthrax exposure. Martin, who is now in charge of the infectious disease program at the Naval Medical Research Center in Lima, Peru, said the health-care community had never encountered anything like the level of anthrax exposure displayed in some of the staffers, which he described as "hundreds" of times above the amount that could kill them.

If those immediately exposed had not been placed on Cipro within 24 hours, Martin said he believes fatalities would have occurred on the Hill. In addition, had Leslie not seen the powdery substance, Martin said, "I think we would have had scores if not hundreds of deaths."

Martin acknowledged that several things would be done differently in the event of a similar biochemical attack, notably not leaving those exposed in the same room for hours on end, and not sending them home before going through decontamination.

"What saved those people was knowing or suspecting it was anthrax [in the letter], and getting them on antibiotics," he added.

By the end of the year, the staffers and Capitol Police who tested positive for exposure had received an anthrax vaccine as an extra precaution, the final seal of approval for medical experts. And throughout the ordeal, staffers for Daschle and Feingold continued performing the everyday tasks that came with their profession.

"They all carried out their jobs really well, under extraordinary pressure, and wondering whether they were going to die," Petrou said.

Heavy Load Port-Security Plan, A Bid To Foil Terror, May Slow Deliveries (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

LONG BEACH, Calif. -- Rafael Rivera spends more than a dozen hours a day in the cab of his old blue truck. In a typical day spent hauling shipping containers from the Port of Long Beach to distribution centers for companies such as Ikea, Pier 1 Imports or Toyota, the El Salvadoran immigrant clears about $8 an hour.

Mr. Rivera's humble but critical job is about to come under scrutiny. A federal antiterrorism program set to go into practice later this year will require port workers -- including more than 100,000 drivers like Mr. Rivera who pass through the nation's terminals -- to prove they are legal U.S. residents. While Mr. Rivera says he's here on a work permit, many drivers in this predominantly Hispanic work force are believed to be illegal immigrants. For the harbor trucking industry, which already faces a shortage of drivers, the new regulations promise to make the crunch acute.

Washington's bid to ratchet up port security is expected to leave thousands of undocumented drivers without jobs in ports across the country. That would undermine the flow of goods to U.S. consumers, highlighting the crucial role immigrants such as Mr. Rivera play in the nation's economy.

At issue is the Transportation Worker Identification Credential program, or TWIC, a component of the Maritime Transportation Security Act of 2002. Under this federal program's guidelines, workers with unescorted access to secure U.S. port areas must be legal residents and pass a background check. Disqualifying felonies are likely to include robbery and drug dealing. Those who pass will be issued biometric identification cards, which include a photo and fingerprints. Workers will gain access to a secure port area by swiping the cards at the entrance.

The worker-credential plan wasn't crafted with illegal immigrant workers in mind. It was an outgrowth of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, which alerted authorities to the vulnerability of U.S. infrastructure and raised concerns that radioactive materials could be smuggled into one of the country's 180 commercial ports. After languishing for years, TWIC -- which will be implemented by two Homeland Security divisions, the U.S. Coast Guard and the Transportation Security Administration -- is expected to launch late this year, says a TSA spokesman.

The program will require identification cards for about 750,000 port workers nationwide, which include about 110,000 truck drivers, the TSA says. A large proportion of the truckers are Hispanic -- as much as 90% at the sprawling, adjacent harbors of Los Angeles and Long Beach, the nation's busiest ports. No one knows for sure how many are illegal immigrants, though estimates range from 20% to 50% nationally. With these truckers out of the work force, major ports such as Houston, Miami and New York-New Jersey would also be heavily affected.

"We need TWIC for security," says Bill Madden, general manager for terminal services at Long Beach Container Terminal Inc. "But it will cause a big dislocation. The truckers are the guys who make this place work."

Critical Link

The drivers form a critical link between global suppliers to retailers throughout the U.S. Nationwide, they haul everything from spare auto parts and life-saving medical devices to toys and T-shirts from harbors to distribution points 50 or 100 miles away. Working as independent contractors, they are paid a flat per-trip fee -- typically $40 to $100, depending on the distance between port and warehouse, and averaging about $55. Most drive aged trucks -- known as bobtails -- to which they attach trailer rigs. They normally take out loans to buy the trucks, paying them off in monthly installments. The drivers are paid by trucking firms retained by freight forwarders, steamship lines and importers.

Mr. Rivera's experience illustrates why U.S. citizens aren't clamoring for these jobs. On a recent day at noon, the 51-year-old trucker parked his rig in a transportation company's staging yard to wait for an assignment. At 3 p.m., a dispatcher gave him a ticket for the day's first container pickup. Mr. Rivera drove to the Long Beach port so he could be among the first to get his load when the harbor opened for its 6 p.m. night shift.

His first load was a container heading to Kmart, which he dropped at a consolidation yard near the port. By 3 a.m. the next morning, Mr. Rivera had made two additional round trips to retailer warehouses and railway depots in Southern California.

Mr. Rivera bought his truck, which has nearly 900,000 miles on the engine, for $15,000, plus about $3,000 more he paid to service a loan. After accounting for fuel, insurance and truck maintenance, he figures he clears about $2,400 a month. He shares a $600-a-month, one-room apartment with his wife, Carlota, as well as the youngest of their five children and a 28-year-old niece.

The worst part of the job, Mr. Rivera says, is sitting in line for a container -- downtime he's only rarely paid for. "Sometimes I wait four or five hours just to collect one little box," he said, speaking in Spanish. He clears his throat often when he talks. Asked about the cause, he mentions the pollution from the hundreds of trucks idling at one time at the port.

Few Americans want these jobs, says Bob Curry, president of California Cartage Co., a privately held Southern California port-logistics company. The per-trip pay structure of port trucking isn't as attractive as the hourly wages more typical of the local trucking business. Already, Mr. Curry estimates, turnover among the 12,000 drivers who work the Long Beach-Los Angeles port complex is about 60% each year. "They can haul dirt for more money than cargo," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0082271

A cut in the work force could be devastating, as a nationwide work-stoppage earlier this year demonstrated. As few as 10% of all truckers at Los Angeles-Long Beach picked up containers on May 1, when pro-immigration groups called a "Day Without Immigrants." Freeways normally jammed with immigrant-driven rigs were virtually free of trucks.

More than half of all imported apparel and shoes bound for U.S. stores move through Los Angeles or Long Beach ports, says Bruce Berton, officer/director of international business consulting at Stonefield Josephson Inc., a textile and apparel accounting firm. Other ports wouldn't be able to pick up the slack on short notice, he says. Consumers would feel shortages within 30 days. "It would seriously disrupt the economy," says Mr. Berton, who is also on the board of the Export Textile Advisor Commission of the U.S. Department of Trade.

The Transportation Security Administration says it is aware of the ID program's potential impact on port work forces. "We will continue to work with industry, port authorities and workers to address it as we roll out this vital security measure," says Darrin Kayser, manager of strategic initiatives for the TSA.

Demand for port truckers has soared in recent years, as maritime transportation has been revolutionized by containers -- large, stackable steel boxes that are easily transferred between ships, trucks and rail cars. More than 14 million twenty-foot-equivalent containers moved through Los Angeles-Long Beach in 2005, compared with 9.5 million in 2000. The ports began operating a night shift last year and expect container traffic to increase again this year. Overall, the value of international trade in and out of the U.S. climbed to $949 billion in 2004, up 29% from 2000.

At the Los Angeles-Long Beach ports, truckers have enormous freedom to roam the terminals. On a recent day, after presenting his driver's license and container number at the gate, Guatemalan immigrant Carlos Ruiz rumbled into a Long Beach terminal, which looks like a massive parking lot on the water's edge. He weaved through row after row of containers stacked four high, driving with relief past a line of truckers waiting for their containers to be plucked from a pile. "If I'd been assigned to a container in that other row I'd be stuck here another three hours," Mr. Ruiz said.

His container sat halfway down a stack at Row D. There, Mr. Ruiz waited a few minutes for a crane operator -- whom he called a "flip-iadora," Spanglish for a woman who "flips" containers -- to lower a 40-foot orange container onto his truck. His rig trembled at the 20-ton impact.

The drivers have no idea what the sealed containers hold. Mr. Ruiz, en route to a Target distribution center in nearby Carson, could have been hauling plastic toys or millions of dollars worth of plasma TVs. "I know what's sold at Target, but I have no idea what's in this container," he said.

As Mr. Ruiz headed toward the gate, the number on his container was read by an optical camera and checked against his delivery ticket. A taped message informed him, in English and Spanish, that he was free to exit the terminal. After delivering his load to Target he began the cycle again, picking up an empty container from the retailer's yard and returning it to the port.

The unescorted terminal access of Mr. Ruiz and other drivers is what worries some security officials. They're concerned that truckers, whose vehicles aren't inspected when they enter a terminal, could be persuaded to carry explosives inside, or facilitate passage of lethal cargo. "If a port is a target, these extremely low-income truck drivers are susceptible to bribery," says Jon Haveman, a research fellow at the Public Policy Institute of California, a nonpartisan institute that studies state social, political and economic issues.

Lapses Abound

Experts in security say that lapses abound at the seaports. Port truckers aren't allowed to bring unauthorized guests into a marine terminal, for example. But recently one trucker entered Los Angeles port with his adult son sitting beside him. Both father and son, who asked not to be identified, said that the son frequently rides along.

Immigrant advocates and port experts say truck drivers rank far down the list of potential security threats. The big concern is that nuclear devices or other weapons could be smuggled from abroad and detonated on U.S. shores. U.S. Customs and Border Protection, a Homeland Security division, is addressing smuggling: The agency has struck accords with foreign governments to station U.S. inspectors abroad to examine some U.S.-bound containers. The program is operating at 50 ports so far. On Friday, President Bush signed a law that would place radiation-detection equipment at 22 U.S. ports by the end of next year.

Unauthorized workers often carry false Social Security numbers or work under the names of others. But bosses at the area's dozens of trucking companies say they're not in the position to verify whether documents provided by employment-seeking immigrants are authentic. Such undocumented drivers account for as many as half of the port-trucking work force nationwide, estimates Michael H. Belzer, professor of industrial relations at Wayne State University. By comparison, more than 50% of crop workers are undocumented, according to the U.S. Labor Department.

Port trucking hasn't always been so unappealing to American workers. Decades ago, when the jobs fell under Teamsters union protection, they offered middle-class wages and benefits. But in the 1970s, major industrial shippers lobbied for an open market to reduce the cost of transporting goods.

DOJ_NMG_0082272

When the government deregulated trucking in 1980, nonunion, mom-and-pop trucking firms rushed in. Many union shops folded and most unionized truckers left the ports. Pay and work conditions soon deteriorated, according to Wayne State's Mr. Belzer, who wrote a book on the transformation, "Sweatshops on Wheels." Many of the jobs were taken by Hispanic immigrants.

To protest poor conditions, about 6,000 Latino port truckers in Los Angeles and Long Beach stopped driving in the spring of 1996. Shipping companies and trucking firms were unresponsive and ultimately the campaign failed. "I ruined my credit, lost my car and the trucking company didn't want me back," says Enrique Aguilar, a veteran trucker who stayed away for four months.

A survey conducted in 2004 by Kristin Monaco, a professor at California State University, Long Beach, found that port truckers in Los Angeles-Long Beach earned a median $25,000 a year after expenses. By comparison, unionized longshoremen, who unload containers from incoming vessels, make about $110,000.

Trucking companies say they have little power to raise wages to attract new drivers, because new firms are constantly cropping up and offering lower transport rates to importers. Margins are razor-thin. Averting a longer-term driver shortage would require trucking companies to raise pay enough to make driving jobs more attractive. But that would mean charging higher fees, which the trucking companies say importers and freight forwarders are reluctant to accept.

It's not clear whether consumers would feel the impact of a price hike. Currently, for a typical pair of shoes, freight, duty and brokerage charges come to about $1.15, says Mr. Berton of Stonefield Josephson. Of that, he says, the cost of transporting the shoes from port to distribution center is minimal -- about one cent per pair.

Ashcroft Criticized For Book On 9/11 Panel (AP)

AP, October 17, 2006

ST. LOUIS - Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft has been blasted by fellow Republicans for his new book criticizing the 9/11 Commission's investigation of the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Republicans who served on the commission told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that Ashcroft's behavior as a witness and as an author is "underhanded" and "outrageous."

In his book, "Never Again," Ashcroft accuses the commission of "assessing blame and grandstanding" instead of finding the truth and protecting Americans.

He alleges that the hearings "disintegrated into show trials" and that the Republican-chaired panel was "dangerously out of control" and "obsessed" with blaming President Bush for not preventing the terrorist attacks while "absolving" President Clinton's administration.

Ashcroft's spokeswoman said he stands by the accounts in his book.

Former Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., said Ashcroft was the least interested in helping the panel get at the facts of what had happened before Sept. 11, 2001, so another terrorist attack could be averted.

"John was the least cooperative of all the witnesses we had," Gorton said. "He was the only one who refused to submit his written testimony in advance, he probably came with the largest entourage of any of the people we talked to, and he engaged in a disingenuous and partisan attack" on the committee.

Former Illinois Gov. James Thompson said Ashcroft's behavior as a witness was so bad that Bush privately apologized to commission members.

"Ashcroft tried to put us on trial and it backfired. The president of the United States apologized to us in the Oval Office for his conduct, which is kind of embarrassing," Thompson said.

"The president has thanked us for our report, and he gave us a four-hour interview," Thompson said. "As far as I can tell, the American people overwhelmingly support the commission and our report. The Congress supports the commission and our work. We were not partisan - we were evenhanded, and we made recommendations based on the history of what happened. So I don't know where John is coming from."

Thompson said the only motive he could guess at is that Ashcroft is "selling a book."

In his testimony before the commission in April 2004, Ashcroft indicated that commission member Jamie Gorelick, a Justice Department official in the Clinton administration, had put up barriers between intelligence and law enforcement that contributed to the terrorist attacks.

But Gorton said that weeks before Ashcroft testified, his own Justice Department had reaffirmed that the barriers should continue. So while Ashcroft tried to divide panel members along partisan lines, his only impact was to antagonize and further unify them, Gorton said.

The former Missouri governor and senator writes about the "Democratic vitriol" he faced during his confirmation hearing to be attorney general.

DOJ_NMG_0082273

He lists a number of personal accomplishments after Sept. 11 that he says helped protect the nation, including arrests, surveillance and deportations, while still respecting civil liberties.

He now runs the Ashcroft Group, a Washington-based consulting and lobbying business that assists firms seeking contracts in the field of homeland security and helps with corporate management.

In his book, Ashcroft blames the loss of his Senate seat in 2000 to Democrat Mel Carnahan partly on newspapers that venerated the former governor.

Ashcroft also contends that the Carnahan campaign, continued by his widow, Jean Carnahan, pre-empted Ashcroft's own message by focusing on the late governor's "family values."

In 3rd Storm, FEMA Trailer Is A Charm (NYT)

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

LEEVILLE, La., Oct. 16 — Jack Melancon lost his shrimp nets and his roof to Hurricane Katrina last year and the rest of his house to flooding from Hurricane Rita.

So when he awoke Monday morning to the groan of a tornado advancing on his government-issued trailer home here about 60 miles south of New Orleans, Mr. Melancon, a commercial fisherman, was certain he was about to take a third strike.

Skipping across the wind-driven waters of Bayou Lafourche, the tornado toppled trailers and cut shrimp boats free, driving one into a natural gas pipeline that was quickly turned off. Two people suffered minor injuries.

The tornado snatched the roof from the house of Mr. Melancon's father and the siding from the house of his brother. Then it hurled debris against Mr. Melancon's trailer, provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Short-lived banshee winds strained to pull the trailer from the soggy earth, but metal straps held it firm. The storm then veered north and disappeared.

"It rocked and it rolled and it shook and it blew," Mr. Melancon said. "The trailer did its job. I would recommend one of these to anybody."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Reassures Iraqi U.S. Troops Are Staying (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

President Bush yesterday assured Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he has no plans to withdraw troops from Iraq and told him there is no truth to rumors that the United States has set a two-month deadline for his government to control sectarian violence.

In a 15-minute phone call initiated by the president, Mr. al-Maliki raised concerns about the rumored timeline, saying such reports undermine confidence in the Iraqi government and inspire terrorists.

"The president underscored his commitment to a democratically elected government of Iraq, encouraging the prime minister to ignore rumors that the United States government was seeking to impose a timeline on the [al-Maliki] government," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

Mr. al-Maliki "said that rumors sometimes can undercut confidence in the government and also its ability to work effectively in fighting terror," Mr. Snow said. "And the president said, 'Don't worry. You still have our full support.' "

The White House did not know where Mr. al-Maliki picked up the rumors, but the prime minister may have been referring to comments by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, who said earlier this month that the United States might have to consider a change of course if the Iraqi government fails to restore order within two or three months.

During the phone call, Mr. Bush and Mr. al-Maliki also discussed suggestions that Iraq be broken into three regions -- one each for Kurds, Sunnis and Shi'ites -- as a way to end sectarian violence. But the two leaders rejected such a division.

"I don't think that's the right way to go. I think that will increase sectarian violence. I think that will make it more dangerous -- and so does [Mr. al-Maliki]," Mr. Bush said yesterday in an interview with Bill O'Reilly on the Fox News Channel.

"On the point you brought up about dividing the country in three, he rejected that strongly. He thought that was a bad idea. And I agree with him. ... Federalism is one thing, in other words, giving a balance between regional government and central government, but dividing is basically saying there will be three autonomous regions, will create, Bill, a situation where Sunnis and Sunni nations and Sunni radicals will be competing against Shia radicals.

"The Kurds will then create problems for Turkey and Syria. And you've got a bigger mess than we have at this point in time, which I believe is going to be solved," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082274

Mr. Bush also used the phone call to press the prime minister, telling him "we expect you to make tough political decisions to move forward. And he assured me he would continue to make tough political decisions necessary to move forward."

The president also told Mr. al-Maliki that he supports efforts to go after militias and terrorists through political, economic and military means, Mr. Snow said. In turn, Mr. al-Maliki "debunked this notion that he's not going to go after these criminal elements and/or militias that are killing innocent people," Mr. Bush said on Fox. "He knows he's got to provide the security necessary for this country to move forward."

Sectarian Fighting Kills 91 In Balad; Sunnis Flee City (USAT)

USA Today, October 17, 2006

BAGHDAD — Four days of violence in Balad, an hour's drive north of the capital, left at least 91 people dead by Monday. All but 17 were Sunni Muslims.

Also Monday, the U.S. military said five soldiers and two Marines were killed Sunday. The latest deaths put the American military toll so far in October to 58; the month is on course to be the deadliest since 107 U.S. servicemembers died in January 2005.

The violence in Balad began Friday when the headless bodies of 17 Shiite Muslims were found in an orchard. Over the next three days, Shiite death squads killed 74 Sunnis and forced many more to flee east across the Tigris River to the Sunni-dominated city of Duluiyah, police said. Mohamed Ali Hamid, 35, a Sunni taxi driver, said Shiite militiamen gave his family just two hours to leave town Sunday.

American forces helped quell the violence in Balad, where a major U.S. logistical airbase is located.

“Coalition force units are partnering with Iraqi police and Iraqi army units involved in operations around Balad. We are also providing quick reaction assets to the Iraqi police and army,” Lt. Col. Christopher Garver said.

President Bush, meanwhile, telephoned Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Monday to reassure him of U.S. support, apparently in response to rumors that the United States had lost patience with the Shiite leader.

Bush spokesman Tony Snow said the president told al-Maliki there was no American deadline for the Iraqi government to be able to stand on its own.

“He (al-Maliki) said that rumors sometimes can undercut confidence in the government and also its ability to work effectively in fighting terror,” Snow said.

Snow also challenged a story published Monday by USA TODAY that said al-Maliki will not force militias to disarm immediately. “There is no mention … that he's not going to force militias to disarm until later this year or early next year. As a matter of fact, he says he's in the process of doing it now.”

A transcript of the interview showed Al-Maliki had told USA TODAY, “The initial date we've set for disbanding the militias is the end of this year or the beginning of next year.” He also said a government committee was formed Oct. 8 “to work on disbanding militias and give them a deadline by which they have to lay down their arms.”

In addition to the deaths in Balad, 60 other people were killed in Iraq on Monday. According to an Associated Press count, 708 Iraqis have been reported killed this month. Among the victims Monday: Imad al-Faroon, the brother of the chief prosecutor in the second trial of former dictator Saddam Hussein. Saddam is accused of genocide in connection with a government crackdown in the 1980s against Iraqi Kurds. Al-Faroon was shot by gunmen who burst into his home, government official Ali al-Lami said.

The most deadly attack — 20 dead and 27 wounded — occurred when a suicide bomber slammed an explosives-packed car into a Shiite funeral tent in eastern Baghdad's Ur neighborhood. A second car bomb ripped through a crowd of rescuers and onlookers, police Lt. Ahmed Mohammed Ali said.

Also Monday, Saddam issued an open letter saying Iraq's “liberation is at hand” and calling for an end to Sunni-Shiite killings. Saddam said he was addressing Iraqis in a letter because “my chances to express my opinion are limited” while in detention. The judges in Saddam's two trials have repeatedly censured him and turned off his court microphone.

Court officials said a verdict and sentence would be handed down Nov. 5 in Saddam's first trial for the killings of 148 Shiites from the town of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him in 1982.

Bush Pledges To Keep U.S. Troops In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

President Bush told Iraq's prime minister on Monday he has no plans to pull U.S. forces out of the war-torn country, in a conversation that underscored Iraqi worries that the president is being pressured to curtail America's role in the widely unpopular war.

DOJ_NMG_0082275

In a 15-minute morning phone call, Bush told Nouri al-Maliki that rumors of a withdrawal of troops in two months were untrue and that the United States would stand strong with its new ally. But even as Bush reassured al-Maliki, he is having to confront growing doubts among Republicans in Congress about his war policies.

A small but growing group of GOP lawmakers, including Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., have suggested a change in course may be necessary. Warner could provide political cover for other GOP members to challenge Bush on Iraq because he is normally a Bush loyalist and a respected leader on national security issues.

Also providing ammunition for lawmakers unhappy over Iraq — and potential political cover — _ should be recommendations expected by an independent commission after next month's congressional elections. Former GOP Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a leader of that panel, has said the group will recommend options for changing in course in Iraq.

Leon Panetta, a member of the panel and President Clinton's former chief of staff, said the panel hopes to present Congress its findings by January. Among the options being considered are whether to set a timetable for withdrawal and whether to solicit help from Iran and Syria to stop the fighting, but "the study group has made no decisions," he said.

By then, there could be enough Republican defections to produce the biggest challenge yet by Congress to Bush's policy in Iraq — even if the GOP retains control of the House and Senate.

"The war is a 100-pound albatross hanging on the necks of Republicans," said Norman Ornstein, a political scholar with the American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

A spike in American casualties in Iraq in recent weeks, as ethnic violence there spirals ever more out of control, has only served to increase the likelihood that Republicans will increasingly question Bush's policies in the war. At least 58 Americans have died there in the first two weeks of October, a pace that, if continued, would make the month the worst for coalition forces since 107 U.S. soldiers died in January 2005.

According to polls, Bush's support on Iraq among Republicans is soft. While three-fourths of Republicans say they approve of his handling of the war, fewer than half say they strongly approve and three in 10 either have mixed feelings or disapprove.

In contrast, three out of four Democrats disapprove strongly, according to AP-Ipsos polling.

Political experts see next month's elections as a turning point in Congress' oversight of the war, because it may be read as a litmus test for voters' support of Bush. GOP lawmakers will be more likely to challenge the president's policies on the war if they win by a slim margin or are forced to hand control to Democrats, especially as Bush slips further into lame-duck status during his final two years in office.

Concerned U.S. support was faltering, Al-Maliki told the president "that rumors sometimes can undercut confidence in the government and also its ability to work effectively in fighting terror," said Bush spokesman Tony Snow. "And the president said, `Don't worry, you still have our full support,'" Snow added.

Warner recently returned from a trip to the region and immediately told reporters that the war was "drifting sideways," with little progress being made. Warner said he would wait two to three months — until after the elections — to see if the situation could be turned around before suggesting a change in course.

Warner has found support from other Republicans — including Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a possible 2008 presidential contender and frequent maverick, as well as Sens. Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine and several House Republicans.

Taking a different tack, Republican Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John McCain of Arizona have challenged Bush's assertion that the size of the Army is adequate. The two senators say they support boosting the number of troops to reduce the strain on units repeatedly sent into combat.

"The American people are not going to continue to support, sustain a policy that puts American troops in the middle of a civil war," Hagel said Sunday on CNN's "Late Edition."

Despite recent noise from Hagel and others, Bush counselor Dan Bartlett said the White House has not detected a loss of Republican support for Bush's Iraq policy. "The vast majority of Republicans understand the stakes in Iraq ... and want to win," he said.

Political experts say Republicans do not want to alienate their major support base — staunch GOP voters loyal to Bush. But at the same time, more GOP members could call for changes to the nation's war policies after the Baker panel releases its results.

Democrats long have urged a change in Iraq policy. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the leading Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said there is "no military solution to this conflict" and the United States must pressure Iraqis to take over their country.

Bush Reassures Iraqi That There Is No Timetable For Withdrawal (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

DOJ_NMG_0082276

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 — President Bush reassured Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq on Monday that he would not set a timetable for withdrawal of American troops and would continue to support the prime minister, despite recent reports that military officials and some Republican lawmakers were dissatisfied with the Iraqi government's performance.

The White House also suggested that it would not necessarily accept the recommendations of an independent commission reviewing Iraq policy. "We're not going to outsource the business of handling the war in Iraq," said Mr. Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow.

The president's remarks to Mr. Maliki came during a 15-minute telephone conversation, Mr. Snow said. During the call, initiated by Mr. Bush, Mr. Maliki expressed concern about news reports that there would be an attempt to replace him if he was unable to assert control over Iraq within two months, Mr. Snow said.

"There was a rumor that there were going to be attempts to replace him if certain things don't happen in two months," Mr. Snow said. "And the president said, the rumors are not true; we support you."

Mr. Maliki, he said, "assured the president that he is and will continue making tough decisions" to get rid of the militias that are responsible for sectarian violence in Iraq.

The exchange reflects the delicate line the White House is walking as it tries to shore up the Maliki government while reassuring an increasingly skittish American public that it remains flexible in its approach to the war.

Senior American military officials have been warning that time is growing short for Iraq to root out militias inside and outside the government. Leading Republicans on Capitol Hill, including Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, have also been expressing concern.

Mr. Warner said recently that he thought Iraq was "drifting sideways," and Mr. Hagel said Sunday that he agreed. Mr. Snow, asked Monday if the president was confident that the Maliki government was doing everything in its power to get rid of the militias, was equivocal.

"There is more to be done," Mr. Snow said. "There has to be more to be done. The violence is absolutely unacceptable."

A commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III is reviewing the president's Iraq policy, and Mr. Baker has indicated that he will recommend a change in course. The panel's findings are due after the election, and Mr. Bush has said he looks forward to them, although Mr. Snow seemed to push back against the idea that the White House would adopt the recommendations.

"We'll have to see what they say," he said. "We will read it with interest."

The panel has not yet reached any conclusions, its co-chairman, Lee Hamilton, said in an interview on Monday.

Recent news reports have suggested the panel is weighing two options. One would emphasize stability in Iraq, while abandoning the goal of establishing democracy there; the other emphasizes a phased withdrawal of soldiers.

"We have literally scores of recommendations in front of us, and those are only two," Mr. Hamilton said. Asked about Mr. Snow's remarks, he said, "If he said that they're going to take a close look at it, we're pleased with that."

Can You Tell A Sunni From A Shiite? (NYT)

By Jeff Stein

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

Washington

FOR the past several months, I've been wrapping up lengthy interviews with Washington counterterrorism officials with a fundamental question: "Do you know the difference between a Sunni and a Shiite?"

A "gotcha" question? Perhaps. But if knowing your enemy is the most basic rule of war, I don't think it's out of bounds. And as I quickly explain to my subjects, I'm not looking for theological explanations, just the basics: Who's on what side today, and what does each want?

After all, wouldn't British counterterrorism officials responsible for Northern Ireland know the difference between Catholics and Protestants? In a remotely similar but far more lethal vein, the 1,400-year Sunni-Shiite rivalry is playing out in the streets of Baghdad, raising the specter of a breakup of Iraq into antagonistic states, one backed by Shiite Iran and the other by Saudi Arabia and other Sunni states.

A complete collapse in Iraq could provide a haven for Al Qaeda operatives within striking distance of Israel, even Europe. And the nature of the threat from Iran, a potential nuclear power with protégés in the Gulf states, northern Saudi Arabia, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, is entirely different from that of Al Qaeda. It seems silly to have to argue that officials responsible for counterterrorism should be able to recognize opportunities for pitting these rivals against each other.

DOJ_NMG_0082277

But so far, most American officials I've interviewed don't have a clue. That includes not just intelligence and law enforcement officials, but also members of Congress who have important roles overseeing our spy agencies. How can they do their jobs without knowing the basics?

My curiosity about our policymakers' grasp of Islam's two major branches was piqued in 2005, when Jon Stewart and other TV comedians made hash out of depositions, taken in a whistleblower case, in which top F.B.I. officials drew blanks when asked basic questions about Islam. One of the bemused officials was Gary Bald, then the bureau's counterterrorism chief. Such expertise, Mr. Bald maintained, wasn't as important as being a good manager.

A few months later, I asked the F.B.I.'s spokesman, John Miller, about Mr. Bald's comments. "A leader needs to drive the organization forward," Mr. Miller told me. "If he is the executive in a counterterrorism operation in the post-9/11 world, he does not need to memorize the collected statements of Osama bin Laden, or be able to read Urdu to be effective. ... Playing 'Islamic Trivial Pursuit' was a cheap shot for the lawyers and a cheaper shot for the journalist. It's just a gimmick."

Of course, I hadn't asked about reading Urdu or Mr. bin Laden's writings.

A few weeks ago, I took the F.B.I.'s temperature again. At the end of a long interview, I asked Willie Hulon, chief of the bureau's new national security branch, whether he thought that it was important for a man in his position to know the difference between Sunnis and Shiites. "Yes, sure, it's right to know the difference," he said. "It's important to know who your targets are."

That was a big advance over 2005. So next I asked him if he could tell me the difference. He was flummoxed. "The basics goes back to their beliefs and who they were following," he said. "And the conflicts between the Sunnis and the Shia and the difference between who they were following."

O.K., I asked, trying to help, what about today? Which one is Iran — Sunni or Shiite? He thought for a second. "Iran and Hezbollah," I prompted. "Which are they?"

He took a stab: "Sunni."

Wrong.

Al Qaeda? "Sunni."

Right.

AND to his credit, Mr. Hulon, a distinguished agent who is up nights worrying about Al Qaeda while we safely sleep, did at least know that the vicious struggle between Islam's Abel and Cain was driving Iraq into civil war. But then we pay him to know things like that, the same as some members of Congress.

Take Representative Terry Everett, a seven-term Alabama Republican who is vice chairman of the House intelligence subcommittee on technical and tactical intelligence.

"Do you know the difference between a Sunni and a Shiite?" I asked him a few weeks ago.

Mr. Everett responded with a low chuckle. He thought for a moment: "One's in one location, another's in another location. No, to be honest with you, I don't know. I thought it was differences in their religion, different families or something."

To his credit, he asked me to explain the differences. I told him briefly about the schism that developed after the death of the Prophet Muhammad, and how Iraq and Iran are majority Shiite nations while the rest of the Muslim world is mostly Sunni. "Now that you've explained it to me," he replied, "what occurs to me is that it makes what we're doing over there extremely difficult, not only in Iraq but that whole area."

Representative Jo Ann Davis, a Virginia Republican who heads a House intelligence subcommittee charged with overseeing the C.I.A.'s performance in recruiting Islamic spies and analyzing information, was similarly dumbfounded when I asked her if she knew the difference between Sunnis and Shiites.

"Do I?" she asked me. A look of concentration came over her face. "You know, I should." She took a stab at it: "It's a difference in their fundamental religious beliefs. The Sunni are more radical than the Shia. Or vice versa. But I think it's the Sunnis who're more radical than the Shia."

Did she know which branch Al Qaeda's leaders follow?

"Al Qaeda is the one that's most radical, so I think they're Sunni," she replied. "I may be wrong, but I think that's right."

Did she think that it was important, I asked, for members of Congress charged with oversight of the intelligence agencies, to know the answer to such questions, so they can cut through officials' puffery when they came up to the Hill?

"Oh, I think it's very important," said Ms. Davis, "because Al Qaeda's whole reason for being is based on their beliefs. And you've got to understand, and to know your enemy."

It's not all so grimly humorous. Some agency officials and members of Congress have easily handled my "gotcha" question. But as I keep asking it around Capitol Hill and the agencies, I get more and more blank stares. Too many officials in charge of the war on terrorism just don't care to learn much, if anything, about the enemy we're fighting. And that's enough to keep anybody up at night.

DOJ_NMG_0082278

Ongoing Iraqi Violence Claims New Lives (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

BAGHDAD — Fresh waves of killing continued to engulf the Iraqi capital and surrounding areas today, with at least 26 mutilated bodies discovered, a car bomb explosion near a bank killing eight people and wounding 47 and violence that left at least six others dead.

At least five U.S. military personnel died in combat Sunday, raising to at least 56 the number of American soldiers, Marines and airmen killed during the first 15 days of the month.

Also today, the court trying Saddam Hussein for an alleged campaign of vengeance against a Shiite Muslim village in the 1980s will hold a Nov. 5 session at which a verdict will be delivered for the former Iraqi president and seven other defendants.

"Most likely they will reach a verdict after finishing checking some minor things," said Jaafar Mousawi, the lead prosecutor in the case.

Gunfire and explosions shook much of the capital throughout the day as a whirling sandstorm added to the gloom.

Three bystanders were killed when a gun battle erupted between Iraqi soldiers and suspected insurgents in central Baghdad. Five civilians and two soldiers were also injured in the fighting, quelled when U.S., forces moved into the area.

One Iraqi soldier was killed in a ferocious 30-minute gun battle that erupted when U.S. and Iraqi troops confronted suspected insurgents in northwestern Baghdad.

Insurgents opened fire on security guards driving through agricultural fields back from an electricity substation on capital's southern outskirts, killing one and injuring four.

Five roadside bombs targeting Iraqi police and soldiers in and around Baghdad today killed one and injured 18.

One U.S. soldier was killed in Baghdad on Sunday night when his vehicle struck a roadside bomb. Earlier, two U.S. soldiers attached to the 3rd Brigade of the 25th Infantry Division were killed and two wounded in fighting near the northern city of Kirkuk. Two Marines were also killed in combat earlier in western Iraq.

At least 12 U.S. military personnel were killed in hostile incidents over the weekend.

U.S. and Iraqi forces continued efforts to restore order in and around Balad, a mostly Shiite agricultural hub surrounded by Sunni tribesmen. Scores of Iraqis were killed this weekend in an outburst of sectarian violence in the town 50 miles north of Baghdad.

On Saturday, Shiite gunmen with alleged ties to militia groups hunted down and shot dead Sunni Arab men in the city, avenging a group of Shiite farmers killed and beheaded earlier.

Ministry of Interior spokesman Abdul-Kareem Khalaf blamed the latest outburst of violence on insurgents hitting random targets and "seeking to incur as much damage and death as possible." But the rhythms of the ongoing violence coincide with the country's political impasse.

Once-dominant Sunni Arabs are waging an insurgency against the Shiite and Kurdish-dominated government as well as its U.S. backer. Ascendant Shiites struggle to enforce their will politically as well as through violent death squads that kill dozens of innocent Sunnis every night.

A highly publicized Oct. 21 conference on national reconciliation, aimed at reducing tensions between the country's communities, was abruptly delayed until further notice Sunday. Saad Muttalibi, an advisor to the Ministry of State for Dialogue and Reconciliation, cited "technicalities" for the delay but acknowledged that the country's factions appear to be moving in the direction opposite to discussion and compromise.

"It doesn't mean we have to give up," he said in an interview. "The cost of reconciliation is very high. Some corners are afraid of it. The road ahead is very long."

Families Flee Iraqi River Towns On 4th Day Of Sectarian Warfare (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Muhanned Saif Aldin, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 16 -- Families fled in search of safety Monday as open warfare raged for a fourth day between Shiite militias and armed Sunni men in Tigris River towns north of Baghdad. Militias allied with Iraq's Shiite-led government held sway in Balad city, forcing out Sunni families and leaving the bodies of slain Sunni men to rot in the streets, according to police, residents and hospital officials.

The Iraqi government deployed still more reinforcements to try to calm the embattled towns and hold open the main roads, Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani said in the capital. But local police officers accused Shiite-dominated government police forces of working alongside Shiite militias in executing Sunnis and appealed for more help.

DOJ_NMG_0082279

The escalating violence in the Tigris River towns in many ways serves as a microcosm of the daily violence roiling Iraq. Sectarian attacks have increased more than tenfold since the start of the year and now claim more than 100 victims a day, according to the Iraqi government.

The violence in Balad was unusual because of the sustained deployment of the militias on the streets, and the killing seemed particularly vicious. Balad was "under siege from all sides," police 1st Lt. Bassim Hamdi said by telephone from the city. "We demand that leaders from both sides intervene to stop the bloodshed. Because if this goes on, it will explode sectarian violence all over Iraq."

As the carnage mounted, President Bush called Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to reassure the Iraqi leader of his support and assure him he was under no time pressure from the United States to curb sectarian violence.

Bush told Maliki he had no plans to pull out U.S. troops and advised him to ignore rumors that Washington intended to impose a two-month deadline for Iraq to rein in the violence, White House spokesman Tony Snow said in Washington.

Bush assured the Iraqi leader, " 'Don't worry, you still have our full support,' " Snow said.

American officials and Iraqis have expressed increasing frustration with inaction by Maliki, who this week indefinitely postponed measures both to disband militias and convene a reconciliation conference meant to close the widening rift between Iraq's Shiite majority and Sunni minority.

Maliki has bridled at growing U.S. pressure to act against the illegal private armies, which include armed wings of the two biggest parties in his governing alliance of Shiite religious parties. The prime minister issued a statement late Monday stressing that government forces have already confronted militias in some provinces. His administration "is determined to confront the armed groups with all political and military means," he said.

Although Baghdad has been the nexus of the Shiite-Sunni struggle for months, sectarian killing exploded in river towns about 50 miles to the north of the capital Friday after suspected Sunni insurgents kidnapped and beheaded 17 Shiite laborers from date palm groves in the predominantly Sunni hamlet of Duluiyah, across the river from Balad.

Shiite elders of Balad said they called in the Baghdad militias of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr -- whose bloc is the largest in Iraq's Shiite-led government -- to take revenge.

Most of the victims since then have been Sunni men in Duluiyah and neighboring Sunni towns. Hasanein al-Badawi, a physician at Balad's hospital, said almost all had been shot and some had been tortured with electric drills.

The total number of victims received by Balad's hospital morgue held steady at 80 on Monday, Badawi said. Members of Sadr's Mahdi Army militia were blocking Sunni families from picking up more of their dead from the streets, he said.

The American military had recorded 57 killings in Balad, Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a military spokesman, said in Baghdad.

On Monday, Sunni families fleeing Balad described Shiite militias going door-to-door, giving people two hours to clear out.

A police officer in Duluiyah, Capt. Qaid al-Azawi, accused American forces of standing by in Balad while militiamen in police cars and police uniforms slaughtered Sunnis. Americans did act, however, in Duluiyah, arresting three local police officers whom they suspected of fighting with insurgents against the militias, Azawi said.

Garver, the spokesman in Baghdad, said he had no information on these specific reports. "We're providing assistance where we see criminal behavior, such as violence and killing," he said.

Police officials said Balad had calmed by nightfall with the deployment of large numbers of Iraqi army troops, who are seen as more neutral than forces of the Shiite-dominated police.

Meanwhile, clashes between Iraqi and foreign members of al-Qaeda in Iraq signaled a possible split in the foreign-led Sunni insurgent group over its leaders' declaration Sunday of a separate, Sunni-led Islamic emirate in nine provinces of Iraq.

The hospital in Ramadi, a western city badly battered by years of fighting between American forces and Sunni insurgents, by late Monday had received the bodies of 13 insurgents killed in the internal clashes, including a top local leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, according to Saad Naji, a physician.

A mid-ranking Iraqi official of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Ma'an al-Ani, said scores of Iraqi members of Iraq's most feared Sunni insurgent group had broken away, spurred by unhappiness at Sunday's declaration. Creation of a separate Sunni state would only "tear the country apart . . . and divert from the main goal, which is getting Americans out," Ani said.

In other violence Monday, 11 people were killed when assailants used car bombs to attack the funeral of a Shiite policeman in Baghdad, the Interior Ministry said.

Two American soldiers were killed in fighting north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said, bringing to 12 the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq since Friday, an unusually high toll. Attacks have killed more than 50 American troops in October, putting the month on track to be one of the bloodiest of the war for U.S. forces.

DOJ_NMG_0082280

Execution-style shootings claim the great majority of victims in Baghdad, where scores of bodies are dumped each day. Monday's victims included the brother of the chief prosecutor in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial, who was shot to death in front of his wife at his home.

Aldin reported from Tikrit. Special correspondents Saad al-Izzi and Naseer Nouri in Baghdad, Saad Sarhan in Najaf and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Iraqis Ask Why U.S. Forces Didn't Intervene In Balad (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 16 — American military units joined with Iraqi forces on Monday in maintaining a fragile peace between Sunni and Shiite communities in Balad, a rural town north of the capital where an explosion of sectarian violence over the weekend left dozens dead.

In the aftermath of the reprisals, some residents of Balad asked why American troops had not intervened when the killings began in earnest on Saturday. One of the largest American military bases in Iraq, Camp Anaconda, which includes a sprawling air base that serves as the logistical hub of the war, is nearby.

"People are bewildered because of the weak response by the Americans," said one Balad resident who asked not to be identified for fear of reprisals. "They used to patrol the city every day, but when the violence started, we didn't see any sign of them."

The situation in Balad, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, appears, in stark form, to show the dilemma for American military commanders at a time when they are hastening the transfer of wide areas of the country to Iraqi forces. They are also insisting that those troops take the lead in quelling violence, leaving American forces to step in only when asked.

It also highlighted yet again the powerlessness of the Iraqi forces to stand in the way of such sectarian violence.

Killings also continued to besiege the capital on Monday with the discovery of at least 64 bodies across the city, and two car bomb attacks that appeared to kill 22 people. The American military, meanwhile, said Monday that five American service members were killed Sunday, bringing the toll this month to 58. One soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdad; two died in Kirkuk Province and two in Salahuddin Province.

Sectarian violence and retribution killings of the kind that unfolded in Balad over the weekend are the purview of the Interior Ministry, in charge of Iraq's police forces, and the Iraqi government in general, said Lt. Col. Michael Donnelly, a spokesman for the Army's Fourth Infantry Division, adding that responsibility for the Balad area was transferred from American military units to the Fourth Iraqi Army about a month ago.

The job of the United States military, he said, is to work "by, through and with" its Iraqi counterparts "to build further capacity to reduce the violence, and bring about stability."

American military commanders reviewing what happened over the weekend concluded that the situation in Balad was best dealt with by the Iraqi armed forces, a senior American military official said.

The senior officer, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly on the subject, said that American commanders viewed the upheaval in Balad as a new test for the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who has come under American pressure to crack down on militias that have been responsible for much of the killing in the country.

The American military eventually provided what Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman, described as "quick reaction force assistance" to the Iraqi Army and the police in the area.

"We were waiting for a request from the Iraqi government," he said.

It was unclear, however, when that request came. The sectarian killings began on Friday in the neighboring town of Dhuluiya, where the decapitated bodies of 14 Shiite workers from Balad were found. While the center of Balad is mostly Shiite, its outskirts and the neighboring area, including Dhuluiya, are overwhelmingly Sunni.

By the following day, groups of Shiite gunmen from Balad were setting up checkpoints and hunting down and killing dozens of Sunni Arab residents, the authorities said.

Overall, the bodies of some 31 Sunni Arab residents of the area were found during the weekend, said Qasim al-Qaisi, the director of Balad Hospital. Most of the killings took place on Saturday, the authorities said.

American troops did not arrive until late Sunday afternoon, taking up positions in the town center and on its outskirts, said Hamad al-Qaisi, governor of Salahuddin Province. By then, a curfew had been imposed on the town and the situation had mostly stabilized.

On Monday mortar rounds landed on Balad, injuring five civilians, a police official said. Otherwise, the town was mostly quiet. Shiite clerics broadcast appeals over loudspeakers for calm on Monday, urging residents not to attack their Sunni neighbors, residents said. The leader of one mosque even urged any Sunnis harmed in any attacks to visit the mosque and register a complaint, said a resident who asked not to be identified.

DOJ_NMG_0082281

A meeting between the provincial governor, security officials, American commanders and tribal sheiks in Balad and Dhuluiya will be held Wednesday to discuss ways to defuse tensions in the area, a provincial government official said.

At least 60 Sunni families have fled Balad for neighboring Dhuluiya, said Adel al-Smaidaei, a representative of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's leading Sunni political party.

The burst of violence in Balad, which had previously only dealt with relatively low levels of sectarian tension, came as American troops were continuing the largest series of sweeps in the nation's capital since the invasion, in an attempt to stop sectarian bloodshed. Over the past year, American forces had gradually withdrawn from large areas of the capital, leaving security in the hands of the Iraqi Army and the police.

That policy, however, was followed by unhindered sectarian bloodletting, particularly after a bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra in February, which prompted the American military command to move troops back to the capital.

The police in Baghdad reported the discovery of the 64 bodies, all of which appeared to have been shot at close range and showed signs of torture. In the largely Shiite neighborhood of Ur, two car bombs, one of which was aimed at a large Shiite funeral gathering, exploded almost simultaneously Monday evening, an Interior Ministry official said. The other bomb went off nearby, about 200 meters from a busy market.

At least 22 people were killed and 31 people wounded in the blasts, said Qasim al-Sweidi, an official at Imam Ali Hospital in nearby Sadr City, where the victims were taken.

Earlier in the day, a car bomb exploded in Suwayra, a neighborhood located southeast of Baghdad, killing 10 people and wounding 15 others, the official said.

The day's toll in Baghdad included another killing, at least the 12th of its kind, of a victim linked to the court trying Saddam Hussein and his associates. Court officials said that the older brother of Munkith al-Faroun, chief prosecutor in the so-called Anfal trial that began in Baghdad in August, was shot dead by unknown assailants at his home in the western Baghdad suburb of Jamaa.

The officials said the brother, Emad al-Faroun, who is a legal adviser to Ahmad Chalabi, one of the most prominent Iraqi politicians in the period since the overthrow of Mr. Hussein, was killed by men who attacked him in the carport of his home. His wife and son, also shot in the attack, survived, the officials said.

On Monday, Mr. Hussein's lawyers made public a letter they said they had been given by Mr. Hussein during a weekend consultation at Camp Cropper, the American-run detention center near the Baghdad airport, where he has been held during the trials.

Mr. Hussein used the letter to call on Iraqis to end the current wave of sectarian bloodletting and to focus attacks instead on "occupiers from far away who crossed the Atlantic Ocean under the inspiration of Zionism." He added, "You should remember that your goal is to liberate your country from the invader's forces and their followers, and that there should be no other issues to distract you from this goal."

Iraq's Christians Flee As Extremist Threat Worsens (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 16 — The blackened shells of five cars still sit in front of the Church of the Virgin Mary here, stark reminders of a bomb blast that killed two people after a recent Sunday Mass.

In the northern city of Mosul, a priest from the Syriac Orthodox Church was kidnapped last week. His church complied with his captors' demands and put up posters denouncing recent comments made by the pope about Islam, but he was killed anyway. The police found his beheaded body on Wednesday.

Muslim fury over Pope Benedict XVI's public reflections on Islam in Germany a month ago — when he quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as calling Islam "evil and inhuman" — has subsided elsewhere, but repercussions continue to reverberate in Iraq, bringing a new level of threat to an already shrinking Christian population.

Several extremist groups threatened to kill all Christians unless the pope apologized. Sunni and Shiite clerics united in the condemnation, calling the comments an insult to Islam and the Prophet Muhammad. In Baghdad, many churches canceled services after receiving threats. Some have not met since.

"After the pope's statement, people began to fear much more than before," said the Rev. Zayya Edward Khossaba, the pastor of the Church of the Virgin Mary. "The actions by fanatics have increased against Christians."

Christianity took root here near the dawn of the faith 2,000 years ago, making Iraq home to one of the world's oldest Christian communities. The country is rich in biblical significance: scholars believe the Garden of Eden described in Genesis was in Iraq; Abraham came from Ur of the Chaldees, a city in Iraq; the city of Nineveh that the prophet Jonah visited after being spit out by a giant fish was in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0082282

Both Chaldean Catholics and Assyrian Christians, the country's largest Christian sects, still pray in Aramaic, the language of Jesus.

They have long been a tiny minority amid a sea of Islamic faith. But under Saddam Hussein, Iraq's million or so Christians for the most part coexisted peacefully with Muslims, both the dominant Sunnis and the majority Shiites.

But since Mr. Hussein's ouster, their status here has become increasingly uncertain, first because many Muslim Iraqis framed the American-led invasion as a modern crusade against Islam, and second because Christians traditionally run the country's liquor stories, anathema to many religious Muslims.

Over the past three and a half years, Christians have been subjected to a steady stream of church bombings, assassinations, kidnappings and threatening letters slipped under their doors.

Estimates of the resulting Christian exodus vary from the tens of thousands to more than 100,000, with most heading for Syria, Jordan and Turkey.

The number of Christians who remain is also uncertain. The last Iraqi census, in 1987, counted 1.4 million Christians, but many left during the 1990's when sanctions squeezed the country. Yonadam Kanna, the lone Christian member of the Iraqi Parliament, estimated the current Christian population at roughly 800,000, or about 3 percent of the population. A Chaldean Catholic auxiliary bishop, Andreos Abouna, told a British charity over the summer that there were just 600,000 Christians left, according to the Catholic News Service.

At the Church of the Virgin Mary, Father Khossaba showed a visitor the baptism forms for parishioners leaving the country who need proof of their religious affiliation for visas. Some weeks he has filled out 50 of the forms, he said, and some weeks more.

Attendance on Sundays has dwindled to four dozen or so, he said; it used to be more than 500 on average, and on Easter Sundays, before the collapse of the Hussein government, more than 1,500. Not all the missing members have left, of course; some simply stay at home on Sundays because of fears for their safety.

Many Christians have relocated, changing neighborhoods or even cities. About a thousand Christian families, from Mosul, Baghdad, Basra and elsewhere, have taken refuge in Ain Kawa, a small town outside the Kurdish city of Erbil, which has become an oasis for Christians, said the Rev. Yusuf Sabri, a priest at St. Joseph's Chaldean Catholic Church there.

A Christian man with Baghdad license plates on his car who asked not to be identified said he had just arrived in Ain Kawa to inquire about moving there. A leaflet had been left at his home demanding he leave in three days. It bore the signature of Muhammad's Army, a Sunni insurgent group.

"They regarded me as an agent for the crusaders," he said.

Asaad Aziz, a 42-year-old Chaldean Catholic, is one of those trying to leave the country. After the ouster of Mr. Hussein, he bought a liquor store in a mostly Shiite neighborhood. Nine days after he opened, the store was bombed. Mr. Aziz was hospitalized for a month.

The employees rebuilt the store. But several months later, a note slipped under the door gave Mr. Aziz 48 hours to close.

"Otherwise, you will blame yourself," it said.

Mr. Aziz closed. But after an unsuccessful stint at a friend's printing company, he returned to the business he knew best, opening a liquor store in a mostly Christian neighborhood. Last month, a gunman riddled the new storefront with bullets as Mr. Aziz cowered in a back room.

He told another story: the teenage daughter of another Christian family he knows was kidnapped recently. The captors initially demanded a ransom, but later sarcastically said the pope was the only one who could release her. She was eventually killed.

"When the pope gave his statement, it destroyed any last hope that we had here," said Mr. Aziz, who has forbidden his daughters, one in high school and the other in college, to return to school.

He recently went to the Turkish Embassy to inquire about a visa but was rebuffed. At this point, he said, he will go anywhere.

"We cannot practice our rituals and we cannot bring food home to our families," he said. "That's why I want to leave the country."

Mosul, near the historic heart of Christianity in Iraq, has also become increasingly dangerous. The recently murdered priest, the Rev. Boulos Iskander Behnam, is just the latest member of the Christian community to be kidnapped or killed there.

Conditions have been especially bleak for Christians in Basra, the southern city that is dominated by radical Shiite militias. Christian women there often wear Muslim head scarves to avoid harassment from religious zealots trying to impose a strict Islamic dress code. After the pope's statement, an angry crowd burned an effigy of him.

DOJ_NMG_0082283

In Baghdad, Juliet Yusef attends St. George's, the country's lone Anglican church. She, too, now wears a head scarf anytime she ventures outside her neighborhood. "I am afraid of being attacked," she said.

Dora, a neighborhood in southern Baghdad that was once heavily populated by Christians and has been plagued by sectarian violence, has now been mostly emptied of them. Christians were singled out there by insurgents who accused them of being friendly with the occupying Americans.

"They are Christian, we are Christian," said one holdout, who asked to be identified only by her first name, Suzan. "They think most likely we know each other well."

Two priests were kidnapped over the summer in Dora, although both were released, one after nearly a month.

Oddly, before the pope's comments, as sectarian violence has escalated in Baghdad in the past year, some said the situation might have actually improved for Christians as Muslim militants turned their attention on one another.

Canon Andrew White, the Anglican vicar of Baghdad, who lives in Britain but visits Iraq frequently, said his driver was kidnapped recently but was promptly released after his Sunni Arab captors discovered he was a Christian. He said his captors apologized by saying, "We thought he was Shiite."

"It must be the only occasion when being a Christian actually helped in this country," he said.

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney To Join Gibson Dunn (WSJ)

By Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

In the latest example of a government prosecutor jumping to a high-paying law firm, Debra Wong Yang, the U.S. Attorney in Los Angeles, has resigned her post and will join Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher as a partner at the beginning of the year.

During Ms. Yang's tenure, her office has spearheaded several high-profile corporate-crime cases, including the indictment earlier this year of law firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, which is accused of paying individuals to file suits. Milberg Weiss has denied the allegations and vowed to fight the charges.

Ms. Yang, 47 years old, serves on the Justice Department's Corporate Fraud Task Force, an interagency group created in July 2002 amid white-collar scandals.

Prior to her appointment by President Bush in 2002, Ms. Yang was a California state judge. Before that she was an assistant U.S. attorney. A 1985 graduate of Boston College Law School, she also worked in private practice.

At Gibson Dunn, which has more than 800 lawyers, she will be based in the firm's Los Angeles office and co-chair its "crisis-management" group along with Theodore Olson, the former solicitor general, and Randy Mastro, a former federal prosecutor and deputy to former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani. Members of that group are currently handling internal investigations for companies ensnared by the stock-options backdating scandal.

Write to Peter Lattman at peter.lattman@wsj.com1

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

KLA-Tencor Officials Depart Over Options Dating (WSJ)

By Robert Tomsho And James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

Two senior employees at a Silicon Valley company lost their jobs yesterday, and another technology company said that former top executives misled its board as the stock-options scandal continued to gain traction.

In the latest personnel shakeups, Stuart J. Nichols, general counsel of KLA-Tencor Corp., and Kenneth L. Schroeder, a former chief executive who had remained with the company in an advisory role, left following an internal probe that found backdating of options at the company.

KLA-Tencor, of San Jose, Calif., a big semiconductor-equipment maker, said yesterday it "terminated" all aspects of its employment relationship with Mr. Schroeder, who was chief executive from 1999 to 2005. Mr. Nichols resigned.

The company also said it was canceling all outstanding backdated stock options held by Mr. Schroeder and repricing all backdated options held by Mr. Nichols. Shirli Fabbri Weiss, a lawyer for Mr. Schroeder, said she didn't believe the company had a basis to take such action and that her client hadn't been allowed to respond to evidence against him. Mr. Nichols couldn't be reached for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0082284

The company said it expects restatements because of the backdating to result in charges of less than $400 million.

Separately, another San Jose company, Altera Corp., said an internal investigation found its former CEO and its former general counsel repeatedly misled its board's compensation committee about backdating stock options for themselves and other executives.

As a result of faulty accounting, the chip maker said it will restate its earnings downward by $35.2 million from 1996 to 2005.

More than 100 companies are under investigation for options backdating, and many of them are still conducting internal probes. So far, more than 30 executives and directors have lost their jobs. Sunday, UnitedHealth Group Inc. said its chief executive, William McGuire, would leave the giant health insurer by Dec. 1.

Backdating amounts to pretending that an option was granted earlier than it actually was, at a beneficial time when the share was trading at a low price. As options entitle their recipients to profit from a rise in price, claiming the grant occurred at a time of low prices could give the recipient a running start on an extra profit.

Altera said that between 1996 and 2000 it granted stock options every December to senior managers, including Rodney Smith, its former chief executive, and C. Wendell Bergere, its former general counsel. The company said that while Mr. Smith had the authority to set the grant date, the compensation committee intended for it to coincide with the completion of an annual, end-of-year performance-review process.

Instead, Altera said, Mr. Smith and Mr. Bergere repeatedly falsely claimed as the options' grant date the particular day on which the stock hit its lowest closing price of December. The company said that at some point after the review process, Mr. Bergere prepared minutes that "did not reflect the grant date intended by the compensation committee but rather falsely indicated that the actual grant date" was the beneficial day that he and Mr. Smith selected.

An Altera spokeswoman declined to comment beyond the company's written statement. Mr. Smith's attorney, William Kimball, declined to comment. Mr. Bergere's attorney, Henry Asbill, called the company's accusations "unfair," given that Altera hasn't let him review related documents and that his client has dementia.

Mr. Smith retired as Altera's chief executive in 2000 and as its chairman in 2003. Mr. Bergere retired from the company in 2001.

Altera also said yesterday that Chief Financial Officer Nathan Sarkisian retired, effective immediately. The company had previously said Mr. Sarkisian planned to retire by the end of the year, and it wasn't clear whether the departure was connected to the options troubles. A company spokeswoman declined to address the matter.

Mr. Sarkisian didn't return a call seeking comment.

KLA-Tencor's probe was touched off by a Wall Street Journal article in May that reported on a pattern of extraordinarily well-timed stock-option grants to several companies' top officials, including KLA-Tencor Chairman Ken Levy. In all, Mr. Levy received 10 grants from KLA-Tencor and its predecessor company from 1994 to 2001 -- all preceding quick runups in the share price; an analysis by The Wall Street Journal found the probability that that pattern occurred merely by chance was around one in 20 million.

Mr. Levy couldn't be reached for comment.

The company said yesterday the board has concluded that current members of management weren't involved in any improper options practices. A KLA-Tencor spokeswoman declined to comment beyond the press release.

KLA-Tencor Finds More Option Costs; Counsel Resigns (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Ian King

Bloomberg, October 17, 2006

Oct. 16 (Bloomberg) -- KLA-Tencor Corp., a maker of semiconductor-testing equipment, said it found $400 million in costs related to backdated company stock options and canceled grants to former Chief Executive Officer Kenneth Schroeder.

General Counsel Stuart J. Nichols resigned and KLA-Tencor will reprice options given to him and Chief Operating Officer John Kispert, the San Jose, California-based company said today in a statement. Current management, including Kispert, had no involvement in the options practices, the company said.

``This clears up whether there has to be a departure of the top management," said Mark Bachman, a Portland-based analyst for Pacific Crest Securities, who rates the stock ``market perform" and doesn't own it. ``It's going to be a positive for the stock."

KLA-Tencor is among more than 140 companies to disclose internal or federal investigations of stock-option practices to determine if grant dates were manipulated to enrich employees. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are looking for evidence that companies broke securities or tax laws by backdating grants to coincide with days when share prices were low.

They're also examining grants that were made in advance of news that drove up company stock prices, a practice known as spring-loading.

Shares of KLA-Tencor rose 41 cents to $49.95 in extending trading after the announcement. They gained 73 cents to $49.54 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading and are little changed this year.

Eight CEOs

KLA-Tencor said it terminated ``all aspects of its employment relationship'' with Schroeder, who ran the company from 1999 to 2005.

The company said in September it would restate results from 1997 to 2002 after a special committee found incorrect dates were used in granting stock options.

All told, more than 30 executives, including eight CEOs, have lost their jobs as companies have come under scrutiny for manipulating stock options to enrich employees. Former executives at two companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc., face criminal charges.

UnitedHealth Group Inc., the biggest U.S. health insurer, said yesterday CEO William McGuire will step down after an independent inquiry found evidence that company options were backdated over the past 12 years.

On Oct. 11, McAfee Inc. forced Chief Executive Officer George Samenuk to retire and fired President Kevin Weiss. Cnet Networks Inc., also said CEO Shelby Bonnie and two other executives stepped down after an internal probe found some backdated stock-option grants.

KLA Tencor Braces For $400 Million Blow For Mishandled Options (AP)

By Michael Liedtke

AP, October 17, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - KLA Tencor Corp.'s mishandling of stock options will cost the company up to $400 million - a blow that provoked the supplier of chip.m.aking equipment to cancel the options of its former chief executive.

With Monday's announcement, San Jose-based KLA joins a lengthening list of companies facing up to the consequences of stock option chicanery that went undetected for years.

The repercussions are erasing a substantial chunk of past profits and spurring efforts to clean out executive suites and boardrooms as federal regulators and prosecutors explore possible civil penalties and criminal charges.

In the past week alone, more than a dozen executives and directors at six companies nationwide have either resigned or been fired. Four of those companies are based in Silicon Valley, which has become the focal point of the latest scandal to rock corporate America.

In its reckoning, KLA acknowledged company insiders improperly booked employee stock options from July 1997 through June 2002. KLA will absorb charges of up to $400 million to correct the bogus accounting caused by the shenanigans.

The company had previously reported profits totaling $710 million during that five-year period.

Although KLA didn't directly blame anyone for the misconduct, its actions pointed at its former CEO, Kenneth Schroeder, and top lawyer, Stuart Nichols. The company fired Schroeder, who had been a special adviser since his January retirement as CEO, and accepted the resignation of Nichols, who had been general counsel since 2000.

Schroeder, 60, was KLA's president and chief operating officer from 1991 to 1999 when he was promoted to CEO.

To penalize the former executives, KLA said it will cancel all of Schroeder's outstanding stock options and re-price Nichols' awards so he won't benefit unfairly. The company said it will also re-price the options of its chief operating officer, John Kispert, because he was chief financial officer during part of the time tainted by the mishandled stock options.

KLA absolved Kispert of any wrongdoing, as well as its current CEO, Richard Wallace, and current chief financial officer, Jeffrey Hall.

Both the Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Justice Department are still investigating KLA's past stock option practices. The federal government task force looking for evidence of stock option malfeasance is based in San Francisco.

Like most other companies entangled in the scandal, KLA's troubles revolve around a technique known as "backdating," which occurs when insiders look back in time for a low point in their company's stock price so the exercise, or "strike," price of the options could be set at that ebb.

If they aren't properly disclosed, backdated options can inflate corporate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

Silicon Valley has been caught in the eye of the stock option storm because of an entrepreneurial culture that embraced the rewards during the 1990s as the best way to get rich fast. That mind-set encouraged high-tech companies to pass out stock options like candy on Halloween.

All told, at least 135 companies nationwide have disclosed internal inquiries or government investigations into the accounting of past stock options.

DOJ_NMG_0082286

Two More Companies Probing Stock-option Dates Announce Management Changes (MERCN)

By Scott D. Harris And Ryan Blitstein

The San Jose Mercury News, October 17, 2006

Two more prominent Silicon Valley companies that undertook internal investigations of stock-option back-dating announced management changes Monday.

KLA-Tencor, a San Jose builder of semiconductor manufacturing test instruments, and Altera, a leading maker of programmable semiconductor chips, announced the departure of key executives.

KLA-Tencor announced the immediate resignation of General Counsel Stuart J. Nichols and also said it was terminating ``all aspects of its employment relationship'' with former chief executive Kenneth L. Schroeder, who had become a consultant to the company.

Schroeder had been KLA-Tencor's CEO and a member of the board of directors from 1999 through 2005, and previously had been president and chief operating officer from 1991 to 1999. Nichols had been vice president and general counsel since 2000.

Altera said Monday the San Jose company would restate its earnings by $47.6 million after an investigation by board members found grants to former executives of back-dated stock options.

A special committee of independent board members of Altera found seven instances between 1996 and 2001 where recorded grant dates for stock options were different from the actual grant dates, the company said.

In a separate statement, Altera said Chief Financial Officer Nathan Sarkisian has retired. Previously, the company had said he planned to retire by the end of 2006.

More than 120 U.S. companies, about one-fourth of them in Silicon Valley, face investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department or are conducting internal reviews about options back-dating.

Back-dating involves changing the paperwork dates on stock option grants to a day when stock prices were lower, giving recipients a better chance for quick paper profits.

KLA-Tencor had previously announced a special committee of its board had found incorrect dates on stock options from July 1997 through June 2002 and that the company would re-state its financial statements to correct the accounting for back-dated options. KLA-Tencor declined to answer questions on Monday.

Stock Options Scandal Spreads (USAT)

By Matt Krantz And Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 17, 2006

The widening scandal over the alleged manipulation, or “backdating,” of executive stock options has claimed another two heads at the top ranks of Corporate America.

Computer-chip maker Altera said Monday that chief financial officer Nathan Sarkisian left the company prematurely after a review of its options-granting practice pinpointed problems. The company said it will need to restate earnings to reflect $47.6 million in costs pertaining to options grants.

Separately, UnitedHealth said Sunday that CEO William McGuire would quit by Dec. 1 after the health insurer's examination of stock option backdating found potential wrongdoing. The study found McGuire received several option grants at yearly lows in the stock, which would be essentially impossible without manipulation.

Backdating is when firms don't disclose they gave executives the right to buy shares at a price lower than the market value when the options are issued. Stock options are designed to reward executives for smart moves after they get the grant. Options typically give executives the right to buy stock in the future at the price it was trading at when the options were issued.

But a growing scandal is finding some companies may have abused the rules. Rather than giving executives the right to buy stock at the current stock price, some companies may have given executives the right to buy stock based on a lower price on a previous date.

This practice, while not necessarily illegal, has the potential of inappropriately rewarding executives in a way not disclosed to shareholders. It understates how much a company paid its executives and affects taxes paid by the companies and the executives as well as what the company reports as earnings.

According to research compiled by Glass Lewis, 150 companies have said they're looking into the issue of whether some of their stock option grants were “backdated.” Of those, 142 have opened internal investigations, 91 are being probed by the Securities and Exchange Commission and 55 by the Department of Justice.

As of Monday, the number of companies losing an executive or director in the scandal hit 23. Last week, McAfee CEO George Samenuk and CNet CEO Shelby Bonnie stepped down amid revelations of stock option problems.

DOJ_NMG_0082287

Still, only two cases have resulted in criminal charges. Executives at Brocade Communications Systems, including former CEO Gregory Reyes, and Comverse Technology, including former CEO Jacob Alexander, are charged with improperly backdating.

But lawyers who have been following the issue predict that many more investigations will end up in criminal court. “We are only at an early stage of the public airing of this issue,” says Mark Zauderer of Flemming Zulack Williamson Zauderer. “We are going to see a wave of cases involving backdating.”

Zauderer says prosecutors will jump at the opportunity to bring criminal cases against corporate executives because these cases can be simple. “The issues involved, including changes of documents and misrepresentation of documents, are ones that juries can get their arms around easily. This is far easier to prosecute than Enron-type cases of accounting fraud.”

But others say there won't be many criminal prosecutions. “A lot of these cases have terrific statute-of-limitations problems,” says David Gourevitch, a Manhattan attorney and former state prosecutor. The statute of limitations for securities fraud, he notes, is five years. Most of the known instances of options “backdating,” he points out, occurred in the late 1990s, during the tech bubble. Since 2001, tech stock prices have been low enough that there hasn't been a compelling reason to engage in backdating.

Meanwhile, investors aren't waiting for regulators to act. Currently, 65 companies face class-action shareholder lawsuits in the scandal, Glass Lewis says.

Backdating revelations aren't necessarily harmful to a company's stock. Take UnitedHealth, which is facing a lawsuit.

Monday, the stock fell $1.21 to $47.54, not a brutal loss given that the CEO is quitting. It is down 16% from March when The Wall Street Journal reported the company might be involved in backdating. But before that, the stock had already fallen 11% from its high in late 2005.

Such difficulty in isolating how much backdating issues have hurt stock prices has limited securities class-action lawsuits, Stanford Law School professor Joseph Grundfest said in a midyear assessment of shareholder litigation.

UnitedHealth Shares Down As CEO Departs (AP-Y)

By Joshua Freed, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

UnitedHealth Group Inc. will lose the CEO that built it into a health insurance powerhouse, but on Monday, Wall Street yawned. UnitedHealth shares traded in a narrow range and analysts said that they had expected the departure of Chairman and CEO William McGuire because of apparent stock options backdating.

With McGuire gone from the boardroom immediately, and set to retire as CEO by Dec. 1, the company's board promoted President Stephen Hemsley to CEO.

UnitedHealth shares slipped $1.21, or about 2.5 percent, to close at $47.54 on the New York Stock Exchange. They're off from a high of $64.61 in December, with much of that loss since questions about the company's stock options timing arose in March.

By making Hemsley CEO, UnitedHealth's directors signaled they would keep the company headed in the same direction, which has boosted UnitedHealth's stock price exponentially over the past 15 years and transformed it into the nation's second-largest health insurer. Hemsley has been at the company since 1997 and has run its day-to-day operations since 1999.

"The management uncertainty is largely resolved, and the worst case scenario (which would have been losing both Dr. McGuire and Mr. Hemsley) has been seemingly averted," Morgan Stanley analyst Christine Arnold wrote in a note to clients on Monday.

UnitedHealth said on Sunday that McGuire would step down after a company-commissioned report found widespread, systematic backdating was probably the explanation for his extraordinary good fortune in receiving stock options priced at the lowest possible point in eight different quarters.

Nothing in the report suggests that Hemsley was involved in any backdating, although the report concludes that he received stock options that were "likely backdated."

"I don't see how Hemsley can be separated from McGuire's actions over the last eight years," said Elizabeth Senko, an analyst at Williams Capital Group.

Referring to comic strip buddies known for getting into trouble together, she said: "They're really Mutt and Jeff. I can't believe that he was unaware of what was going on. Now where that falls under his legal responsibilities is another matter."

She said Hemsley has been the architect of many of UnitedHealth's successes since he joined the company — but he has never been the public face of a company the way he will be as CEO.

DOJ_NMG_0082288

"Hemsley has for years been viewed as the individual most likely to ultimately succeed McGuire and is very highly respected," Bear Stearns analyst John Rex wrote in a note to clients. He added, "Some of the uncertainty surrounding the stock over the past months related to whether he would be tainted also, a factor that now appears resolved."

McGuire issued a statement saying he has worked closely with Hemsley for eight years.

"He has been a full partner in creating the vision of (UnitedHealth) and helping to achieve it," McGuire said.

UnitedHealth said it had turned over the report by the law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP to the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department. UnitedHealth disclosed in May that the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan were investigating its stock option grants.

SEC spokesman John Nester in Washington declined comment on the report or any other aspect of the matter.

At least 34 senior executives or directors, including nine CEOs, seven finance chiefs and seven general counsels have been fired or have stepped down at 17 companies as of Monday.

By now, investors seem to be somewhat inured to fallout from the options scandal, wrote Thomas Carroll, an analyst at Stifel Nicolaus & Co. He noted that about 100 companies are under SEC investigation and a recent study showing 2,000 may have backdated options.

___

On the Net:

UnitedHealth report: http://www.unitedhealthgroup.com/news/index_news.htm

Old Options Still Haunt An Insurer (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

When Stephen J. Hemsley joined UnitedHealth Group after 23 years with the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, he was greeted with a grant of 400,000 stock options dated shortly after he started in June 1997.

There was just one thing: the options carried a stock price based on the market price five months earlier, when he did not yet work for UnitedHealth, one of the largest health insurers in the country. The difference in dates effectively created a built-in gain of $7.26 for every share.

Mr. Hemsley, who was chief financial officer at Andersen, said that he “didn’t recall focusing at the time” that his options carried a discounted price and that there was not enough evidence to determine if the grant was actually backdated.

But the episode, recounted in a 14-page report into UnitedHealth’s option practices, does raise some questions about Mr. Hemsley, who has taken the reins at UnitedHealth from Dr. William W. McGuire, who was forced to resign Sunday amid criticisms of how stock options were awarded.

“That obviously raises credibility issues,” said Patrick McGurn, a corporate governance expert at Institutional Shareholder Services, a proxy advisory firm. “We are seeing a lot of modified Sergeant Schultz defenses here,” he said, referring to a character in the 1960’s television series “Hogan’s Heroes.” “They are not claiming to know nothing, but only part of what went on.”

Mr. Hemsley has not been accused of any wrongdoing.

And the investigation by an outside law firm, Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, that was commissioned by UnitedHealth largely exonerates Mr. Hemsley, accepting his word that he never focused on his stock option grants and that had “he had little or no role” in the negotiation and authorization of a subsequent stock option megagrant.

UnitedHealth declined to make Mr. Hemsley available for comment. His lawyer did not return calls seeking comment.

In shaking up management, the board of UnitedHealth appeared to opt for a middle way between a clean sweep and retaining top executives who could continue the strong track record of Dr. McGuire. Mr. Hemsley is a skilled operations executive who helped execute Dr. McGuire’s strategies. Working together, the two helped take UnitedHealth’s stock price up more than 500 percent since mid-1997. And with lavish pay packages, both got very rich. Dr. McGuire banked more than $500 million during his 15 years as UnitedHealth’s chief executive and currently holds more than $1.1 billion worth of stock options. Mr. Hemsley has taken home more than $135 million and likely holds more than $500 million worth of stock options.

As a result of the recent options problems, both voluntarily agreed to re-price all the options they were awarded from 1994 through 2002 to the annual high share price, eliminating any extra financial benefits from the improper grants. That move would take back only a tiny portion of the value of their outstanding options, but not affect the hundreds of millions of options each has already cashed out.

Dr. McGuire’s option holdings will be reduced by about $100 million to a little over $1 billion, according to Brian Foley, an independent compensation consultant. Mr. Hemsley’s options will likely be reduced by an even smaller amount. Shares of UnitedHealth fell 2.5 percent yesterday, to $47.54. UnitedHealth is among the biggest of the more than 100 companies that have acknowledged possible problems with their options practices. And despite the ouster of Dr. McGuire, United Health's troubles are far from over. The Justice Department, the office of the Minnesota attorney general, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service all have investigations into the company's stock option practices. The company will also have to restate earnings, lowering past results by potentially hundreds of millions of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0082289

The investigation by Wilmer Cutler focused on 29 option grants that accounted for nearly 450 million stock options that the company granted between 1994 and 2002. Most of those grants, their report concluded, "were likely backdated" after investigators found that nearly 80 percent of the total number of options were granted at the second, third, or lowest price of the quarter. The odds of such a finding appear to defy the possibility of pure chance.

The report absolves most of the directors from legal responsibility, but is critical of Dr. McGuire. It contends he "authorized or sought the approval of the compensation committee" for "option grants at opportune times when the company's share price was depressed," including several times to directly benefit himself.

The report indicates that investigators had little evidence to suggest that Mr. Hemsley, who had served as UnitedHealth's president and chief operating officer, had direct knowledge of stock option problems or other improprieties. But the report does raise flags on whether he should have known more.

Of the nine grants Mr. Hemsley was awarded between 1997 and 2002, for example, nearly half were issued when the stock was at or near a trough, according to an analysis of his stock option grants.

Moreover, the report questions the circumstances of a written employment contract that Mr. Hemsley signed when he became UnitedHealth's president. According to the report, UnitedHealth put out a press release stating that "both Hemsley and McGuire had entered into long-term employment agreements" with the company in mid-September 1999 in an effort to ease concerns about Dr. McGuire's plans to remain at the company. In fact, the report said, it was likely that the contracts were not approved by a board committee until an early November meeting and were not signed until a month later in December. The report does not account for Mr. Hemsley's explanation of the discrepancy.

The report also raises questions about his judgment in managing potential conflicts. Investigators detail that Dr. McGuire had extensive financial dealings with William Spears, a longtime director and chairman of UnitedHealth's compensation committee when Dr. McGuire's contract was being negotiated. Mr. Spears managed millions of dollars for Dr. McGuire's family and was a trustee for two family trusts.

Mr. Hemsley did not engage Mr. Spears in 1999, when his contract was being negotiated. But he did hire him to manage his money in 2001. And his former employer, Arthur Andersen, which was hired by UnitedHealth's management as its auditor, also served as the compensation consultant advising the board committee negotiating his contract.

In addition, the report found that UnitedHealth had "inadequate internal controls" to prevent option grant manipulation. Investigators suggested poor communication and sloppy paperwork among its accounting, legal and human resources departments led to many of the problems. The report said that new hires and promoted employees were routinely awarded stock options at the lowest closing price between the start and finish of the quarter when an employee began work, and those "practices were followed openly" in the human resources department.

Investigators found that Mr. Hemsley played a "more limited role in the option-granting process." He told investigators "he was unaware of how the grant dates were selected" or other precise terms.

Who did the human resources department ultimately report to? Mr. Hemsley, according to analysts.

McGuire's Options (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

William McGuire, with his $1 billion-plus portfolio of unexercised stock-options, was a poster-child for the backdating scandal even before his ouster as CEO of UnitedHealth over the weekend. And if history is any guide, the claiming of a scalp this large will only add fuel to a pyre that is already licking at the heels of several even better-known CEOs, notably Apple's Steve Jobs. So it's worth taking a closer look at what exactly Dr. McGuire is accused of doing, and what it tells us about the morality tale that the backdating story is supposed to represent.

After this newspaper published a story in March about the improbability of UnitedHealth's options grants being dated randomly, both the SEC and the company launched investigations. The SEC's is still proceeding, but the company released its internal report over the weekend, and it is that report that precipitated Dr. McGuire's departure.

The investigation, conducted at the company's behest by Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, concluded that a number of options grants were "incorrectly" dated -- that is, that the effective date of the grants was different from the date on which decisions were actually made about how many to grant and to whom. But Wilmer's report also sheds light on why and how this came to happen, and this side of the story is not being widely reported.

"Stock options were a critical component of UnitedHealth's compensation philosophy," the report explains. "Management viewed options as a vital tool for recruiting, motivating and retaining employees." This should be no surprise, but the report goes on: "Management believed that options were the best means of offsetting what it saw as the Company's below-market cash compensation" (our emphasis).

This is important because the picture the Wilmer report paints is not of a greedy executive manipulating a company he controlled for self-enrichment. Dr. McGuire's 10-digit options portfolio makes great headlines, but facts suggest the CEO was chiefly interested in controlling options dates to ensure he was adequately compensating people he wanted to retain.

The Wilmer report notes that "[f]or grants to new hires and employees promoted during the period 2000 to 2002, HR chose grant dates by finding the lowest closing price of UnitedHealth stock between the date of an event in the recruitment of the new hire . . . or promotion of the employee and the end of the quarter. . . ." Further, "[t]hese practices were followed openly in the Company, at least within the HR organization." In other words, backdating was just another hiring and retention tool, one whose use was not limited to Dr. McGuire or his immediate circle.

It is true that backdating was carried out for the purposes of avoiding the accounting and tax difficulties attendant on openly awarding "in the money" options. The October 13, 1999, supplemental option grant was made, in fact, specifically for the purpose of lowering the strike price of several million options held by people including Dr. McGuire. But it seems unlikely, to say the least, that if the scheme had some nefarious intent it would have been departmental policy at HR for several years.

Accounting rules and SEC regulations are not things to be flouted lightly, even when they appear arbitrary or even harmful. In the end, though, it may have been Dr. McGuire's lack of honesty with the board that proved his undoing. In particular, the Wilmer investigation found that Dr. McGuire may have failed to disclose his personal financial relationship with Compensation Committee Chairman William Spears, who managed assets for McGuire family trusts throughout the 1990s. Just as top executives at public companies shouldn't set their own pay, they should not engage in side financial dealings with those who do. More so than the backdating allegations, this undisclosed conflict of interest seems to have been Dr. McGuire's hanging offense.

On the other hand, UnitedHealth's stock was down 2.5% yesterday after the story broke, suggesting that Mr. McGuire's ouster was not the benediction shareholders were looking for.

More Exits Likely Over Stock Option Backdating (AP)

By Joshua Freed

AP, October 17, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS – The shake-up at UnitedHealth Group Inc. – whose top executive will step down no later than Dec. 1 – adds to the list of corner-office victims of stock option backdating.

Faced with an independent report that found widespread problems with the way UnitedHealth issued stock options, the nation's second-largest health insurer said Sunday that chairman and CEO William McGuire will leave the board immediately and leave the company no later than Dec. 1.

In addition, board member William G. Spears will resign, and General Counsel David J. Lubben will retire.

UnitedHealth shares fell $1.21, or 2.48 percent, to close at $47.54 on the New York Stock Exchange.

So far, at least 30 senior executives or directors at 16 companies with stock option problems have resigned or been fired.

There may be many more to come: At least 135 companies have disclosed Securities and Exchange Commission, Department of Justice or internal investigations according to an Associated Press review.

This past week, McAfee Inc. and CNet Networks Inc. both announced their CEOs would resign, and McAfee also fired its president.

UnitedHealth named Stephen Hemsley, the company's president and chief operating officer, as new CEO. Richard Burke, the founding CEO of UnitedHealth's predecessor company, also was named chairman.

But while UnitedHealth's board shake-up moved a lot of people into new positions, none of them are new faces. Hemsley has been McGuire's heir apparent for several years.

Burke founded the company and has been on its board since 1977.

That shows that UnitedHealth's board is trying to appease prosecutors while avoiding scaring Wall Street by signaling a change in the company's successful business model, said Peter Henning, a former lawyer in the enforcement division of the SEC who is now a law professor at Wayne State University in Michigan.

"They have to make sure that it looks to the regulators that they have done a thorough job and gotten all the miscreants out, but they have to maintain their credibility with Wall Street," he said.

In one example after another, the report by a firm hired by the company's board said McGuire's huge awards of stock options got a boost in value because they were issued on one day but priced as if they'd been issued earlier, when the stock price was lower. The report said his option grants "were likely backdated."

UnitedHealth said it had turned over the report by the law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP to the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department.

Comverse CEO Faces Additional Charges (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 17, 2006

Eastern District of New York prosecutors last week filed a superseding indictment against Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, accusing the former Comverse Technology chief executive of new charges that include obstructing justice.

Alexander, who had been accused of creating a secret slush fund for backdated options and evading the requirements of the company's stock option plans, is now charged with offering "another person" millions of dollars as a bribe to falsely take sole responsibility for the scheme.

The government said Alexander first offered the unnamed individual $2 million, then $5 million, and then stated, in substance, "name your price."

Alexander was a fugitive for more than a month before being discovered in Namibia. He faces extradition back to the United States.

The additional charges against him came the same week the government filed papers saying it was engaged in plea negotiations with two other former Comverse executives facing criminal charges in connection with the backdating scheme. The Eastern District U.S. Attorney has until Nov. 8 to decide whether to indict David Kreinberg, Comverse's chief financial officer, and William Sorin, its former general counsel.

U.S. Suit Claims Agway Trustees Mishandled Assets (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Labor Department has filed suit against trustees of bankrupt agricultural cooperative Agway Inc.'s employee retirement-savings plan, charging the plan's fiduciaries improperly invested $50 million of the assets.

According to the lawsuit, 47 members of Agway's investment committee, administration and the company's board allegedly valued the company's stock at prices higher than market value and gave plan participants false information about the investment.

The Labor Department said the suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of New York, seeks a court order to require the defendants to restore the $50 million in losses along with interest and to forfeit any benefits if all losses suffered by the plan aren't restored.

Agway filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection in October 2002 and began liquidation in April 2004.

The Labor Department files suits against trustees who don't manage retiree assets according to government rules. Generally, retiree complaints of mishandled funds will spark the Labor Department to launch an investigation.

The Agway case is noteworthy because of the large amount of allegedly mishandled money involved, Labor Department officials say.

Some money from the liquidation has been paid to some of the 401(k) plan participants, the Labor Department said. But they may not see the rest of their money returned anytime soon because the trial isn't likely to happen before 2008.

Agway itself isn't part of the suit. The fiduciaries are personally liable for losses to the plan caused by fiduciary impropriety, according to the Employee Retirement Income Security Act.

The Labor Department alleges the defendants caused the plan to incur substantial losses. Before Agway filed for bankruptcy protection, the plan held about $48 million in Agway securities and $2 million in cash reserves.

Schnitzer Settles With SEC Over Corruption Overseas (DOW)

By Siobhan Hughes

Dow Jones, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. (SCHN), a provider of scrap metal, will pay $7.7 million to settle allegations that it made improper cash payments or gave gifts to managers of government-owned steel mills in China in order to win business, federal regulators said on Monday.

The Securities and Exchange Commission said that the Portland, Ore., company settled without admitting or denying wrongdoing. Schnitzer will give up $6.3 million in alleged profits and pay interest of $1.4 million to resolve the allegations.

Schnitzer was accused of making the payments from at least 1999 through 2004, on its own behalf and on behalf of Japanese steel companies for whom it acted as a broker. The SEC said that Schnitzer's South Korean subsidiary made the payments in violation of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, an antibribery law that has been in place for decades.

DOJ_NMG_0082292

The SEC also said that Schnitzer paid bribes to managers of privately owned steel mills in both China and South Korea during the same period.

"This case demonstrates that the commission will aggressively pursue companies that make illicit payments to foreign officials in order to obtain business," said Helane Morrison, district administrator of the SEC's San Francisco office, said in a statement.

The SEC said its investigation is continuing, raising the possibility that executives will face SEC civil charges. The SEC also disclosed that it is working with the Justice Department in the case.

The SEC said that a senior Schnitzer official authorized wire transfers for the improper payments to secret bank accounts in South Korea opened by the head of the South Korean subsidiary. It didn't name the senior official, and a spokesperson at Schnitzer didn't return a phone call.

The SEC said that Schnitzer's compliance department uncovered the improper payments in May 2004 and began an investigation. Although a senior executive prohibited further payments, the person authorized the payment of at least two more bribes and authorized employees to increase entertainment expenses in lieu of cash payments to its customers. The SEC said that employees at the South Korean unit destroyed internal documents related to the investigation before they were specifically told to preserve documents.

The SEC said that it considered the cooperation that Schnitzer provided to investigators in accepting the company's settlement offer. A spokesperson for Schnitzer didn't return a phone call.

Freddie Mac Names New Finance Chief (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Mortgage finance giant Freddie Mac, which is still trying to fix its financial systems more than three years after disclosing billions of dollars of accounting errors, yesterday announced that it hired a finance executive from a health-care company to help lead the effort.

Anthony S. "Buddy" Piszel, 51, chief financial officer of Health Net Inc., will assume that role at Freddie Mac next month. He will replace Martin F. Baumann, who left Freddie Mac in March. Freddie's president and chief operating officer, Eugene M. McQuade, has been doing the finance job since Baumann resigned.

"We were looking for a broadly experienced senior executive with the right blend of accounting controls and financial technology experience," Freddie Mac spokeswoman Sharon McHale said. "Buddy brought that expertise."

Before joining the California managed-care company in 2004, Piszel spent more than a decade at Prudential Financial Inc. Earlier in his career, he was an auditor with the accounting firm Deloitte & Touche and a fellow at the Financial Accounting Standards Board, which makes accounting rules.

Freddie Mac remains unable to perform one of the basic functions of a public company: reporting quarterly financial results on a timely basis. It plans to get back on track next year, spokesman Michael Cosgrove said. The McLean company has said its internal controls have significant weaknesses.

Once it resumes issuing quarterly financial reports on schedule, Freddie Mac plans to begin a long-delayed process of registering with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Piszel has traveled that road before, having helped convert Prudential from a mutual insurance company owned by policyholders to a public company registered with the SEC.

Because Freddie Mac was chartered by the government, it was not required to comply with many of the SEC regulations that govern other publicly traded companies. However, before the accounting scandal derailed its efforts, the company had pledged to submit to those requirements.

"While there's a lot of work to do, it's the kind of work I've done before," Piszel said in an interview yesterday.

At Health Net, Piszel helped manage the resolution of extensive billing disputes with hospitals, for which the company set aside $169 million.

"He's widely credited with putting in place a lot of the systems and processes that helped Health Net turn the company around and put it back on the path to profitability," said Carl McDonald, a managed-care industry analyst for CIBC World Markets.

Piszel received $900,000 in salary and bonus last year and ended the year with Health Net stock options, which were not yet exercisable, worth $12.9 million, according to a Health Net regulatory filing. Freddie Mac plans to disclose Piszel's compensation arrangements on Thursday, McHale said.

Baumann, who joined Freddie Mac in 2003 and was soon promoted to chief financial officer, was an expert in accounting policies, Cosgrove said. Having corrected past financial results, Freddie Mac needed a chief financial officer with extensive experience dealing with controls and technology, Cosgrove said.

DOJ_NMG_0082293

CRIMINAL LAW:

Attorney General Wants Study Of U.S. Cities' Rising Crime Rates (AP)

AP, October 17, 2006

BOSTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales offered no new crime-fighting initiatives Monday, promising only to study local crime rates in selected cities to see why homicides and other violent criminal activity is on the rise nationally.

In a speech to the International Association of Chiefs of Police, Gonzales said the Justice Departments' role for now is to look for trends in gang violence, drug trafficking, and how inmates released from prison may have contributed to the increase.

Nationally, violent crime rose 2.2 percent last year, the first increase since 2001.

"We need to figure out the whys behind the numbers — whether the story is good or bad," Gonzales said in a 16-minutes speech. He did not specify which cities would be studied.

He acknowledged that local law enforcement agencies have had more crime-fighting problems to juggle since the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks. "It wasn't like we didn't have a full plate already," he said.

Gonzales' speech was greeted by a standing ovation from the estimated 3,000 local and state police at the Boston convention. The group also was to hear from Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Mayors and police chiefs recently reported seeing spikes in violent crime for 2006, calling for greater support from federal law enforcement. Last month, Gonzales said cities will need to work harder to combat a spike in crime but shouldn't count on more federal funding, citing growing demands in the war on terrorism.

Officials said the study mentioned by Gonzales will be rolled out in three phases: looking at crime increases in cities, analyzing those results for any trends, and identifying federal programs that can help.

It was not clear whether more federal funding will be available for cities, but officials said that "new initiatives" could be created, if necessary.

The government will analyze at least five cities, and potentially dozens more, to get a broad enough picture of crime trends, officials said.

Last month, the FBI found there were 1.39 million violent crimes — including rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault — reported in the United States in 2005, up from 1.36 million the previous year.

However, Justice officials said Monday that even with the recent surge, the overall national violent crime rate remains lower than any year ever measured except for 2004.

US Attorney To Study Cities With Violent Crime Issues (BOS)

By Maria Cramer, GLOBE STAFF

The Boston Globe, October 17, 2006

US Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales told law enforcement officials Monday that his office will study selected cities across the country where violent crime has surged.

Acting Boston Police Commissioner Albert Goslin said he hopes the city, which is ahead of last year's pace for murders, makes the list.

Gonzales Monday addressed the International Association of Chiefs of Police conference at the convention center in South Boston. The gathering, which thousands were expected to attend, ends tomorrow. Gonzales said he wanted to know why violent crime had increased slightly in 2005 compared with 2004.

Nationally, violent crime such as murder, rape, robbery, and aggravated assault rose 2.3 percent in 2005 from 2004, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report.

"In addition, we have recent anecdotal reports that even in this year there may be a rise in violent crime in some areas," Gonzales said, according to a copy of his speech.

The cities will be selected in the next few weeks and will include communities of differing sizes and regions of the country.

"They will also include cities that have experienced significant increases in crime and significant decreases in crime," said Tasia Scolinos, spokeswoman for the Justice Department. The purpose of picking such cities is to understand why some have managed to keep violent crime down, she said.

Goslin, who said he sat next to Gonzales during his speech, said he believes decreased funding for police departments has contributed to the increase in violence, particularly in Boston, where the city has had 58 homicides in 2006, two more than at this time last year. (Mayor Thomas M. Menino said last year that the elimination of federal funds for hiring officers resulted in nearly 300 fewer police in Boston in 2005 than in 2000.)

DOJ_NMG_0082294

"We do not have the federal funds that we used to have, and it has a direct correlation to the spike in crime and our ability to fight it," Goslin said Monday.

But he said he hopes Boston is among the cities picked for the study, to help him better understand other possible reasons for the spike in violent crime. "The fact of the matter is that it's a city that has had success [fighting crime] in the past, and has had an uptick," he said. "We want to get ahead of that uptick."

Justice Dept. Will Gauge Need For Additional Funding To Fight Rise In Violent Crime (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

McClatchy Newspapers, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Justice Department investigators will visit police departments across the country to determine whether more federal dollars are needed to stem the nation's rising violent crime, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced Monday.

In September, the FBI reported that violent crime rose 2.3 percent in 2005, the largest increase since 1991 and a trend that some police officials have blamed on cuts in federal crime-fighting grants. In some cities, such as Minneapolis, violent crime has spiked 15 percent.

"We need to find out why this is happening, what we can do to reverse that trend," Gonzales said. "And we need to do it together."

While Gonzales said the review was important to determine the causes of what he described as a "small uptick" in violent crime, he emphasized that the overall crime rate is the lowest in more than 30 years.

Some police organizations expressed disappointment that the initiative didn't include immediate financial help for local police departments struggling to make up for years of reductions in federal funding.

President George W. Bush's administration has cut grants for state and local crime-fighting programs on the grounds that they have outlived their usefulness or have underperformed.

Legislation pending before Congress largely would restore the administration cuts proposed this year.

Andrea Mournighan, the legislative director of the National Association of Police Organizations, said, "My hope would be the Justice Department will look at certain cities and . . . understand that more funding is needed."

Thomas Frazier, the executive director of the Major Cities Chiefs Association, said police departments already knew the reason for rising violent-crime rates: gangs, drug use and poverty.

Chertoff, Gonzales Tell IACP Cooperation Is Imperative DHS Will Create (OFFICER)

By Lon Slepicka, Officer.com News

Officer.com, October 17, 2006

The First General Assembly of the International Association of Chiefs of Police at their 113th Annual Conference in Boston featured United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff as keynote speakers.

Both had a strong message on what local law enforcement and their respective federal offices could do and should do together to combat terrorism.

"Our shared responsibilities are vast. None of us can do it alone," Gonzales said.

Both men spoke of improving the federal and local relationship. Since September 11, there is no more us versus them according to the Attorney General. He said it is clear that local law enforcement has many more officers on the street. "There can be no question that we learn from you, that we support you and that we are a team."

Chertoff said the greatest challenge of Homeland Security is terrorism, "and our principal partner in dealing with terror is state and local law enforcement."

He was particularly proud of the way federal and local agencies worked together when the small plane hit the apartment building in New York City. He described the immediate contact between the city and the DHS offices in Washington, D.C. and the real-time information that pass between the two.

Chertoff announced the steps he was taking with major city chiefs to start to move information sharing to the next level, one being the creation of a national network intelligence "fusion centers" to support state and local decision makers, chiefs of police and state and local intelligence officials. They will build new information centers to further facilitate the sharing of classified and unclassified information and move that information over secure facilities. He is going to expedite the classified secret level clearance process to get clearance out to the field more quickly. They are going to act quicker in granting top secret to those who require that level of classified access.

DOJ_NMG_0082295

DHS will be assigning people to these "fusion centers" and will be asking local departments to also send their intelligence analyists and major operators looking for all to become more deeply embedded in each others operational activities.

Chertoff said there are already five of the "fusion centers" established including one in Las Angeles called the Joint Regional Intelligence Center, a regionally focused intelligence sharing center. He wants 20 new centers by the end of this fiscal year and up to 35 centers by the end of next fiscal year.

The terrorist front is fought every day by local state and federal law enforcement. Gonzales said we never know when a gas station holdup is in fact a funding operation for a terrorist group and it will more the likely be the local law enforcement that discovers the initial evidence to prove that.

Gonzales emphasized that massive responsibility to find the terrorists among us was added to the responsibilities to crack down own drugs, gangs, violent crime, and crimes against children. "We have not had a terrorist attack on American soil in five years and that is a testament to you and the police forces that you lead."

FBI Raids Home Of Rep. Weldon's Daughter (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — FBI agents raided the homes of a Pennsylvania congressman's daughter and her business partner Monday as part of an investigation into whether Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., helped them secure lucrative lobbying contracts.

Federal investigators targeted four locations near Philadelphia, including the home of Karen Weldon, and two properties in Jacksonville, FBI spokesman Debbie Weierman said.

Weierman declined to elaborate. But another federal law enforcement official said the probe focused on whether the congressman used improper influence to steer business to his daughter and her partner, Charles Sexton.

The official, who has been briefed on aspects of the investigation, was not authorized to comment publicly on the inquiry. The congressman's properties were not among the locations searched, the official said.

At a campaign stop near Philadelphia where Weldon is in a tight re-election race against Democrat Joe Sestak, the congressman denied any wrongdoing and questioned the timing of the investigation.

"What I find ironic, if there is an investigation, is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election. This incident was 2½ years ago," he told the Associated Press. "I've never helped my daughter get anything. My kids are qualified on their own."

In 2004, a liberal watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, called on the Justice Department to examine whether Weldon violated federal law by assisting companies that hired his daughter as a lobbyist.

FBI Raids Home Of Weldon's Daughter (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale

AP, October 17, 2006

MEDIA, Pa. -- Three weeks before Election Day, an FBI corruption probe involving Republican Rep. Curt Weldon intensified as agents raided the homes of his daughter and a close friend.

The FBI swept in Monday and searched six sites in the Philadelphia area and Jacksonville, Fla., including Karen Weldon's lobbying firm and one of its clients, a Russian energy company, FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman said. The congressman's home and offices were not searched, she said.

"I have not done anything wrong and my daughter hasn't either," Weldon said at a news conference late Monday afternoon. "I would absolutely never use my position to help anyone in an unusual way."

Federal investigators are looking into whether Weldon used his influence to help Solutions North America secure lobbying contracts worth $1 million from foreign clients, two people familiar with the inquiry have told The Associated Press.

The company is run by Karen Weldon and Charles P. Sexton Jr., whose home was searched by the FBI. Sexton is a close friend and adviser to the lawmaker.

Weldon called the timing of the raids suspect.

The 10-term congressman from the Philadelphia suburbs, who is vice chairman of the House Armed Services committee, is locked in a tight race with Democrat Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral.

"What I find ironic, if there is an investigation, is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election," Weldon said. "This incident was 2 1/2 years ago."

Karen Weldon, 32, previously worked for Boeing Co., which has a helicopter plant just outside Weldon's district. Her attorney, Joseph Fioravanti, did not return a telephone message on Monday.

Sexton did not return a message left Monday at his home.

DOJ_NMG_0082296

The FBI also searched two Jacksonville-area properties of Itera International Energy Corp., including its headquarters, Weierman said.

The Russian natural gas firm was paying Solutions $500,000 a year for public-relations help, according to a 2004 Los Angeles Times article. Around the same time, Weldon gathered 30 colleagues for a dinner in Washington honoring Itera's chairman, the newspaper reported.

FBI Raids Lobbyists' Homes, Office (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — FBI agents conducted raids in two states Monday as part of an investigation into whether Rep. Curt Weldon used his influence to steer business to a lobbying firm owned by his daughter and a one-time campaign aide, Justice Department officials and others familiar with the investigation said.

Federal investigators are trying to determine whether the Pennsylvania Republican helped secure almost $1 million in contracts for a firm known as Solutions North America, run by his daughter, Karen, and a prominent Philadelphia-area Republican, Charles P. Sexton Jr. Sexton once served as the 10-term congressman's campaign finance chief.

The raids are another political setback for the Republican Party as it struggles to maintain control of Congress. Weldon, who represents a suburban Philadelphia district, is locked in a closely contested campaign with a retired Navy vice admiral.

The news of the probe comes as the FBI is looking into salacious messages sent to House pages by Florida Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned his seat.

The FBI on Monday searched four locations in Pennsylvania, including the homes and office of Karen Weldon and Sexton. Also searched was the Jacksonville, Fla., headquarters of Itera International Energy Corp., the U.S. arm of a diversified Russian-based oil and gas firm.

The FBI also searched the law office of Philadelphia attorney John Gallagher, a longtime Weldon friend and supporter who did legal work for the consulting firm, said people familiar with the probe who requested anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. The FBI did not raid Weldon's home or office.

Speaking to reporters in Pennsylvania Monday, Weldon called the investigation politically motivated. "I've never helped my daughter get anything," he said. "My kids are qualified on their own."

An attorney for Weldon questioned the timing of the disclosure of the probe, which appears to stem from an investigation on Weldon that ran in the Los Angeles Times. "I think it is very suspicious that 2 1/2 years after the Los Angeles Times broke the story, that the FBI is now getting around to looking at it three weeks before the election," said William B. Canfield.

Canfield said the House Ethics Committee reviewed the case and the matter was resolved "in a way that was satisfactory to everyone."

In 2004, The Times disclosed that Solutions North America won contracts from companies or individuals that Weldon tried to help. The beneficiaries included two struggling Russian firms and a Serbian family linked to accused war criminal Slobodan Milosevic.

An FBI spokeswoman, Debra Weierman, confirmed Monday that agents had conducted six searches as part of an investigation but declined further comment.

Legal experts said that an agreement between a member of Congress to take official action in exchange for cash or other benefits — even if the gifts are not received by the lawmaker — could constitute bribery. But such allegations are difficult to prove and require evidence of a quid pro quo.

Weldon is a leading voice in Washington on the affairs of former Eastern bloc nations. He is also vice chairman of the powerful House Armed Services Committee and has been able to spread federal contracts over his district and region.

But his hold on his seat is precarious. The district voted Democratic in the last two presidential elections.

He is facing a stiff challenge from Navy veteran Joe Sestak, who has tried to tie his opponent to what he calls the failures of the Bush administration, including the war in Iraq.

The latest independent poll showed the race in a statistical dead heat.

Sexton, reached by phone Monday, declined comment. In an interview with The Times on Saturday, Sexton said he had not heard of any investigation. "The allegations are preposterous that there was any wrongdoing on the part of Mr. Weldon and his daughter or me," he said.

Karen Weldon, now 32, was inexperienced in international consulting when she and Sexton set up their business. She had previously spent six years working for Boeing Co., in what she described as "learning and training programs."

DOJ_NMG_0082297

Their first client was Itera International. At the time, the congressman was trying to help improve the company's image with U.S. officials after questions had been raised about how the firm acquired gas fields in post-Soviet Russia. Weldon went to bat for Itera with federal agencies.

Itera agreed to pay his daughter's firm $500,000 a year around the same time that Weldon was extolling the company and helping to round up 30 congressional colleagues for a dinner honoring the firm's chairman.

Gallagher, Weldon's friend, introduced Solutions to its second client, a fledgling Russian aerospace manufacturer named Saratov Aviation Plant that wanted to sell its products in the United States. Weldon and his daughter journeyed to Saratov to look at the company's flying-saucer technology. Weldon pushed the Navy to look at the saucer. His daughter's firm ended up with a $20,000-a-month contract with Saratov. Karen Weldon's firm has since parted ways with Saratov.

Weldon introduced his daughter to her third client, two wealthy Serbian brothers, Dragomir and Bogoljub Karic who had been linked to Milosevic. Weldon sought to win U.S. visas for the men both before and after their family foundation hired his daughter's firm for $240,000 a year.

FBI Raid Deals New Blow To Republicans (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, October 17, 2006

Republican control of Congress was further endangered on Monday after the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided the home of the daughter of a long-term Republican congressman facing a tough re-election fight.

The FBI operation took place at the home of Karen Weldon, the daughter of congressman Curt Weldon, a 10-term Pennsylvania Republican lawmaker who serves as vice-chairman of the House homeland security committee.

Several US media reported that the agency was investigating whether Mr Weldon had illegally steered contracts to his daughter and Charles Sexton, her business partner and friend of the congressman. Debra Weierman, an FBI spokeswoman, declined to comment on the investigation, but confirmed the FBI had executed search warrants at six locations in Pennsylvania and Florida.

Mr Weldon, who faces a fierce electoral challenge from retired navy admiral Joe Sestak, is one of many Republican incumbents in previously safe constituencies who face tough re-election bids because of voter dissatisfaction with Republicans over the war in Iraq and scandals in Congress.

Already reeling from increasing voter concerns about the Iraq war – which has claimed the lives of 2,749 soldiers and seen almost 21,000 US military casualties – Republicans have more recently been dogged by the revelation that Mark Foley, a Republican congressman, sent overly friendly e-mails to page boys in the House.

The Republican leadership has also come under fire following allegations they allowed Mr Foley to remain in Congress in spite of warnings about his activities.

A recent poll by the Center for Opinion Research at Franklin & Marshall College in Pennsylvania found that Mr Sestak, a previously unknown political opponent, had a slight lead over Mr Weldon ahead of the November 7 elections.

The poll also found 49 per cent of voters in his district believed it was time for a change, compared with only 37 per cent who favoured his re-election.

Mr Weldon on Monday denied any wrongdoing. “I’ve never helped my daughter get anything,” he was quoted as saying by the Associated Press. “My kids are qualified on their own.”

Russell Caso, Mr Weldon’s spokesman, said the FBI had not told the congressman he was the subject of any investigation.

FBI Raids Four Homes, Two Offices In Weldon Probe (PHI)

By John Shiffman, Mitch Lipka And Patrick Kerkstra

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 17, 2006

FBI agents investigating U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon (R., Pa.) conducted six raids this morning - including at the homes of his daughter and a longtime friend.

In all, agents executed four search warrants in the Philadelphia area and two in Jacksonville, Fla., officials said.

In Center City, agents searched the law office of John Gallagher, a Weldon friend who has conducted extensive business in Russia and former Soviet Republics.

In Media, agents searched the offices of the public relations firm formed by Weldon's longtime friend Charles P. Sexton Jr., and the congressman's daughter, Karen.

Sexton and Karen Weldon formed Solutions North America in 2002, and won $1 million in contracts from two Russian energy firms and a Serbian family with ties to Slobodan Milosevic.

DOJ_NMG_0082298

FBI agents in Jacksonville, Fla., raided the office of one of the Russian energy firms, Itera, and a private residence whose connection to the investigation was not disclosed.

The Philadelphia raids began early this morning. Shortly before noon, FBI agents left Karen Weldon's three-story brick house on Queen Street in Philadelphia carrying armfuls of boxes.

A government car pulled into the alley to the back door of the house and loaded boxes into it. Three agents standing in an alley - members of the FBI's public corruption squad - declined to identify themselves.

"I can confirm that we conducted a number of searches regarding an ongoing investigation," said FBI agent Jerri Williams, a spokeswoman in Philadelphia. "Details regarding those investigations cannot be provided because the accompanying affidavit is sealed."

In Delaware County, FBI agents had blocked off Kelli Lane leading to Sexton's Springfield home, and were removing at least one box and a bag of material from his home late this morning. Sexton is a longtime ally of Weldon's and has been a power in Delaware County GOP politics for more than three decades.

The raids came three days after news broke that the FBI was investigating whether the Delaware County congressman used his influence to help his daughter, a registered lobbyist, win consulting contracts.

At an event earlier today at Philadelphia International Airport to discuss airport noise, Weldon said the investigation was politically motivated - blaming a complaint filed by Melanie Sloan, director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

"She is the only one I know of who went to the Justice Department and asked for an investigation," Weldon said. "I know that because I have her letter."

He added, "I haven't helped get my daughter anything."

Weldon, who is involved in a tight race for reelection, has said that he has done nothing wrong.

The $1 million contract under investigation was first reported in 2004 by the Los Angeles Times. Sources said the FBI and Justice Department investigation was based on the Times story.

The Inquirer reported in 2004 that Weldon had lobbied federal officials on behalf of Itera, the huge and controversial Russian natural gas company. Weldon also complained to Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser, about Itera's treatment by the U.S. Trade and Development Agency.

Itera paid $500,000 to Karen Weldon and Sexton's firm. The contract was signed Sept. 30, 2002, six days after the congressman helped arrange a dinner at the Library of Congress to honor Itera and Igor Makarov, the firm's chief executive officer.

About noon today, a group of 17 protesters arrived outside Weldon's district office in Upper Darby, carrying signs and the kind of foam hands usually seen at sporting events to proclaim "Number One." But these rose-colored hands said "Caught Red-Handed."

"This is the first time I've come out and done something like this," said Judy Voet of Rose Valley. "This Congress is just so corrupt."

Most of the protesters were Democrats, but they said they were not involved in the campaign of Weldon's opponent, Joe Sestak, and they included at least one Republican, Chuck Ries of Havertown.

"I don't know what to believe anymore, they lie so much," said Ries, holding a sign linking Weldon to current and former Republican colleagues Tom DeLay, Mark Foley and Bob Ney - all of whom have been embroiled in career-ending scandals.

Homes Raided In Rep. Weldon Influence Probe (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And R. Jeffrey Smith, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

FBI Looks at Business Run By Daughter, Political Ally

Federal agents raided the homes of Rep. Curt Weldon's daughter and one of his closest political supporters yesterday as part of an investigation into whether the veteran Republican congressman used his influence to benefit himself and his daughter's lobbying firm, according to sources familiar with the investigation.

The investigation focuses on actions the Pennsylvania congressman took that may have aided clients of the business created by his daughter, Karen Weldon, and longtime Pennsylvania political ally Charles Sexton, according to three of the sources.

A grand jury, impaneled in Washington in May, has obtained evidence gathered over at least four months through wiretaps of Washington area cellphone numbers and has scrutinized whether Weldon received anything of value, according to the sources. They spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0082299

The investigation focuses on Weldon's support of the Russian-managed Itera International Energy Corp., one of the world's largest oil and gas firms, while that company paid fees to Solutions North America, the company that Karen Weldon and Sexton operate.

The congressman, for example, intervened on Itera's behalf when U.S. officials canceled a federal grant to the company. He also encouraged U.S. companies to do business with Itera at a time when its reputation had been sullied by accusations of Russian corruption.

Weldon said in a prepared statement that he had done nothing wrong and would cooperate in the investigation "100 percent." Michael Puppio, a campaign spokesman, said Weldon hoped that "reliance on leaks would cease and the media would rely on facts that are verifiable."

Weldon said that the House ethics committee looked into the allegations in 2004 "and found that I had engaged in no wrongdoing." He said he was "extremely disappointed that we are discussing this topic three weeks before an election that could determine control of Congress."

Yesterday's raids of six locations in Pennsylvania and Florida were moved up in part because of leaks about the investigation late last week, according to two of the sources. Top federal prosecutors supervising the inquiry concluded early this month that they were progressing significantly on another front in the investigation and did not want to make their work public too soon by conducting searches, especially so close to the Nov. 7 elections.

McClatchy Newspapers reported Saturday that the FBI had recommended that Justice Department officials investigate Rep. Weldon's actions, leading to yesterday's searches.

Debra Weierman, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Washington field office, confirmed that the locations included the homes of Karen Weldon and Sexton; the suburban Philadelphia offices of Solutions North America; and the downtown Philadelphia offices of John Gallagher, a lawyer who represented Russian companies linked to Itera.

Two other sites searched were the U.S. headquarters of Itera International in Jacksonville, Fla., and a Jacksonville home, the sources said.

Prosecutors are usually loath to conduct raids against a public official so close to an election. But some involved in the investigation debated whether holding off could also appear to have been influenced by the election, sources said.

Weldon faces a difficult reelection campaign against a retired vice admiral, Democrat Joseph A. Sestak Jr., and has fallen behind in some polls. With 10 terms under his belt, Weldon is a House veteran but has not faced a real challenge in years.

His district gave Democratic presidential candidate John F. Kerry 53 percent of the vote in 2004. Sestak has painted him as out of touch with his district.

Karen Weldon and Sexton registered to lobby for Itera on Sept. 13, 2002, stating that they wanted to help the firm sell gas and oil products to the United States. The registration was terminated two years later. But Senate records do not list any lobbying payments to the pair from Itera.

Rep. Weldon said that he never knew who his daughter's clients were. "I've never helped my daughter get anything. My kids are qualified on their own," he said.

Weldon assailed the news reports as politically motivated. He blamed a 2004 complaint filed by the liberal-leaning Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which is led by Melanie Sloan, a former prosecutor who also has been a Democratic staff member on the House Judiciary Committee.

That complaint was based on a lengthy 2004 report by the Los Angeles Times that described the meteoric rise of Solutions North America and its relationship to Itera, which has long been dogged by international controversy over its obscured ownership.

The company, formed in 1992, made huge profits as an intermediary in natural gas sales between the state-controlled Russian company Gazprom and former Soviet republics. It eventually purchased some of Gazprom's gas fields and other assets for nominal sums, estimated by critics to be billions of dollars below their real value, and became a rival.

Oil and gas traders and Russian experts have long suggested that Itera's real owners are former senior Gazprom executives and that the company was established in the United States as a vehicle to transfer money out of Russia and into their pockets. The company could not be reached to comment yesterday, but it has previously denied that claim.

Itera drew attention for cutting off natural gas to Georgia shortly before the winter of 2002, when it tried to collect a $90 million debt from the Georgian government during a flare-up of tensions with the Moscow government. Weldon helped mediate the dispute, persuading the company to supply the gas.

The Philadelphia Inquirer and the Los Angeles Times reported that Itera's representatives signed a $500,000 contract in 2002 with Solutions North America. That year, Rep. Weldon complained to the U.S. Trade and Development Agency about its cancellation of a grant to Itera to explore a gas field in Siberia.

"Itera is a great source for American companies to be involved in joint projects," he said during a visit to the company's offices in 2002.

At a January 2003 opening of Itera's U.S. headquarters, Weldon said: "I can think of no other company that represents what Russia is today and offers for the future."

Four people listed in corporate records as Itera officers or directors wrote checks totaling $8,000 to Weldon's campaign on April 20, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, a Web site that tracks campaign contributions.

Research director Lucy Shackelford and staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Searches Carried Out In Influence Inquiry (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 — Federal agents executed search warrants on Monday at the homes of Representative Curt Weldon's daughter and a longtime political associate in an investigation into whether Mr. Weldon, a Pennsylvania Republican, improperly aided their efforts to obtain lobbying and public relations contracts, law enforcement officials said.

F.B.I. agents searched four homes and other places in the vicinity of Philadelphia and two sites near Jacksonville, Fla. Debbie Weierman, a spokeswoman for the bureau's Washington office, confirmed the searches but would not say why they were conducted. Affidavits citing reasons for the searches were sealed.

Mr. Weldon's residence and his Congressional office were not searched, but other law enforcement officials said the lawmaker was the subject of an intensifying corruption inquiry.

Mr. Weldon was first elected to his district, the Seventh, on the outskirts of Philadelphia in 1984 and is vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. He is in a close re-election race against Joe Sestak, a former three-star admiral and national security aide in the Clinton White House.

Mr. Weldon was quoted by The Associated Press at a campaign appearance on Monday as saying that the investigation was politically motivated and that the disclosure of the inquiry, in news accounts in recent days, was suspect.

"What I find ironic, if there is an investigation," Mr. Weldon was quoted as saying, "is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election."

Law enforcement officials said the investigation into Mr. Weldon had been under way for several months. They said the government had not confirmed the existence of the investigation or conducted the searches until after news organizations learned of them. McClatchy Newspapers first reported the inquiry on Saturday, and it is not known how it got the information.

On Monday, a spokesman for Mr. Weldon's campaign, Pete Peterson, said he had no comment on the matter and referred calls to Mr. Weldon's office in Washington. Mr. Weldon's campaign manager, Michael Puppio Jr., and his chief of staff in Washington, Russ Caso, did not return calls seeking comment.

Mr. Weldon has at times disagreed with the Bush administration. He maintained that a secret military unit known as Able Danger had used sophisticated data mining to tie several of the September 2001 hijackers to Al Qaeda more than a year before the attacks, but a report by the Pentagon disputed that contention.

The searches for financial records, internal documents and computer messages took place at the home of Mr. Weldon's daughter, Karen, and at the home of Charles P. Sexton Jr., Ms. Weldon's business partner and a friend of her father.

A search was also conducted at the office of Solutions North America Inc., a firm run by Ms. Weldon and Mr. Sexton, in Media, Pa.

One of the searches in Florida was at the office of a Russian natural gas company, the Itera International Energy Corporation, which has hired Solutions North America for public relations assistance in the United States.

The precise accusations of wrongdoing that led to the inquiry involving Mr. Weldon are not known. In general, officials said, investigators are trying to determine whether Mr. Weldon misused his official position to help his daughter's company obtain lobbying contracts from foreign clients and helped steer contracts to favored firms.

Mr. Weldon said Monday that he had not given his daughter any special assistance and that the House ethics committee had looked into her contracts after they were the subject of an article in The Los Angeles Times in February 2004. He said he had cooperated with the inquiry and had turned over 150 pages of documents and answered the panel's questions.

FBI Ups Ante On Weldon (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082301

FBI agents raided the home of Karen Weldon, the daughter of Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), as well as five other locations Monday, signaling an intensifying federal probe into the veteran GOP lawmaker's dealings with her lobbying firm and a Russian business tycoon.

Of the locations in Pennsylvania and Jacksonville, Fla., searched by the FBI, one was the Jacksonville office of Itera International Energy Corp., the U.S. arm of a Russian company run by Igor Makarov.

Karen Weldon's firm, Solutions North America, received a $500,000 public relations contract to represent Itera in September 2002, including $170,000 in up-front money.

The contract was inked just days before the elder Weldon rounded up 30 Members to attend attend a dinner at the Library of Congress in honor of Makarov. Members of the Russian Duma attended the Sept. 24, 2002, event as well.

And despite the fact that the U.S. Trade and Development Agency had withdrawn an $868,000 grant to Itera several months earlier, Weldon praised Makarov and Itera in a Sept. 26, 2002, speech on the House floor. Weldon said Makarov had offered to open up his company — which had been criticized for a series of financial transactions with Russian natural gas giant Gazprom — to foreign scrutiny. Weldon called Makarov's announcement "absolutely refreshing" and said he had to "applaud" the move.

The 44-year-old Makarov was a member of the former Soviet Union's national bicycling team, according to the Itera Web site. Makarov "started his business in the late 1980's and received excellent managing experience from a small production and trading company to a large international corporation," the Web site stated.

Neither Karen Weldon, her attorney nor Itera returned calls seeking comment for this article.

Investigators also searched the Springfield, Pa., home of Charles Sexton, Karen Weldon's business partner in Solutions North America and a former finance chairman for Weldon's Congressional campaigns. Sexton, chairman of the Delaware County Republican Party — the party operation that has long been a backbone of Weldon's support — did not return calls seeking comment.

Weldon told reporters Monday that Sexton would take a leave from serving as an adviser to his re-election committee. Weldon is in the fight of his political life, facing a strong and well-funded challenge by Democrat Joe Sestak.

The Pennsylvania office of Solutions North America also was targeted in the search, as was a law office in Pennsylvania, a law-enforcement official said.

The Justice Department is looking into whether $1 million in payments to Karen Weldon's company were linked to official actions taken by the elder Weldon. Justice Department prosecutors filed sealed affidavits in Florida and Pennsylvania federal courts to support the FBI searches, law enforcement sources said.

FBI officials in Washington declined to comment on Monday's raids, saying they were part of an ongoing investigation.

Weldon, who has denied allegations of wrongdoing in relation to his daughter's firm since they were first raised in a February 2004 Los Angeles Times article, suggested on Monday that Democrats and the liberal watchdog group Citizens for Ethics and Responsibility in Washington were behind the Justice Department probe.

Weldon offered no proof to substantiate those claims, although he said CREW had written to Justice earlier this year seeking a probe and claimed he had a copy of that letter.

"What I find ironic, if there is an investigation, is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election," Weldon said at an appearance in Media, Pa., according to The Associated Press. "This incident was two and a half years ago."

Following the initial news reports in February 2004 about the Weldons' activities, the House ethics committee began an "informal investigation" into Weldon's ties to his daughter's company. That inquiry was first reported by Roll Call.

But the committee got bogged down in a partisan battle over ethics rules and committee staffing for the first half of the 109th Congress, and any results of its probe were never released publicly.

McClatchy Newspapers reported last week about the existence of the FBI investigation, and federal agents acted quickly to obtain search warrants once the initial news report was published, in order to protect potential evidence needed in the investigation, according to several law-enforcement sources.

According to McClatchy, "the FBI only over the last few months obtained evidence suggesting that the [C]ongressman may have broken the law."

Karen Weldon, 31, and Sexton, 69, also had other clients beyond Itera with ties to the Congressman.

The Los Angeles Times reported that Solutions North America had been paid $240,000 to represent a Serbian family that has ties to Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic, who was on trial for war crimes when he died earlier this year.

In January 2003, Weldon and his daughter visited Russia together, including the Saratov Aviation factory. After they returned to the United States, Saratov retained Solutions North America, paying the firm $20,000 per month to represent it.

At around the same time, Weldon — who chairs the tactical air and land forces subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee — began pushing an unmanned airborne drone made by Saratov to U.S. Navy officials. Karen Weldon also met with at least one Navy official regarding the Saratov drone program without disclosing her relationship with the firm, according to The Philadelphia Inquirer.

According to media reports, SNA also had fee arrangements with both Itera and Saratov that included reward payments for federal contracts, which are illegal under federal law.

FBI Targets Weldon In Influence-peddling Probe (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

FBI agents raided the homes of Rep. Curt Weldon's daughter and a longtime political friend yesterday as part of an investigation into whether the Pennsylvania Republican used his influence to steer $1 million in foreign business to his lobbyist daughter.

Armed with search warrants, agents from the FBI's offices in Washington and Philadelphia descended on four locations in the Philadelphia area, including Karen Weldon's home in the Queen Village section, and two locations in Jacksonville, Fla.

Among the houses raided was the Springfield, Pa., residence of Charles P. Sexton Jr., Miss Weldon's business partner and the congressman's close friend. The agents also searched the offices of Solutions North America Inc. (SNA) in Media, Pa., the lobbying and consulting business operated by Miss Weldon, 31, and Mr. Sexton, 69.

Mr. Weldon's home and offices were not targeted in the raids.

"What I find ironic, if there is an investigation, is that no one would tell me until three weeks before the election," Mr. Weldon told reporters yesterday during a campaign appearance in Media.

Denying any wrongdoing by himself or his daughter, Mr. Weldon called the investigation politically motivated and challenged the timing of the raids.

"I've never helped my daughter get anything," he said. "My kids are qualified on their own."

Federal law-enforcement authorities said the FBI is investigating whether Mr. Weldon used his political influence as a 10-term congressman and senior member of the House Armed Services and Homeland Security committees to help his daughter's firm secure at least three lobbying and consulting contracts.

Last week, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee mailed fliers to voters in the 7th District, where Mr. Weldon is in a tight race with Democratic challenger Joe Sestak, accusing Miss Weldon of getting help from her father on lobbying projects.

Records show that Miss Weldon and Mr. Sexton, former chairman of the Springfield Republican Party, started SNA in September 2002. Three of the company's clients -- Itera International Energy Corp. and Saratov Aviation, both in Russia, and Dragomir and Bogoljub Karic, residents of Serbia -- reportedly have ties to Mr. Weldon.

The authorities said Mr. Weldon led a congressional delegation to Russia in 2002, where he visited with Itera International officials just before the firm signed with SNA. Two days after a $500,000 contract with the firm was signed, the authorities said, Mr. Weldon co-hosted an event at the Library of Congress honoring Itera International's chairman.

In January 2003, Itera International opened U.S. offices in Jacksonville, paying for Mr. Weldon to attend the opening.

The authorities also said Mr. Weldon and his daughter visited Saratov Aviation in January 2003, after which the firm signed a $20,000-a-month contract with SNA.

Yesterday, Mr. Weldon also questioned the need for an FBI investigation, saying the House ethics committee looked into the contracts awarded to his daughter's company soon after the Los Angeles Times reported on them in February 2004.

FBI: Weldon Under Investigation (NORRISTH)

By By: WILLIAM BENDER

Norristown (PA) Times-Herald, October 17, 2006

As U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon was proclaiming his innocence Monday morning in Media, FBI agents were raiding the home of his daughter and the leader of the Springfield Republican Party as part of an investigation into whether Weldon used his influence to help the pair obtain nearly $1 million worth of overseas lobbying and consulting contracts.

Starting about 9 a.m., agents began descending on a total of six locations, including Karen Weldon's home in the Queen Village section of Philadelphia, Charles Sexton's Springfield rancher on Kelli Lane and the office of their company, Solutions North America, in Media.

"I don't know anything about an investigation. I have no idea, no clue," Weldon, apparently unaware of the raids, told reporters at a 10:15 a.m. press conference about an airspace redesign plan at Philadelphia International Airport. "I have not done anything wrong."

DOJ_NMG_0082303

Federal agents searched two locations in Jacksonville, Fla., one of them the headquarters of Itera energy group, FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman confirmed.

The Russian-based Itera International Energy Corp. signed a $500,000 contract with Solutions North America on Sept. 30, 2002, six days after Weldon introduced a House resolution to encourage U.S. "cooperation with the Russian Federation on energy development issues" and hosted a Library of Congress dinner to honor the company's chairman. The contract included a $170,000 up-front payment and a 10 percent "finder's fee" for any sales Solutions generated, according to published reports.

The FBI also searched the Philadelphia office of attorney John Gallagher, according to a law enforcement official.

Gallagher introduced Sexton to another Solutions client, Saratov Aviation Plant. Weldon visited the Russian company in 2003, reportedly with his daughter, and later brought its experimental aircraft to the Navy's attention.

News of the investigation throws Weldon's re-election campaign into disarray as he tries to stave off hard-charging Democrat Joseph Sestak, a retired Navy admiral who is running evenly with the 10-term incumbent in the 7th District according to a Keystone Poll conducted late last month. Sexton, a longtime political ally of Weldon's, who was handling the bulk of his fund-raising, immediately stepped down Monday as a senior adviser to the campaign.

The congressman's staff had insisted Friday evening that "there is no investigation" because they had not been contacted by the Justice Department or the FBI. Weldon spokesman Michael Puppio said Saturday that their attorneys were considering filing a defamation lawsuit against McClatchy Newspapers, which broke the story Friday night.

Weldon said Monday he believed the FBI raids were linked to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) and the left-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW).

Days before the story broke, a DCCC-funded mailer began circulating the district, accusing Weldon, vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, of using his position to "help his lobbyist daughter win defense contracts potentially worth millions for her clients."

"In Washington, politics is a family affair, and Curt Weldon sure knew how to steer our tax dollars into his family's pockets," the flier reads. DCCC spokeswoman Jen Psaki denied any connection between the mailing and reports of the investigation, calling Weldon "paranoid."

At a hastily arranged press conference late Monday afternoon outside his campaign headquarters on Baltimore Pike, Weldon repeatedly denied that he had helped his daughter attain any contracts.

"What bothers me as a father is to see somebody say she's inexperienced," Weldon said of Karen Weldon, now 32 years old. "I'll put my daughter up against anyone, anyplace in terms of her capability. She's a very competent young lady and I stand behind her 100 percent."

Weldon, of Thornbury, said he would "fully cooperate" with the investigation while he asked voters to see through what his campaign said was the work of "left wing liberal activists" - specifically CREW's executive director, Melanie Sloan.

"I'm not here to point fingers, but that article, that mass mailing was done on Wednesday, went to every house in my district. Maybe it was a coincidence," he said. "But I'm also aware that the person who filed the one complaint against me with the Justice Department, Melanie Sloan, was a key staffer for (U.S. Rep.) John Conyers, who stands to become the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, assuming the Democrats will win control of the Congress.

"I think it doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out that this district could swing control of the Congress," he continued. "Melanie Sloan filed the complaint; I have a copy of it, and on her board she has one of my opponent's biggest single contributor(s) - a fellow by the name of Dan Berger."

In April 2004, CREW asked the Justice Department to investigate Weldon's role in how Solutions landed contracts with Itera, Saratov and the Serbian Karic Foundation.

Sloan said Saturday her group has heard nothing from the department since. Sestak did not declare his candidacy in the 7th District race until February.

Berger, a Philadelphia attorney and prominent Democratic fund-raiser, is a CREW board member whose law firm, Berger and Montague, is one of Sestak's largest campaign contributors. CREW spokeswoman Naomi Seligman Steiner said her group did not influence the timing of the FBI investigation.

"We knew when everyone else knew," Steiner said, referring to the McClatchy report that was posted online Friday night. "If he's looking to blame anyone," she said of Weldon, "he should blame himself."

Asked Monday morning why a Justice Department under a Republican administration would play a role in a Democratic scheme to undermine his campaign, Weldon said: "The bureaucracy, it's not Democrat or Republican."

Three weeks before Election Day, the investigation plays into the Democrats' theme that 12 years of Republican control has created a "culture of corruption" in Washington. It follows the recent resignation of U.S. Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., for sending sexually explicit messages to former congressional pages and a guilty plea from U.S. Rep. Robert Ney, R-Ohio, on corruption charges related to the Jack Abramoff scandal.

Sestak spokesman Ryan Rudominer called the developments "very troubling" but otherwise declined to comment.

After the Los Angeles Times first reported in 2004 on Weldon's ties to Solutions clients, the congressman voluntarily provided the House Ethics Committee with the relevant documentation. He has refused to share that documentation with the Daily Times.

Weldon said Monday that the committee asked some follow-questions and eventually gave him a "written letter closing the case." Asked if the letter cleared him of the current allegations, he responded: "I didn't say clearing, I said closing the case. I'll use their exact terminology."

Weldon said he spoke to committee Chairman Doc Hastings on Sunday and Hastings said he "was not aware of any contact between the ethics committee and the Justice Department."

The congressman refused to comment on the "substance of what the investigation might be about," other than to say he has not received a target letter or been contacted by the FBI or Justice Department. He has retained attorney William Winning, and his campaign said it would provide no further comment due to the ongoing investigation.

Karen Weldon could not be reached for comment Monday.

Sexton and Solutions attorney Joseph Fioravanti did not return phone calls. Gallagher, the Philadelphia attorney whose office was raided, said Saturday that federal investigators hadn't contacted him. "It sounds pretty outrageous," Gallagher said, when told about reports of an investigation.

"We look forward to getting back to the issues of this campaign, although this obviously makes it very difficult," Weldon said. "And to the constituents out there who've supported me for 30 years, all I can say is I hope you'll bear with me through this process.

"It is a difficult one, I would not have wished this on anyone, and three weeks before the election, that makes the campaign that much more difficult. But, you know, life goes on and we will survive."

Editorial: FBI Raid Spurs More Questions Than Answers (DCDN)

Delaware County (PA) Daily News, October 17, 2006

Is U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon a crook? That was the question on everyone's lips Monday as word spread that the FBI had raided the homes of his daughter, Karen; a key political confidante, Springfield GOP leader Charles Sexton; a Philadelphia attorney and a Florida business.

The feds are investigating the role of the 10-term incumbent 7th District Republican from Thornbury in the creation of an international consulting firm run by Karen Weldon and Sexton - and how it quickly won some $1 million in contracts from foreign entities tied to the congressman.

Weldon and all those involved (who could be reached for, or were willing to, comment) deny any wrongdoing. And they have since the matter first became public in 2004.

Word of the probe first surfaced Friday with a story by McClatchy Newspapers. Weldon's staff immediately denied that there was any investigation at all.

"There is no investigation," said Weldon spokesman John Tomaszewski. "There is no formal investigation and there is no inquiry. There's nothing. This is nonsense, ludicrous."

Weldon himself was repeating that line at an unrelated press conference Monday morning, even as the FBI was executing its search warrants and carting away documents.

As of this morning, there are many questions and few answers. But this much is known:

- In 2002 Karen Weldon was a 29-year-old with an undergraduate degree in education and a graduate degree in information systems who was previously employed at Boeing Helicopters, one of her dad's biggest benefactors. She and Sexton, a wealthy businessman and one of the biggest power brokers in the Delaware County Republican machine, formed Solutions North America Inc. in Media.

- The very same month, the firm won a $500,000 a year contract with a Russian natural gas company boosted by the congressman. Six days before, Curt Weldon had hosted a soiree in the Library of Congress to introduce it to his colleagues.

- Solutions North America was awarded $240,000 to promote the good works of a pair of rich Serbian brothers who were barred from entering the United States because of their relationship with accused mass murderer Slobodan Milosevic. Curt Weldon was one of their leading proponents in Congress.

- After Solutions North America won a $20,000 a month contract with a Russian aerospace manufacturer (plus 10 percent of any new business it generated), the congressman began trying to drum up interest in the technology with the U.S. Navy. The finder's fee provision of the contract was later declared illegal.

Rep. Weldon insists that he turned over the entire matter to the House Ethics Committee, which found no cause of action. But the notoriously weak-kneed committee has declined to publicly confirm that account, and Weldon has declined to release any records supporting his claim.

The story was embraced by a left-leaning government watchdog group called Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), which called Weldon's actions "possibly criminal" and asked the U.S. Justice Department two years ago to investigate. Until this weekend, there was no indication that the feds were complying with that request.

That hasn't stopped Weldon from claiming that politics is behind the investigation - and the fact that it became public three weeks before the toughest election day in his career. Still, there is no indication that his Democrat opponent, retired Navy Adm. Joe Sestak, or his allies have anything to do with the probe, or the leak about its existence.

One might point at the fact that the Justice Department has been controlled by the Republican Party for the last six years to refute Weldon's protestations of partisanship. But in reality, investigations of sitting members of Congress are kept out of the hands of political appointees in Washington and are handled by by-the-book public corruption professionals. Those folks don't play around.

In all likelihood, Monday's search warrants were executed because word of the probe had leaked over the weekend. Agents usually act in cases like this to preserve evidence that could potentially be destroyed. Cartons of documents were removed from the target sites Monday, and no one who knows what the FBI has is talking.

In all, the situation is eerily reminiscent of developments during the 2003 re-election campaign of Philadelphia Mayor John Street. An FBI bug was found in the ceiling of his office weeks before the mayor faced a strong challenge from Republican Sam Katz. Street and his allies - citing the Republicans in charge of the Justice Department - cried politics and won re-election handily. It probably helped that Street was a Democrat.

So, the question remains: Is Curt Weldon a crook? The bottom line is, nobody knows. And, unfortunately, voters will have to make their decision on Nov. 7 before any firm determination can be made.

Doolittle's Lawyers Talking To Justice Department (SACBEE)

By David Whitney, Bee Washington Bureau

The Sacramento Bee, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - Rep. John Doolittle acknowledged Monday that his lawyer, whom he has paid more than $38,000 in the last two months, is talking with the Justice Department about the congressman's relationship with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The Washington Post and other papers, citing unnamed sources, have said the Roseville Republican and Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., are under investigation in the Abramoff matter.

Doolittle's office in a statement late Monday, again insisted that the congressman is not under investigation.

Instead, it characterized the meetings as an effort to clear the congressman's name.

"The congressman's attorney has had several conversations with the Justice Department which we believe have been helpful toward clearing the congressman's name," said Laura Blackann.

"The congressman's attorney has committed to the Justice Department that in order to preserve the integrity of the ongoing investigation, details of their interactions will remain private," she said. "To date, the congressman has not been contacted or questioned by the Justice Department and has no reason to believe that he is the target of an investigation."

Blackann said Doolittle "instructed his attorney to establish contact with the Justice Department to further express the congressman's willingness to be helpful and satisfy the Justice Department that the congressman has done nothing wrong."

The new disclosures have added fuel to the campaign of Democratic challenger Charlie Brown, who has tried to tie Doolittle to the "culture of corruption" in Washington, D.C., arising from the Abramoff scandal and the bribery conviction of Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-San Diego.

For a complete story, see Tuesday's Bee. About the writer:

The Bee's David Whitney can be reached at (202) 383-0004 or dwhitney@mcclatchydc.com.

Doolittle Paid Lawyer To Talk To Agency (AP-Y)

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

Republican Rep. John Doolittle of California paid an attorney more than $38,000 in recent months to talk to the Justice Department in connection with the Jack Abramoff lobbying investigation, new campaign finance reports show.

DOJ_NMG_0082306

A spokeswoman said the money was spent after Doolittle asked his attorney, David Barger, to contact the Justice Department "to further express the congressman's willingness to be helpful and satisfy the Justice Department that the congressman has done nothing wrong."

In a statement, spokeswoman Laura Blackann said Doolittle has not been contacted by prosecutors in the ongoing congressional corruption probe stemming from the conviction of GOP lobbyist Abramoff. Doolittle "has no reason to believe that he is the target of an investigation," she said.

The payments to Barger's Virginia law firm, Williams Mullen, show up in Doolittle's third-quarter Federal Election Commission fundraising report, filed Sunday.

Doolittle, a conservative eight-term incumbent and member of the House GOP leadership, has numerous ties to Abramoff, whom he has described as a good friend. Doolittle accepted campaign cash from Abramoff, helped his tribal clients in dealings with the Interior Department, and helped the lobbyist win a contract from the Northern Mariana Islands by endorsing a sympathetic island politician.

Doolittle's wife, Julie Doolittle, was paid a retainer by Abramoff for event planning work from 2002 to 2004.

The ties between Doolittle and Abramoff have caught the interest of government prosecutors, The Associated Press has reported. More than two years ago Julie Doolittle was subpoenaed for documents in connection with the probe.

Doolittle has denied any wrongdoing and refused to get rid of the $14,000 in campaign donations he got from Abramoff, who is cooperating with the government.

Nonetheless in January, shortly after Abramoff pleaded guilty to wire fraud and tax evasion, Doolittle hired Barger to advise him in the matter. At the time Barger was paid a $10,000 retainer, and earlier this year Doolittle reported paying his firm an additional $1,274.

The new campaign finance report, covering July 1-Sept. 30, shows four separate payments to Williams Mullen totaling $38,378.48. They are labeled only "legal fees."

In her statement Blackann noted that Doolittle wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales earlier this year offering his cooperation. Subsequently he asked Barger to contact the department.

"The congressman's attorney has had several conversations with the Justice Department which we believe have been helpful toward clearing the congressman's name," Blackann's statement said. She said the parties have agreed to keep the talks confidential.

The campaign finance report also shows Doolittle paying $13,000 in legal fees to a second law firm, Wiley Rein & Fielding LLP, that he has used regularly for years.

Doolittle is favored to win re-election in his heavily Republican northern California district, but is facing a spirited challenge from Democrat Charlie Brown, a retired Air Force lieutenant colonel who has sought to make an issue of Doolittle's ties to Abramoff.

Doolittle has also generated controversy by paying his wife for fundraising. He pays her a 15 percent commission on each sum she raises, rather than the flat fee recommended by some industry professionals. He reported paying her $6,200 in the most recent quarter.

Five Years After Killing Of Prosecutor, A Stumped FBI Asks The Public For Help (WP)

By Blaine Harden, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

SEATTLE -- Alone in the basement of his house and sitting in front his computer monitor, Thomas C. Wales was shot to death here five years ago. An assistant U.S. attorney, he specialized in prosecuting white-collar crime and was an ardent advocate of gun control.

The shooter stood in Wales's back yard at 10:40 p.m., fired several times through a window and disappeared. It may have been the first time in U.S. history that a federal prosecutor was killed in the line of duty.

Thomas C. Wales was an assistant U.S. attorney. (Courtesy Of The Thomas C. Wales Foundation - Courtesy Of The Thomas C. Wales Foundation)

But after interviewing more than 4,000 people in all 50 states and half a dozen countries, after chasing down about 1,800 silver gun barrels of a kind that ballistics experts say was affixed to the shooter's pistol and after abruptly transferring control of the investigation out of the Seattle office of the FBI, law enforcement officials still cannot say for certain whether Wales was killed because he was a prosecutor.

Instead, to mark the fifth anniversary of the crime, an FBI task force leader insisted last week that the case has not gone cold, and authorities released for the first time a composite sketch of a "person of some interest" who was seen wandering around Wales's neighborhood on Seattle's Queen Anne Hill before the killing.

DOJ_NMG_0082307

For reasons not explained, the existence of the wandering stranger -- whose presence had been reported to police weeks before the Oct. 11, 2001, killing -- did not find its way to the FBI task force until about three years after Wales was shot.

Having failed over the past few years to find that man while keeping the hunt quiet, the FBI recently handed out a two-year-old sketch and asked for the public's help in finding a slim white man in his early 40s with black hair, tobacco-stained teeth and perhaps a ponytail.

The bureau also asked for help in finding a person who mailed a curiously literate letter this January from Las Vegas. Using crisp, crime-novel prose that echoes the smart-guy style of Elmore Leonard, the writer confessed to killing Wales in a murder-for-hire deal.

"OK, so I was broke and between jobs," the letter begins. "I got an anonymous call offering [dollar figure redacted by the FBI] to shoot the guy, so I drove to Seattle to do the job."

An FBI behavioral analyst said that while the murder scenario described in the letter was "made up," the writer is "relatively well-educated and well-read" and could be the killer or could know him.

Finally, the FBI asked for help in tracking down about 1,800 more silver pistol barrels of the kind that was screwed into the Makarov pistol used to shoot Wales. The bureau says that about 3,600 of the barrels are known to have been sold in the United States, but it has found only about half of them.

"We will not give up," Robert Jordan, special agent in charge of the FBI office in Portland, Ore., said at a news conference in the federal courthouse in downtown Seattle.

Jordan stressed, using the same words twice, that the Wales case "remains a very significant investigation."

That emphasis comes on the heels of what appears to have been a manpower dispute in the inquiry. In May, an FBI supervisor in Seattle reduced by two the number of agents assigned to the case. In June, after reports of squabbling inside the bureau, the case was shifted to the FBI's Portland office and beefed up with more investigators.

An important thread -- one that investigators declined to talk about last week -- is the nearly five-year-old inquiry into the activities of a Seattle-based commercial airline pilot who has been described in local newspapers as the prime suspect.

Thomas C. Wales was an assistant U.S. attorney. (Courtesy Of The Thomas C. Wales Foundation - Courtesy Of The Thomas C. Wales Foundation)

In an apparently preemptive media offensive that was published in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer on the morning of the FBI news conference, the pilot -- whose name has not been made public because he has not been charged -- complained through his attorney about the aggressive behavior of law enforcement authorities.

"This is Richard Jewell all over again," Larry Setchell, the lawyer, told the newspaper, alluding to the man who was falsely accused of the bombing at the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta.

Setchell declined to comment, except to confirm the accuracy of the details concerning his client that were published in the Seattle newspaper.

The most curious of those details is the presence of the pilot in Las Vegas in January when the murder-for-hire letter was mailed.

Setchell said that the pilot was there by coincidence, on a layover, and that he plans to turn over handwriting samples to the FBI in the coming week to show that he did not write the letter.

Since the killing, the pilot's home reportedly has been searched three times, and federal agents have seized his cars and many of his belongings. US Airways reportedly grounded the pilot for several weeks after it was notified that he was a subject of interest in the inquiry.

Early in 2001, before the killing, the pilot was one of several people Wales investigated in connection with illegally modifying a surplus military helicopter for civilian use. The charges were dropped, but only after the pilot spent more than $100,000 in legal fees, Setchell told the Post-Intelligencer.

Setchell said that the pilot felt "profound frustration" over the investigation but that he did not blame Wales.

Asked at the news conference about the status of the investigation against the pilot, the FBI's Jordan said only: "When the investigation reaches the point where we have probable cause to arrest someone, we speak with an indictment."

Betonsports, Prosecutors Strike Tentative Deal, Lawyers Say (BLOOM)

By Andrew Harris And Benjamin Israel

Bloomberg, October 17, 2006

Oct. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Betonsports Plc., the British Internet bookmaker indicted in the U.S. for illegal gambling, has reached a preliminary deal with prosecutors to end a civil suit seeking to ban the company from doing business in the U.S.

U.S. District Judge Carol Jackson in St. Louis granted the parties one week to complete what Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Fagan said was a 21-page accord resolving a civil suit filed against the company in July by the Justice Department.

``My impression is there are no substantive disagreements," Fagan told Jackson today. A temporary order barring Betonsports from doing business in the U.S. has been in place since July 17. Neither side disclosed terms of the preliminary agreement in court.

On July 17, prosecutors also unsealed a 22-count indictment charging Betonsports founder Gary Kaplan, former Chief Executive Officer David Carruthers and nine others with racketeering and violating federal interstate gambling laws. In 2003, the company's Web site, Betonsports.com, had 100,000 active players who placed 33 million wagers worth more than $1.6 billion, the U.S. has said.

Carruthers, 48, was arrested in July as he changed planes at a Texas airport. He pleaded not guilty and is currently under house arrest in St. Louis. Kaplan is still at large. Six other defendants have pleaded innocent.

Banning Payments

President George W. Bush on Friday signed legislation making it illegal for credit card companies to collect payments for transactions with online gambling sites. Gambling on the Internet has become a $12 billion-a-year business that's growing rapidly offshore.

Betonsports attorney Jeffrey Demerath told Jackson today that difficulty in assembling the company's board of directors for a review of the proposal was the primary obstacle to completing the accord.

``We received it Thursday afternoon," Demerath told the judge. ``We just haven't had the time to get everyone together."

Outside the courtroom, Demerath declined to comment on the status of the criminal case against Betonsports. He doesn't represent the individual defendants.

The civil case is U.S. v. Betonsports Plc., 06cv1064, in the Eastern District of Missouri (St. Louis).

Former FDA Head Is Charged Over Stock Holdings (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

The former head of the Food and Drug Administration will plead guilty to two misdemeanors for failing to properly disclose stock ownership and violating conflict-of-interest rules while he was at the agency.

Lester Crawford, who resigned in September 2005, two months after the Senate confirmed him as commissioner, was charged by the Justice Department with failing to fully reveal in government disclosure forms holdings in companies regulated by the FDA. The U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia filed the charges yesterday.

While Dr. Crawford no longer works in government, the situation may spark broader questions about procedures for vetting stock options and shares held by high-ranking officials. The matter also arises at a time when the FDA faces heightened scrutiny from Congress.

The companies named in the charges -- shares of which were owned by Dr. Crawford and/or his wife during years when he served at a high level in the FDA -- include soft-drink and snacks company PepsiCo Inc.; Kimberly-Clark Corp., which sells some medical devices; Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and food distributor Sysco Corp. Dr. Crawford also held stock options in Embrex Inc., an agricultural biotechnology company on whose board he once served. He exercised some of the options while at the FDA, the Justice Department said.

The Justice Department also charged Dr. Crawford with conflict of interest, because he chaired an FDA working group on obesity issues while he owned shares in PepsiCo and Sysco, companies which had business that could be affected by the panel's findings.

While Dr. Crawford served on the working group, he and his wife owned 1,400 shares of PepsiCo, with a value of at least $62,000, and 2,500 shares of Sysco, with a value of at least $78,000, according to the Justice Department. The panel's work included recommending that manufacturers change food labels to more accurately reflect actual serving sizes.

Barbara Van Gelder, Dr. Crawford's attorney, said he plans to plead guilty to two misdemeanors. One stems from the omissions in his financial-disclosure forms, the other from the conflict-of-interest charge.

The penalty will be decided by a judge, but Ms. Van Gelder said fines and probation are typical in such situations. The issues stemmed from confusion and mistakes and weren't deliberate, she said. "At certain times of his career at the FDA, there were omissions that were inadvertent," she said. "He will take responsibility for the omissions." She said Dr. Crawford cooperated with the Justice Department.

A spokeswoman for the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services, which is also investigating the circumstances of Dr. Crawford's resignation, declined to comment on its status. Spokeswomen for the FDA and HHS also declined to comment. Dr. Crawford didn't return a call.

Lawmakers will debate the FDA's handling of drug safety and other issues next year, when agency-funding legislation goes before Congress. Democrats may use the Crawford incident to gain political traction for arguments that Republicans have been too sympathetic to the industry. New York Democratic Rep. Maurice Hinchey said the Crawford matter underscores that the FDA is "in need of a serious overhaul." The agency has said it is reviewing a recent report that criticized its handling of drug safety and has already made some changes.

Write to Anna Wilde Mathews at anna.mathews@wsj.com1

Former F.D.A. Chief Is Charged With Conflict (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

Lester M. Crawford, former chief of the Food and Drug Administration, was charged yesterday with conflict of interest and lying about stock he and his wife owned in companies the agency regulates.

Dr. Crawford, who resigned abruptly in September 2005, just two months after his nomination had been approved by the Senate, is expected to plead guilty in federal court in Washington today, said his lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder.

Each of the two charges filed against Dr. Crawford, 68, is a misdemeanor punishable by up to a year in jail, but Ms. Van Gelder said she expected him to be fined and placed on probation.

"It's his responsibility," she said, "and he accepts it."

Senior employees of the food and drug agency are prohibited from owning shares in companies the agency regulates, and when Dr. Crawford became a deputy commissioner in 2002, the government's charging document says, ethics officials at the Department of Health and Human Services told him that he and his wife would have to sell stock in a dozen regulated companies. Those companies included several large pharmaceutical and medical device concerns, among them Johnson & Johnson, Merck, Pfizer, Medtronic and Boston Scientific.

Dr. Crawford and his wife, Catherine, sold their holdings in nine companies, the government says, but retained shares in three others: the food giants Sysco and Pepsico, and Kimberly-Clark, a maker of consumer health care and other products.

In addition, it says, Mrs. Crawford held shares in another regulated company, Wal-Mart, but her husband did not list those holdings in his 2002 financial disclosure.

Prosecutors also say that Dr. Crawford, a veterinarian and pharmacologist, owned options to buy 41,500 shares in Embrex, an F.D.A.-regulated poultry biotechnology company where he formerly served as a director. He exercised some of those options in 2003 and 2004, earning $8,150 in one transaction and $20,627 in another. He correctly reported those transaction on his federal tax returns but did not list them in disclosure filings at the time or disclose the remaining, unexecuted options he held in the company, the charges say.

The government noted that during a period when the Crawfords held shares in Pepsico, a soft drink and snack food company, he was chairman of an F.D.A. Obesity Working Group that among other tasks was reviewing calorie content labeling for soft drinks. At the time, prosecutors said, the couple held 1,400 shares of Pepsico worth at least $62,000, as well as 2,500 shares of Sysco, which specializes in supplying food to restaurants and institutions, worth at least $78,000.

When Dr. Crawford became acting commissioner of the agency in 2004, reviewers at the Department of Health and Human Services, the F.D.A.'s parent, again raised questions about his ownership of Sysco and Kimberly-Clark shares. Responding to that query, he wrote in an e-mail message to an ethics official at the department that "Sysco and Kimberly-Clark have in fact been sold."

"In truth and in fact, as Crawford then knew, Crawford and/or his wife held shares" in both Sysco and Kimberly-Clark "throughout 2003 and 2004," according to the charging document.

Dr. Crawford, now a senior staff member at the Washington lobbying and communications firm Policy Directions, could not be reached for comment. But his lawyer, Ms. Van Gelder, said the fact that the charges were misdemeanors reflected Dr. Crawford's having amended his financial forms after his departure, making a full disclosure.

"One of the things I hope comes out is that he sold the Mercks and the pharmaceuticals," Ms. Van Gelder said. "The Syscos and Kimberly-Clark, one wouldn't ordinarily think, 'I've got to divest myself.' You wouldn't think Wal-Mart is in the same boat as Merck."

Dr. Crawford's rocky 18-month tenure as acting commissioner and then commissioner was marked by a series of controversies, including the withdrawal of the painkiller Vioxx from the market and an internal battle over whether the agency would approve the emergency contraceptive Plan B for over-the-counter sale.

Though his sudden resignation last fall so soon after his confirmation appeared unusual, he offered no detailed explanation. The office of Daniel R. Levinson, inspector general of Health and Human Services, told Congress, however, that it was investigating the circumstances of the commissioner's departure.

Records obtained through the Freedom of Information Act several weeks later revealed that the department's ethics office had questioned Dr. Crawford's broker in August 2005, the month before he quit.

DOJ_NMG_0082310

A spokesman for Sysco said yesterday that the company had not been aware that Dr. Crawford was a shareholder.

"We were totally unaware of it, and we really didn't have any real regulatory matters before the agency beyond routine matters," said the spokesman, John M. Palizza.

A spokesman for Pepsico said compliance with government regulations concerning conflict of interest was clearly an individual responsibility. He referred additional questions to Dr. Crawford.

Former FDA Chief Illegally Held Stocks (WP)

By Marc Kaufman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Lester M. Crawford, who resigned mysteriously last fall just two months after being confirmed as commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, will plead guilty today to charges that he hid his ownership of stock in food and drug companies that his agency regulated, his lawyer said.

The Justice Department charged Crawford yesterday with two misdemeanors for withholding the financial information, which included his ownership of shares in food and drink manufacturers Pepsico Inc. and Sysco Corp. and the drug company Embrex Inc.

The complaint, called a criminal "information," accused Crawford, who held numerous senior FDA and Agriculture Department jobs in his many years in government, of conflict of interest and filing false financial disclosure reports.

Barbara Van Gelder, Crawford's lawyer, said he "is going to plead guilty to two misdemeanors tomorrow afternoon, and he is going to admit his financial disclosures had errors and omissions, mostly with his wife's continued ownership of stocks," the Associated Press reported. "At the end of the day, he owned these stocks, and he will admit he owned them while he was at the FDA, and he will take responsibility for that."

Crawford failed to disclose $28,000 he gained from stock options in Embrex, an agriculture biotechnology company, the complaint said. Crawford was a member of Embrex's board of directors from 1992 to 2002.

The Justice Department document said a government ethics official told Crawford in 2002 that he had to sell shares the couple owned in 12 companies considered to be "significantly regulated organizations" -- companies that regularly had business before the FDA.

The prosecutors wrote that the Crawfords sold many of their shares but kept ownership in three companies. When asked in 2004 about two of them, Crawford replied in a December e-mail that "Sysco and Kimberly-Clark have in fact been sold." Actually, the court papers state, Crawford knew that he or his wife still held shares in both companies.

Crawford chaired the FDA's Obesity Working Group, which made recommendations affecting food and soft drink makers, at a time when he and his wife owned stock in Pepsico and Sysco, the court papers said.

The complaint said Crawford made some of his false statements on yearly financial disclosure forms and others on his financial disclosure statement to the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee -- which was considering his nomination to become permanent FDA commissioner.

Crawford's short tenure as commissioner was best known for his August 2005 decision to postpone action on the "morning after" contraceptive Plan B. He had earlier told the Senate that the agency would act on the application, and Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) allowed a vote on his nomination as a result.

Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey (D-N.Y.), who helped initiate an investigation into Crawford's departure by the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services, said that further digging into Crawford's finances should and will continue.

"By blatantly ignoring the law on financial holdings and conflicts of interest, Lester Crawford used his position as the head of the FDA to send all the wrong signals to other FDA employees and the American public," Hinchey said in a statement.

Crawford, trained as a veterinarian and pharmacologist, had previously served as deputy FDA commissioner and acting commissioner. The agency, which regulates almost one-quarter of the U.S. economy, has had a confirmed commissioner for less than two years since the Bush administration came into office.

McLaughlin To Face Corruption Charges (WNBC)

WNBC-TV, October 17, 2006

Assemblyman Expected To Surrender Tuesday

NEW YORK -- Corruption charges were expected to be filed against a top Queens political leader.

NewsChannel 4's Jonathan Dienst reported that Queens assemblyman Brian McLaughlin is expected in federal court on Tuesday. The expected corruption charges relate to McLaughlin's work as one of the city's power brokers -- his years as an elected leader and also as one of the city's top union leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0082311

The charges could cap a multi-year corruption investigation by the city's Department of Investigation, the FBI and Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office. Sources said McLaughlin is expected to surrender in the morning, and federal prosecutors are expected to announce corruption charges against him.

McLaughlin has denied any wrongdoing, NewsChannel 4 reported. McLaughlin, a longtime Democratic assemblyman, has announced that he would not be seeking another term.

In March, Department of Investigation detectives and FBI agents raided McLaughlin's district office in Queens, and they also seized documents from the West 16th Street offices of the Central Labor Council. Soon after the raids, McLaughlin resigned as the head of the umbrella union organization.

Investigators had been focusing as to whether McLaughlin was helping certain street lighting companies in a possible bid-rigging scheme. Investigators wanted to know whether he asked for cash and/or gifts from individuals or companies. There were also questions raised about expenses he submitted as an assemblyman, and how he was able to pay for a vacation home on Long Island's north shore.

Labor Leader Is Expected To Face U.S. Corruption Charges (NYT)

By Andy Newman And William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

The union leader Brian M. McLaughlin, the head of the country's largest municipal labor council and a powerful force in New York City politics for more than a decade, is expected to surrender on federal corruption charges today, two law enforcement officials said last night.

Mr. McLaughlin, 54, the president of the New York City Central Labor Council and a seven-term Democratic state assemblyman from Queens, has been under investigation in a possible scheme to rig bids on multimillion-dollar city contracts for streetlights, officials have said.

Investigators were also looking at whether he received improper payments from electrical contractors.

Details of the charges were unavailable last night, but an official, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing, said that they would be announced at a news conference today.

Neither Mr. McLaughlin nor his lawyer could be reached by phone last night. Mr. McLaughlin has consistently denied wrongdoing.

The official said that Mr. McLaughlin would probably be the only person charged today but that the investigation, by the F.B.I., the federal Labor Department, the city's Department of Investigation and the United States attorney's office in Manhattan, was continuing.

A spokesman for the F.B.I. and a spokeswoman for the United States attorney in Manhattan declined to comment last night.

Mr. McLaughlin's group, which represents a million workers in 400 union locals, has been a prominent supporter of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, lending its weight both to Mr. Bloomberg's re-election bid last year and to the mayor's ill-fated plan for a football stadium on the West Side of Manhattan.

The F.B.I. raided Mr. McLaughlin's union office in March, as well as his Assembly district office in Flushing. In August, Mr. McLaughlin went on paid leave from his union post, which he has held for 10 years. Although he had publicly entertained the notion of running for mayor himself not long ago, he announced in January that he would not run for re-election to the Assembly this year, in order to devote more time to the labor movement. Mr. McLaughlin, a former electrician, was also the longtime director of the street lamps division of the city's main union of electrical workers.

In March, law enforcement officials said they were looking into whether Mr. McLaughlin played a role in a scheme in which contractors were thought to have divvied up the work of putting up traffic and street lights in the city. They also said that contractors may have given Mr. McLaughlin use of an American Express card.

The city's streetlight contracts were bid on every three years, and each year the same companies won the contracts, law enforcement officials have said.

One firm alone, Petrocelli Electric Company, has been awarded more than $90 million of the $150 million the city has paid for new lights since 1999. Investigators have also raided Petrocelli's headquarters.

A spokesman for Petrocelli Electric said in March that the company's lawyers had been told by officials at the United States attorney's office that neither the company or any of its officers or employees were under criminal investigation.

A telephone message seeking comment left with the company's answering service late last night was not returned.

The inquiry into the streetlight contracts goes back to at least 2001, law enforcement officials have said.

After Mr. McLaughlin's offices were raided in March, city officials acknowledged that Mr. Bloomberg knew Mr. McLaughlin was a target of an investigation even before the mayor accepted the labor council's support, but said that he did not know the details of the investigation.

Mr. McLaughlin worked intensely with officials from more than a dozen unions to line up the council's endorsement of Mr. Bloomberg.

A spokesman for Mr. Bloomberg declined to comment last night on Mr. McLaughlin.

For years, Mr. McLaughlin led the annual Labor Day Parade and led the union campaign — successful so far — to keep Wal-Mart out of New York City.

He has been courted by business leaders, bishops and real estate developers and was a major figure in last year's transit strike. Labor leaders said he restored the Central Labor Council's influence and prestige after years of decline.

Murdered Teen's Family Wants FBI Probe (LCJ)

By Jim Adams

Louisville Courier-Journal, October 17, 2006

The father of Jessica Melissa Currin, an 18-year-old Mayfield woman murdered in the Western Kentucky town in 2000, rallied with about 15 supporters at noon Monday in downtown Louisville to call for the FBI to investigate her unsolved killing.

The group, joined by the Rev. Louis Coleman, stood in a cold rain for more than an hour — first outside the Gene Snyder U.S. Courthouse at Sixth Street and Broadway, and then the nearby Romano Mazzoli Federal Building, 600 Martin Luther King Jr. Place – carrying signs demanding "Justice for Jessica."

Joe Currin, the father of the young woman, also was joined by Alton McDonald, of Tacoma, Wash., a representative of the Rev. Al Sharpton's National Action Network.

The murder was the subject of a story in Sunday's Courier-Journal, which catalogued mistakes police have made in the investigation.

Jessica Currin had been dead for about 48 hours when her body — strangled, beaten, stabbed and burned — was found on Aug. 1, 2000, on the back lawn of Mayfield Middle School.

The investigation for its first three years was headed by the Mayfield Police Department, but the Mayfield department's mishandling of evidence caused the dismissal of criminal charges against three people in 2003. The Mayfield department then turned the case over to Kentucky State Police.

The office of the Kentucky attorney general has recently taken over the role of prosecutor in the case, and is assisting state police in investigating the murder.

McDonald Monday delivered a letter to the FBI offices in Louisville yesterday which alleged that Mayfield police "intentionally and deliberately mishandled Jessica's murder, tampered with evidence and conspired to cover up her murder." McDonald also said at the rally that he believes the murder was a hate crime.

A spokesman for the FBI office in Louisville was not immediately available to respond to McDonald's letter.

Joe Currin said at the rally, "As long as I am alive and as long as I'm healthy enough, I will continue until we get justice."

Pellicano Resists Effort To Delay Trial (LAT)

By Chuck Philips And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

The private eye, accused of racketeering and wiretapping, refuses to join prosecutors and five co-defendants in waiting until next September.

The long-awaited racketeering and wiretapping trial of indicted Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano and six others is likely to be postponed again for months if federal prosecutors and defense attorneys can scale one significant hurdle: Pellicano.

Though attorneys for the government and five of Pellicano's co-defendants have agreed to delay the trial date until September 2007, Pellicano has so far resisted, eager to move forward with the case after spending years behind bars.

"Either take me to trial or let me out," Pellicano said in a telephone interview Saturday from the Metropolitan Detention Center in downtown Los Angeles.

If U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer agrees with Pellicano, the central figure in the case, the trial would continue as scheduled in February or perhaps on a date far short of the one-year delay now agreed to by the government and all but one other defendant.

The proposed delay was outlined in a stipulation jointly filed by prosecutors and defense attorneys Monday, the deadline for filing substantive pretrial motions in the case. The deadline was set in anticipation of a trial beginning Feb. 13.

DOJ_NMG_0082313

According to the stipulation, the delay was necessary for defense attorneys to review the voluminous evidence, including 150,000 pages of documents and 443 recorded conversations, already turned over in the case.

"Counsel for defendants and for the government have … determined that the length of the requested continuance is necessary to accommodate for conflicts in counsel's schedules and to permit defense counsel to complete their necessary trial preparation," the stipulation reads.

The agreement was signed by attorneys for all of the defendants except Pellicano and Daniel Nicherie, who is representing himself, and, like Pellicano, remains in custody. Neither Nicherie nor anyone assisting in his defense could be reached for comment.

In response to Monday's stipulation, Pellicano's attorney, Steven Gruel, filed court papers asking that his client's case move forward without the other defendants because Pellicano was "ready for trial" and was entitled to a speedy resolution of the charges against him.

"Here, a one-year delay from the stipulation date to the proposed trial date renders it unreasonable," Gruel wrote.

He said the delay was particularly unreasonable because the government has opposed releasing Pellicano on bail pending trial.

Pellicano, 61, has been locked up without bail since his indictment in February. His incarceration came as he was about to complete a 30-month sentence at a federal prison in Bakersfield after pleading guilty to charges of storing hand grenades and plastic explosives in his Sunset Strip offices.

Fischer has repeatedly made it clear that she wants the high-profile case to move forward as quickly as possible. But she has acknowledged that the case's complexity will dictate how fast the trial can proceed and whether delays are warranted in the interest of justice.

Under federal law, defendants have a right to trial within 70 days of their arraignment, though exceptions can be made in cases that are particularly complex with multiple defendants, complicated evidence or other factors. Pellicano and all six co-defendants have previously waived their rights to speedy trial.

Since their indictment early this year, Pellicano and his co-defendants have maintained that they are innocent of the grand jury charges that they used wiretaps and confidential police records to give the private eye's clients the upper hand in lawsuits and business disputes.

Pellicano has been particularly dismissive of the government's allegations, repeatedly denying that the FBI and U.S. attorney's office have any real evidence that he broke the law.

"These prosecutors have been working on this investigation for four years now and have come up with nothing," Pellicano said in a recent interview.

Pellicano said authorities approached him again during the summer to discuss a possible plea bargain. But, he said, he rejected their offer as he has numerous times before.

"Why do they keep coming to me and asking me to settle?" he asked, rhetorically. "I'll tell you why: Because I'm innocent. And I'm ready for my day in court."

Assistant U.S. Atty. Daniel Saunders declined to comment about Pellicano's remarks, as did Gruel, Pellicano's attorney.

*

chuck.philips@latimes.com
greg.krikorian@latimes.com

Coin Dealer Trial Begins In Ohio Scandal (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Seewer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

(AP) - TOLEDO, Ohio-Less than a month before Election Day, a politically connected coin dealer accused of embezzling from a state investment in rare coins went on trial Monday in a scandal that has rocked Ohio's Republican Party.

Tom Noe, 52, is accused of stealing more than $2 million from a fund for injured workers and spending it on his business and renovating his home in the Florida Keys.

"He needed money. He needed it desperately," prosecutor John Weglian said in opening statements.

Noe, once a member of state boards that oversee the Ohio Turnpike and Ohio's public universities, was a top GOP fundraiser who gave more than $105,000 to Republicans, including President Bush and Gov. Bob Taft during the 2004 campaign.

He is charged with corrupt activity, theft, money laundering and forgery. If convicted, he could get up to 10 years in prison on the corrupt activity charge alone.

Defense attorney William Wilkinson said Noe's contract with the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation allowed him to borrow money from the investment fund or loan it to others.

"You can't steal something from the owner of property if they give you permission to use it," Wilkinson said.

Federal prosecutors have not said whether any of the coin money was used for political contributions. If the state money had been funneled to campaigns, authorities could have sought a stiffer penalty.

The scandal has raised Democrats' hopes of retaking the governor's office from the GOP, which has dominated the state since 1990. Democratic Rep. Ted Strickland has held a double-digit lead in the polls over Republican nominee Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state.

The state invested $50 million with Noe from 1998 to 2001, but Weglian said he spent only a fraction of that figure on coins.

Prosecutors said Noe kept two sets of financial records - one for the workers' comp agency and one for his own business. When state officials wanted to check on the status of the coins Noe told them he had bought, he created false documents and borrowed coins from other dealers to trick investigators, Weglian said.

"If Tom Noe wasn't a thief, he wouldn't have had two sets of books," Weglian said.

Wilkinson said the workers' comp agency gave Noe wide authority to manage the investment and that he spent millions buying other collectibles such as historical documents and rare paintings. He also said the workers' comp fund will end up showing a profit because of Noe's investments in collectibles.

In a different case, Noe pleaded guilty earlier this year to funneling $45,000 to Bush's re-election campaign and was sentenced last month to more than two years in federal prison. He will not begin that sentence until after the state charges are resolved.

Investigations into the coin investments led to separate ethics charges against Gov. Bob Taft, who pleaded no contest last year to failing to report golf outings and other gifts.

The trial is expected to last at least six weeks, through the Nov. 7 election.

Ralphs To Pay $70 Million, In Strike Settlement (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

A federal judge today approved the Ralphs grocery chain's guilty plea to criminal charges that it illegally rehired locked-out workers during the Southern California supermarket labor dispute almost three years ago.

Under the agreement, Ralphs will pay $20 million in fines and $50 million into a fund to reimburse workers and their union.

Ralphs also agreed to cooperate with the government in its ongoing investigation of the role corporate executives played in the scheme, which involved using fake names and Social Security numbers to hide the identities of workers illegally rehired during the dispute.

U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson said the company's pledge to cooperate was a key factor in his decision to approve the agreement. The government is investigating the actions of "a number of Ralphs employees," the judge said, and the plea deal doesn't restrict the government's probe.

Ralphs has agreed to waive attorney client privilege, giving investigators access to interviews and memos from the company's internal investigation of the scheme, Assistant U.S. Atty. Adam Braun said.

Braun declined to comment on how high up the company's chain of command the probe could lead.

According to the plea agreement, "Ralphs' vice president of human resources, at least one group vice president and a number of zone managers encouraged, condoned, permitted or directed the rehiring of locked-out employees under false names and Social Security numbers during the lockout."

A Ralphs spokesman declined to comment on the investigation.

The government has said that it won't prosecute rank-and-file workers who were illegally hired as long as they cooperate with investigators.

Anderson signed off on the plea bargain over the objections of a handful of Ralphs workers who appeared in court to protest that their employer was getting off too lightly.

"This plea agreement is neither fair nor equitable," said Michael Ward, a 20-year veteran of Ralphs and Alpha Beta. "They are being allowed to settle for dimes on the dollar."

Other employees spoke in favor of the agreement.

"Would I like more? Of course I would. Nothing's perfect," said Faye Gibson, a 30-year Ralphs employee. "It's a been a long time. We really need a sense of closure."

Anderson approved the appointment of a so-called special master to oversee the $50 million restitution fund. Most of the money from the fund will be paid to Ralphs employees who were locked out during the strike and applied for restitution.

DOJ_NMG_0082315

Union officials estimated that some workers could receive as much as $3,000 from the settlement.

Money from the fund will also be used to reimburse the grocery workers union, the United Food and Commercial Workers, for benefits paid to workers during the 4½-month dispute.

Although he approved the plea agreement, Anderson postponed formal sentencing until Nov. 1 while loose ends are tied up.

In addition to paying the fine and restitution, the deal calls for Ralphs to be placed on three years' probation and establish court-supervised training programs for its workers.

Ralphs agreed June 30 to plead guilty to five felony charges included in a 53-count grand jury indictment returned against the company in December.

Ralphs was charged with violating federal laws by secretly rehiring about 1,000 locked out workers during the dispute, which lasted from October 2003 until February 2004 and involved Ralphs and rival Southern California supermarket chains Vons and Albertsons.

Ralphs' parent company, Cincinnati-based Kroger Co., was not charged in the case.

In Shadows Of Net, War On Child Porn Rages (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, October 17, 2006

As pedophiles swarm the Internet, an unprecedented war against child pornography is intensifying.

Internet service providers such as AOL are using sophisticated technology to identify porn sites. Credit card companies are tracking purchases. More police detectives are posing as minors online.

"We have hit the tipping point," says Michelle Collins, director of the child exploitation unit at the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children. She says high-profile cases such as that of John Mark Karr, the former suspect in the JonBenét Ramsey slaying, have made the public realize that pornographic pictures of children are crime-scene photos. Karr was freed from a California jail this month after 5-year-old charges of possessing child porn were thrown out when police said that evidence had disappeared.

"There is a lot of unprecedented activity. It's just meeting the escalating problem," says Drew Oosterbaan, chief of the Justice Department's child exploitation section. In the past four months:

·President Bush signed a bill to increase the number of prosecutors, computer forensic examiners and federal-state task forces assigned to child porn. It tripled to $150,000 the maximum penalty for downloading child porn and allows adults photographed when they were kids to sue those who buy, sell or distribute the photos.

·The National Center for Missing & Exploited Children launched a victim identification lab to share pornographic photos — with graphic details obscured — with police agencies nationwide. The goal: Find victims by identifying background elements in a picture that will lead to the location of abuse.

·Five Internet service providers, criticized by such lawmakers as Democratic Rep. Bart Stupak of Michigan for not doing enough, announced they will build a database. The companies — AOL, Yahoo, Microsoft, Earthlink and United Online — will give each picture a signature and then scan their sites for matches.

·The national center has begun giving daily notices of every reported porn site to Internet service providers registered with its CyberTipline. If police are not investigating the site, a company can close it or block subscriber access.

·Credit card firms representing 87% of the U.S. market have formed a coalition to let police and the national center know about porn sites their customers use. The aim: End the profit by 2008 by making arrests and closing pornographers' accounts.

·Public service ads that teach kids and parents how to recognize a pedophile's online lures are being funded by, among others, the Justice Department and MySpace.com, a website popular with teens.

A study by the University of New Hampshire found that 34% of kids 10-17 saw unwanted sexual material online in the past year, up from 25% five years ago.

Despite all the activity, those on the front lines say they are losing the war against child pornography.

"The images are propagating faster than we can police. It's far worse than people realize," says Wyoming police investigator Flint Waters. He co-chairs the technology committee of the Internet Crimes Against Children program, a network of 46 regional task forces.

In the past 24 months, Waters says, the task forces have identified 6.5 million pornographic pictures of children online, up from 3,600 three years ago. Forty percent originated in the USA.

"We're constantly playing catch-up," says Waters, who has developed software that identifies the location of porn distributors. "The funding hasn't kept up with the problem. If you quadruple my funding, I still couldn't keep up."

DOJ_NMG_0082316

A key reason is that much child porn isn't about money but pedophilia, the sexual attraction to kids. Many images are traded free like baseball cards.

"It's an extension of child molestation — another sick feature," says inspector Jane Wilcox of the Toronto Sex Crimes Unit, which worked with the U.S. Justice Department to bust a porn ring in March that included a Sunday school teacher, a soccer referee, a mailman and a computer software engineer. In a chat room they used, a man broadcast a live video of himself molesting an 11-month-old baby.

Few victims report the abuse. Of more than 800 online child-porn victims identified by the national center, Collins says only about 30 blew the whistle. She says some are too young to describe what happened. Others are afraid. More than a third, 36%, were abused by a parent, 10% to 15% by another relative and 30% by other people they know. About 10% are enticed by strangers to post photos; 5% do it unasked.

Pedophiles can be treated but not cured, says Fred Berlin of the Johns Hopkins Sexual Disorders Clinic. He says many want treatment, but few get it in prison or after their release. Berlin says some child porn users don't realize they may be committing a federal offense that could send them to prison and require them to register as a sex offender. "The Internet blurs the distinction between reality and fantasy," he says.

The Internet's seeming anonymity lures otherwise law-abiding men to child porn, says Patrick Carnes, author of In the Shadows of the Net: Breaking Free of Compulsive Online Sexual Behavior. He calls the Internet the "crack cocaine" of sex addiction: "It moves people into areas they would not otherwise go."

Carnes says users may be emotionally immature. "At heart, they're still 14," he says. Online, he says, they find others who share their interests and, feeling validated, soon become heavy viewers.

More than 99% of those arrested for possessing child porn are men, according to a 2005 study funded by the Justice Department. Most, 83%, had images of prepubescent kids; 80% had pictures of sexual penetration.

Another reason online child porn is difficult to stop is that predators are adept at avoiding detection.

Police are "right to feel outgunned. It's not only a matter of resources but of skill," says Philip Jenkins, author of Beyond Tolerance: Child Pornography on the Internet. He says child pornographers started using the Internet in the early 1980s, a 20-year head start on police, and they know how to cover their cybertracks.

Some pedophiles use private Internet radio stations and chat groups to trade ideas on evading detection. If credit card companies close their accounts, some move to alternate online payment services.

They set up "modeling" sites featuring scantily clad young girls in seductive poses and contend that such sites are legal because they do not show genitalia, but people operating such sites have been prosecuted. Sheila Sellinger of Indiana pleaded guilty this year to selling pornographic images of a 10-year-old girl. She got an 11-year prison sentence.

Predators entice kids with gifts and compliments to post provocative pictures of themselves online.

"The seduction was slow. Each request only went a bit further than the last," Justin Berry, 19, told a congressional panel in April. When he was 13, he testified, men he met online asked him to film himself with his shirt off. He did so with his webcam, and they sent him money and gifts in the mail.

For five years, he ran a porn site viewed by more than a thousand men who paid him to strip naked, masturbate and have sex with female prostitutes on camera. At least two men have been charged, including Gregory Mitchell, who was sentenced in July to 150 years in prison.

Prosecution can be challenging. Sometimes evidence is lacking, because few Internet companies keep information on users' e-mail and website visits for long. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has asked companies to retain such data, but some have balked over questions of cost and customers' privacy.

Some pornographers use web-hosting or domain registry companies to set up sites. Unlike Internet service providers, they are not required to report porn to police. Some pornographers are based overseas. Most countries don't consider possessing child porn a crime, and 122 have no laws against distributing it online, according to the International Centre for Missing & Exploited Children in Alexandria, Va.

Organized crime is involved in some of those global operations, says Carlos Ortiz, a former assistant U.S. attorney in Newark who tracked down a Florida company called Connections USA that was processing $1 million a month in credit card purchases of child porn and sending the money to a company in Belarus. The investigation led to more than 1,200 arrests.

"I'm really worried. It's tough to find a technical fix," says investigator Waters, who is trying to refine his software so it can track an image's distribution.

Hours spent looking at disturbing images are "brutal," he says. To cheer him, his wife hung a photo in his office of a man dressed as Santa Claus holding their two kids. Shortly after the picture was taken, Waters discovered the man trying to lure teen girls online.

DOJ_NMG_0082317

"We're always faced with problems that are bigger than we can address," says Justice Department's Drew Oosterbaan. He says the department is trying to use existing resources more effectively. "Is it enough? Probably not."

Still, a growth in arrests provides hope, says David Finkelhor, director of the Crimes Against Children Research Center at the University of New Hampshire. "As more people get caught, others may get very nervous, and we may see a slowdown in traffic."

Business Group Wants More Money To Fight Intellectual Piracy (CONGDAILY)

By Bill Swindell, CongressDaily

CongressDaily, October 17, 2006

A business coalition is aiming to secure during the lame-duck session more federal funding to crack down on piracy of U.S. products and counterfeit goods.

The Coalition Against Counterfeiting and Piracy, which represents moviemakers, auto parts manufacturers and pharmaceutical companies, has waged a campaign to lobby for more funding to stem the flow of fake goods into the United States. However, in the aftermath of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, lawmakers have focused primarily on beefing up security against acts of terrorism.

"Obviously, we are competing against terrorism, and that is most important. I always say priorities one through 10 are always terrorism and homeland security. But I hope to think that intellectual property rights is a distant eleventh. It's extremely important," said Michael Zaneis, executive director for the technology and e-commerce department at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Zaneis noted that counterfeiting and piracy has a huge economic impact on business, resulting in $250 billion in sales losses each year.

Appropriators this year have responded to such pleas. The House fiscal 2007 Science-State-Justice Appropriations bill would provide for at least $13 million for intellectual property rights enforcement, with directions that the FBI increase the number of prosecutors and agents working such cases. The Senate version of the bill would provide $6 million for such efforts.

The Senate bill also would create a unit at FBI headquarters that would house at least five full-time agents to work those cases and two additional agents for each of the agency's 18 computer hacking and intellectual property units scattered across the country.

"We like the House language, but want to get the specificity of the Senate language to make sure the money is used for these exact purposes," Zaneis said.

The coalition also is advocating passage of legislation sponsored by Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and ranking member Max Baucus, D-Mont., that would overhaul the Bureau of Customs and Border Protection. The measure would create a new intellectual property rights division within the Homeland Security Department that would coordinate anti-piracy efforts throughout the country, for example, providing staff to help confirm whether seizures at such high-traffic areas as the ports of Newark and Long Beach, Calif., are indeed counterfeit items.

Lobbyists were unsuccessful in advocating inclusion of the provisions in the recently passed port security bill. "They are spread out to some extent. We need to get them where they need to be," Zaneis said.

Victims' Families Sentenced To Silence (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

Judge allows relatives of five who were killed to attend the trial only if they remain composed.

Day after day, the aging Ukrainian couple has stepped into a federal courtroom in downtown Los Angeles to endure a severe test of wills: listening to the details of their son Alexander's killing while containing their emotions.

They sit stoically in the front, Elisabeth Umansky with her jaw set and hands clasped, her husband Ruven with his head back, peering through his bifocals. When a key witness tells of pulling a rope tight around Alexander's neck and of a plastic bag being sucked into his nostrils, Elisabeth lets out a deep sigh, closes her eyes and folds forward. Ruven squeezes her shoulder.

But they stay put, taking in every detail as if to recover lost moments with their son.

The couple and five other relatives of the victims had to fight to win the right to attend the trial of the two men accused of kidnapping and murdering their son and four other Los Angeles business people.

Iouri Mikhel and Jurijus Kadamovas are accused of luring the five victims to their upscale San Fernando Valley homes in 2001 and 2002, holding them for ransom, killing them and dumping their bodies in a reservoir in the Sierra foothills. Prosecutors say the conspiracy was, in part, directed by organized crime figures in Russia. The defendants face the death penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0082318

Before the trial began Sept. 6, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian banned the victims' relatives from court, both because they might be called as witnesses later and because the presence of tearful and emotional relatives could prejudice the jury against the defendant.

The Umanskys and other relatives begged Tevrizian to reconsider. "We have been patient and cooperative, and the possibility of not attending this trial brings us inexplicable pain," they wrote in a letter. "Please allow us to ease a bit of suffering and have questions looming over us answered."

Prosecutors appealed the ruling and won, arguing that a 2004 congressional act gave victims and family members explicit rights to attend trials.

The issue is particularly relevant because last week, the U.S. Supreme Court took up a case that also involves courtroom expressions by a victim's relatives. The case stems from a 1995 murder conviction in San Jose, which was overturned by an appeals court because three relatives of the victim wore buttons with small photos of him in court.

In the Los Angeles case, Tevrizian has admonished family members to remain composed.

That became a particularly wrenching test in recent days as Ainar Altmanis took the stand and laid out a step-by-step account of the abductions and deaths. His testimony is expected to continue today.

Altmanis is the U.S. attorney's key witness in the trial, having admitted to taking part in the murder conspiracy. He entered into a plea agreement in 2002 to avoid the death sentence in exchange for life in prison. The defense is expected to attack his credibility and attempt to pin the murders on him alone.

As he spoke last week, the victims' families took in every word they could endure. They convulsed and squinted hard to hold back the tears. When it was too much to bear, they left the room and shuffled back in later. And they watched the man accused of masterminding all of this, Mikhel, 41, gaze around, sometimes at them, with arched eyebrows and an unreadable expression.

The Umanskys sat stone-faced through most of the testimony. Their son Alexander, 35, owned a car electronics business and, according to prosecutors, was lured to Kadamovas' home in Sherman Oaks in December 2001 with the prospect of installing high-end electronic equipment in Mikhel's Range Rover.

Holding a pistol with a silencer and a stun gun, they seized him the moment he came through the door, handcuffed him and tied his legs to a chair with flex ties, Altmanis testified. Eventually he was told to contact his family to get a ransom of $234,000. Over four days, Ruven and Elisabeth and their other son, Michael, collected money from relatives and managed to transfer it to an account in the United Arab Emirates. Then the calls just stopped.

They called the FBI, which eventually traced the money to the defendants, prosecutors alleged. But the Umanskys did not learn of Alexander's fate until his body was dredged from the frigid depths of the New Melones Reservoir three months later.

Now in court, they heard Altmanis' account of what happened: How terrified and pale Alexander was, and how he was killed even as the defendants promised to keep him alive to get the last payments.

"There was this voice of Mikhel so sharp and so fast like a thundercloud, telling Umansky to open his mouth," Altmanis said.

The Umanskys' faces tightened in agony, and Ruven put his arm around his wife. Mikhel's jaw muscles flexed as he stared at his onetime friend. Altmanis continued: Mikhel shoved plastic bags in his mouth and pulled another bag tight over his head, as Kadamovas held his nostrils shut. When that didn't work, he said, Mikhel and Altmanis wrapped a rope around his neck and pulled with all their might.

Even after all that, it looked as though Alexander was still breathing, Altmanis testified.

"Mikhel said, 'No, it happens sometimes. He still has air in his body.' So he kicked him and the air went out and the motion stopped."

Nancy Muscatel's husband met a similar fate in October 2001. Meyer Muscatel, a Sherman Oaks real estate developer, didn't come home from work one night, and for five months his wife had no idea what happened. Now, she said, she needed to hear the details of his final days.

"It's like needing to go through it with him," she said. "And be there in a way … so he wouldn't be alone."

According to prosecutors, he had been lured into captivity by the prospect of a real estate deal and spent two days tied to a chair at Mikhel's Encino home.

Altmanis said he often guarded Muscatel and at one point made himself a ham sandwich and offered one to his captive.

"He smelled it and asked what it was," Altmanis testified. "He said he didn't eat it because he ate only kosher."

In the second row, Nancy Muscatel's eyes welled up — with mingled pride and longing, she would say later — and she squeezed them closed.

Altmanis testified that Mikhel realized Muscatel didn't have much money, and they couldn't get to the money he did have. He was of no use anymore.

When Altmanis went back to the house the next morning, he testified, the defendants were strangling Muscatel.

As he described the killing, Nancy Muscatel began to shake. Her two adult daughters bent over and wept in silence.

"Mikhel was pressing with knees on Muscatel's shoulders," Altmanis continued. "The bag was over Muscatel's head. He was clogging the ends of the bag so the air would not get inside."

Nancy Muscatel stood quietly, walked out of the courtroom and returned several minutes later to hear of her husband's body being thrown off the Parrotts Ferry Bridge.

But at the end of the day, Nancy Muscatel clung to the image of her husband refusing to eat the ham sandwich. "He wasn't going to give in," she said. "He wasn't going to compromise his values. That was Meyer."

*

joe.mozingo@latimes.com

Criminal Records Erased By Courts Live To Tell Tales (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

In 41 states, people accused or convicted of crimes have the legal right to rewrite history. They can have their criminal records expunged, and in theory that means that all traces of their encounters with the justice system will disappear.

But enormous commercial databases are fast undoing the societal bargain of expungement, one that used to give people who had committed minor crimes a clean slate and a fresh start.

Most states seal at least some records of juvenile offenses. Many states also allow adults arrested for or convicted of minor crimes like possessing marijuana, shoplifting or disorderly conduct to ask a judge, sometimes after a certain amount of time has passed without further trouble, to expunge their records. If the judge agrees, the records are destroyed or sealed.

But real expungement is becoming significantly harder to accomplish in the electronic age. Records once held only in paper form by law enforcement agencies, courts and corrections departments are now routinely digitized and sold in bulk to the private sector. Some commercial databases now contain more than 100 million criminal records. They are updated only fitfully, and expunged records now often turn up in criminal background checks ordered by employers and landlords.

Thomas A. Wilder, the district clerk for Tarrant County in Fort Worth, said he had received harsh criticism for refusing, on principle, to sell criminal history records in bulk.

“How the hell do I expunge anything,” Mr. Wilder asked, “if I sell tapes and disks all over the country?”

Private database companies say they are diligent in updating their records to reflect the later expungement of criminal records. But lawyers, judges and experts in criminal justice say it is common for people to lose jobs and housing over information in databases that courts have ordered expunged.

These critics say that even the biggest vendors do not always update their records promptly and thoroughly and that many smaller ones use outdated, incomplete and sometimes inaccurate data.

Lida Rodriguez-Taseff, a lawyer in Miami, tells her clients that expungement is a waste of time. “To tell someone their record is gone is essentially to lie to them,” Ms. Rodriguez-Taseff said. “In an electronic age, people should understand that once they have been convicted or arrested that will never go away.”

Judge Stanford Blake, whose court often enters expungement orders, said his inability to make them effective had left him feeling frustrated and helpless.

“It’s a horrible situation,” said Judge Blake, the administrative judge of the criminal division of the Eleventh Circuit Court in Miami. “It’s the ultimate Big Brother, always watching you.”

The rise in the availability of criminal histories has been accompanied by a surge in demand for them. Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, criminal background checks have become routine in many employment applications.

“Something like 80 percent of large- or medium-sized employers now do background checks,” said Debbie A. Mukamal, the director of the Prisoner Reentry Institute at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York. “Employers need to know about job-related convictions to make a nuanced, responsible decision so that they can protect themselves and the public and give people a fair shot at employment.”

But the current system, Ms. Mukamal added, is not working. “It’s unfettered,” she said. “It’s not regulated. There’s misinformation.”

ChoicePoint, one of the larger database companies, performed nine million background checks last year, said Matt Furman, a spokesman. The company’s error rate is very small, Mr. Furman said. “One out of every thousand background checks has led to a consumer contact” disputing or complaining about the information provided, he said, “and one of a thousand contacts results in a change.”

There have been only a few lawsuits taking issue with the information provided to employers in background checks.

In one, filed in June in federal court in Brooklyn, Victor Guevares sued a company that had offered him a job and a database company that he says caused the offer to be withdrawn.

Mr. Guevares, now 33, was convicted of disorderly conduct more than a decade ago. New York considers that a violation like a traffic infraction rather than a crime and bars database companies from reporting such offenses to employers.

But Acxiom, a database company, reported the disorderly conduct charges to the Tyco Healthcare Group, which had offered Mr. Guevares a job in 2004. Tyco promptly withdrew the offer, one that would have doubled Mr. Guevares's salary, to $46,000. It based its decision, his lawsuit says, on its mistaken understanding that he had committed a misdemeanor and had lied on his application about whether he had ever been "convicted of any crime which was not expunged or sealed by a court."

Mr. Guevares, a gregarious man with a shaved head and big brown eyes, said that losing the job, which would have propelled his family into the middle class, devastated him. "I've never been arrested," he said. "I've never been locked up. I've never done jail time."

In court papers, both companies denied wrongdoing, and Tyco has sued Acxiom for breach of contract.

Catherine H. O'Neill, a lawyer with the Legal Action Center, which represents Mr. Guevares, said Acxiom deserved much of the blame.

"They should not have been vacuuming up this information in the first place," Ms. O'Neill said.

A lawyer for Acxiom and a spokesman for Tyco declined to comment.

There is often plenty of fault to go around. Even within the government, various agencies often fail to coordinate their records.

"The problem often arises," said Ms. Rodriguez-Taseff, the Miami lawyer, "because so many agencies have access to criminal records — the department of corrections, the police, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement and the courts. Even though you have an expunged record, oftentimes a policing agency or a corrections facility allows private entities to gain access to it."

Some state laws place the burden on employers, on the apparent theory that the problem is not the availability of information but the use to which it is put. Illinois, for instance, prohibits prospective employers from asking about or making decisions based on expunged or sealed criminal histories.

A Minnesota man who agreed to talk about his experiences in exchange for anonymity said an expunged 1992 felony conviction — he declined to say for what — and erroneous information about a crime he did not commit have kept him from obtaining work for six months.

He said the database companies he contacted had been responsive if not especially fast in clearing up the problem. Some told him they updated their records annually. "I don't think the consumer reporting agencies mean to be" reporting inaccurate or sealed information, he said. "They just need to get new CD's."

In November 2005, a Florida woman obtained a court order expunging records concerning her arrest in a domestic dispute the previous spring. The judge ordered the state and local police, the county sheriff and the court clerk to "expunge all information concerning indicia of arrest or criminal history."

But when the woman tried to buy a condominium this summer, the arrest nonetheless popped up in a routine background check. The deal fell through.

"It's going to haunt her for the rest of her life," said a relative of the woman, who shared court and Internet search records in exchange for a promise not to identify her or her family. "They're using public records at a given point in time and they're not updating them, and they're ruining people's lives."

Margaret Colgate Love, the nation's pardon attorney for most of the 1990's and the author of a new book called "Relief from the Collateral Consequences of a Criminal Conviction," said problems like these were rooted in the nature of expungement.

"It does reveal," Ms. Love said, "how perilous it is to build a public policy on a lie."

State Investigates Spending By Suspended Mayor (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Investigators from the Maryland State Prosecutor's office searched the home of the suspended mayor of Forest Heights yesterday, adding a criminal probe to the catalogue of palace intrigues that have roiled the tiny Prince George's County town for more than a year.

The investigation centers on spending by Mayor Myles Spires Jr., town officials familiar with the investigation said. Among the specific areas of interest, they said, are two disbursements of about $3,333 in public funds -- one to Spires and one to the nondenominational Internet church Abundant Life Ministries, of which he is bishop.

DOJ_NMG_0082321

Until a few years ago in Forest Heights, a town of fewer than 1,000 homes tucked between Indian Head Highway and the District border, a single mayor governed for more than two decades. Spires was in office fewer than eight months when the Town Council suspended him Sept. 7.

The rapid collapse of his administration is particularly unsettling, officials and residents said, because he was appointed to restore integrity after Joyce Beck was driven from office by the council in January amid allegations that she knocked a former council member to the ground and slammed a door on a police officer's arm. Assault charges against Beck were dismissed.

"It's quite embarrassing," said Larry Stoner, the acting mayor.

Spires referred questions to his attorney, Timothy F. Maloney, who denied any misconduct and declined to address the specific allegations. "Mr. Spires is cooperating with the office of the state prosecutors," Maloney said. "He's confident that he's acted appropriately as mayor."

The state prosecutor, Robert A. Rohrbaugh, declined to comment on the search, saying he is prevented from discussing any aspect of any pending investigation. His office has the power to investigate ethics and election law violations, bribery and misconduct by public officials.

Though brief, Spires's tenure was turbulent: A residents group hired a private detective to dig into his background, and angry residents hurled accusations at packed town meetings. The relationship between him and the council has become so bitter and suspicious that after he was suspended, the locks were changed on the door to the mayor's office.

Several days later, when Spires returned to town hall to retrieve his computer, he tried to remove the door from its hinges, said Stoner and Town Council President Andrea McCutcheon, both of whom were present. McCutcheon said she took Spires for coffee, and Stoner removed the computer while they were out. The town later turned the computer over to the prosecutor's office.

Spires has filed a legal challenge to his suspension, McCutcheon said, alleging in part that the council improperly voted on it during a closed session. The council plans to meet tomorrow night to reaffirm the suspension in public session.

In a Sept. 7 letter to Stoner, McCutcheon detailed several instances in which she said Spires had spent town money improperly -- without, for example, seeking competitive bids or without required approvals.

The two disbursements for $3,333 were drawn from a line item in the budget, "Funding Administration," that McCutcheon said Spires created. According to budget documents, the line item is to pay "costs associated with grants acquisition and grants administration, public relations and other miscellaneous costs."

In the letter to Stoner, McCutcheon, a former police dispatcher, wrote that Spires sought the payments as an advance for mileage, meals and lodging. She said in an interview that he did not later provide any receipts. In town hall, it has been widely noted that the amount of each payment, issued in July and August, is equal to one month's portion of the total line item -- a sum that considerably exceeded the annual $2,600 stipend Spires received as mayor. The budget covered the fiscal year starting July 1.

"He got in here and really threw everyone for a loop," McCutcheon said.

Hit-run Deaths See 20% Increase (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, October 17, 2006

The number of pedestrians killed by hit-and-run drivers has jumped 20% since 2000 and is at its highest level in a decade, a USA TODAY analysis shows.

The increase compounds the problems of investigating hit-and-run cases, which investigators say are among the most difficult crimes to solve because they often happen at night with no witnesses.

“Even if you're lucky enough to get the car, you can't always get the driver,” says Richard Ashton of the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

Of the 4,881 pedestrians killed last year, 974 died in hit-and-runs, National Highway Traffic Safety Administration records show. The total number of pedestrians killed nationwide increased by about 2% since 2000, but hit-and-run deaths increased at almost 10 times that pace, the USA TODAY analysis found.

“It's an outrageous statistic,” says Peter Kissinger, CEO of the AAA Foundation for Traffic Safety. He says that although the increase is difficult to explain, likely factors include more cars sharing the road with more pedestrians, and increasingly distracted and aggressive drivers.

“I think it's a sad commentary on our society,” Kissinger says.

No national tally exists showing how many hit-and-run cases are solved. In many investigations in which drivers are later found, they tell police that they fled out of fear or because they had been drinking and wanted to avoid legal trouble, says Lt. Doug Dodson, a spokesman for the Florida Highway Patrol.

“By the time we find them, a lot of them are really eaten up with guilt,” Dodson says.

DOJ_NMG_0082322

The last time the USA had so many hit-and-run deaths was in 1996, when there were 982, records show. More than 5,400 pedestrians were killed that year.

Some of the crashes are deliberate attempts to hurt or kill. But in many others, drivers have done nothing wrong until they flee, says Michael Payne, a Fort Myers, Fla., investigator.

“Quite often, it's simply an accident,” he says. “But people get scared.”

Recent victims include Mary Kelley, 77, killed as she crossed the street March 2 in Fort Myers Beach, Fla., on her way home from dinner. The driver, Jeanne Rose Dunn, didn't stop and didn't report the crash until the next day, prosecutors allege.

Dunn would not comment because she is charged with a felony for leaving the scene of the crash. She told investigators that she thought a rock had hit her windshield, according to a police report, and that she did not realize what happened until she heard about Kelley's death on the radio.

The crash haunts Kelley's children. “I wonder what's in somebody's mind that they could just hit someone and drive away,” says her son Kevin Kelley.

CIVIL LAW:

Bankruptcy Cases Down In Wake Of New Law (MH)

By Patrick Danner

The Miami Herald, October 17, 2006

A year after sweeping reforms to U.S. bankruptcy law took effect, the number of people seeking protection from their creditors is down. Way down.

Fewer than 5,200 South Floridians filed for bankruptcy in the past year -- less than half the number who filed in just the two weeks before the law took effect Oct. 17. The question is why.

Banks and credit card companies say the law has succeeded in making it harder for people to seek bankruptcy protection. But bankruptcy lawyers and trustees say the numbers are down now because some people rushed to court before the reforms, and because others believe -- wrongly -- that they can no longer file for bankruptcy.

"My biggest impression of what the new law has done is, it has baselessly scared people from filing for bankruptcy," said Timothy Kingcade, a Miami bankruptcy lawyer who says his business has been cut in half.

The laws were changed after an eight-year campaign by financial-service companies to cut down on credit card users who piled up debt and then wiggled out of repaying by filing for bankruptcy.

Under the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, a 500-page piece of legislation signed by President Bush in April 2005, debtors who can repay part of their debt are no longer allowed to simply wipe the slate clean.

They must complete a detailed "means test" to see if they are eligible for Chapter 7. They also must receive credit counseling before entering bankruptcy and take a financial-management course before exiting.

That reduces the opportunity for people to "game the system," said Wayne Abernathy, an executive director with the American Bankers Association. Instead, he said, more people go to a bank to work out problems instead of straight to bankruptcy court.

But critics argue the new law translates into steeper legal fees, reams of paperwork and a more time-consuming process for debtors, such as Camiellia Smith.

Smith lost her hospital job, got sick and was hit with a foreclosure action on her Miami home, she said. Out-of-pocket costs to repair damage to her home from two hurricanes left her filing for Chapter 13 this month.

Smith wasn't pleased that she had to spend $50 to take a credit counseling course.

"Waste of time and waste of money," she said, adding she had to borrow cash to pay for the course. ``They didn't help me with anything. All they told me was my expenses were more than I make. A blind man could [see] that."

Critics also say the reforms have so far failed in the goal of directing more debtors from Chapter 7 liquidation into Chapter 13 reorganization, where they would repay some or all of their debts. The percentage of Chapter 13 cases in the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of Florida this year is relatively unchanged from most past years.

Under the new law, a single person in Florida earning more than $35,833 who files for Chapter 7 is means-tested to see if the case should be dismissed or converted to Chapter 13. For a family of four in Florida, the figure is just under $60,000.

But virtually all Chapter 7 filers fall below those income thresholds, according to trustees Alan Goldberg and Joel Tabas.

"It's been almost meaningless," Tabas said of the means testing.

Bankruptcy professionals say the vast majority of bankruptcy filers do so because of some catastrophic event, such as job loss, divorce, home foreclosure or major illness.

DOJ_NMG_0082323

Bankruptcy attorneys say they now have to do background checks on the assets and liabilities of clients because the law requires them to attest to the information.

"It's a lot more work, no doubt about it," said attorney Richard Birkenwald from North Miami Beach. 'We can't just take our clients' word."

A survey of 714 bankruptcy attorneys this month found more than three-fourths said the time they spend on preparing a filing has increased by at least half. Less than 1 percent said the law has "mostly improved the results." The survey was done by the National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys.

Not everyone is complaining, however.

"If someone threatens me with bankruptcy and I know they have to go into Chapter 13, I say, go ahead," said Mike Goldberg, a Fort Lauderdale bankruptcy lawyer who represents creditors. ``It's a much more arduous process for them. It gives me a little bit more negotiating leverage."

Pembroke Pines lawyer Gerard Kouri Jr., who represents carmakers' finance units, said before the reforms, Chapter 13 debtors with an outstanding car loan could return the vehicle or negotiate a reduced amount to pay back. Now, for the most part, they either have to give back the car or continue payments in full.

"They have given my clients some of benefits that I used to have to fight for in the past," Kouri said.

One resulting drawback for him: He's now getting less work.

Overall, the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of Florida is on pace to handle fewer than 6,500 consumer bankruptcy petitions this year, down from 35,332 in 2005 and 25,914 in 2004. But the number of cases has ticked up slightly during the year.

"The present is a time of great uncertainty," noted a congressional report on the new law this summer. ``The picture should become clearer in 2007."

Bankruptcy's New Era (WP)

By Kathleen Day, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Filings Down Since Law Passed

Sharon Moore says life "felt like a whirlwind" after her seven-month-old restaurant in Portland, Maine, failed in February.

The 38-year-old single mother said she struggled to find work and keep up payments on a small-business loan and other debts that totaled more than $18,000. Late fees and other penalties sent her finances spiraling out of control.

In July, after working two jobs still didn't make ends meet, she filed for Chapter 13 bankruptcy protection. Under a court-sanctioned plan, her escalating penalty charges are halted, but she must make a fixed payment on her debt each month for the next five years. She can keep her house and car and, by the end, she says, will just about have repaid her obligations. Best of all, she says, "the creditor calls have stopped, and I can breathe again."

Moore is one of an estimated 450,000 people who have sought court protection from creditors since a new law took effect one year ago today that made filing for personal bankruptcy harder and more expensive. While that number may seem high, it is down by about 1 million from the average in the preceding four years.

Lawmakers, consumer advocates and industry executives say that much of the sudden drop in filings after Oct. 17, 2005, can be explained by the fact that 600,000 people filed in the two weeks before the law took effect, a scramble that was 10 times the normal level of filing over 10 business days in recent years.

But the filing rate for the first half of 2006, about 10,000 a week, is well below what could be attributed to last year's mad dash, surprising the lawmakers who wrote the legislation and the industry executives who lobbied for it. "So far, I think it is too soon to make firm judgments," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), one of the bill's chief architects.

The legislation, the most significant change to the nation's bankruptcy laws since 1978, was the culmination of a decade-long push by the credit card and auto-financing industries to make it harder for consumers to wipe out debts through bankruptcy. The new law toughened the rules with the intent of steering more debtors into a form of bankruptcy that requires people to repay more of their debts.

Typically, people file for one of two types of bankruptcy: Chapter 7 or Chapter 13. Under Chapter 7 bankruptcy, people can seek cancellation of most of their debts after some of their assets are sold to help creditors. Under Chapter 13, debtors must repay debts under a court-supervised repayment plan, as Moore is doing.

Industry executives had argued that about 10 percent of debtors filing each year for Chapter 7 under the old law, or about 100,000 people, abused the system because they could repay a large portion of their obligations and therefore should be required to do so under Chapter 13. Consumer groups and several lawmakers, mostly Democrats, argued that the number of

DOJ_NMG_0082324

Chapter 7 filers who misused the system is closer to 3 percent but that, in any case, the new legislation does little to weed them out.

The new law requires people seeking bankruptcy protection to pay higher filing fees and attend mandatory credit-counseling sessions with an accredited firm before and after they file. The goal is to discourage people from filing if they don't have to, and if they do, to pay off as much of their debt as possible.

Ed Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association, which fought hard for the bill, agrees that it's too soon to know the bill's impact but says the first year seems promising. "It seems to be wringing out people who abused the system, and those who really needed to file can do so," he said.

But projections about the long-term trend for bankruptcy filings vary widely. One major credit industry company privately estimates that consumer bankruptcy filings will top 1 million in 2007. The estimate was provided to The Washington Post on the condition that the company not be named because the projection is not public information. That estimate is still far below the 1.5 million in annual filings in the years before the law, though the company also predicts a "slow rate of return to historic levels."

Total filings have started to creep up. Two weeks ago, they hit a weekly rate of 15,000 -- halfway to the 30,000 level that was typical before the new law.

Filings such as Moore's under Chapter 13 may indicate a shift. While the number of total filings is down, the portion that are under Chapter 13 has risen significantly in the last year, accounting for about 40 percent of personal filings, up from 30 percent before the new law took effect.

"It's just too early to draw any grand conclusions," said Samuel J. Gerdano, executive director of the American Bankruptcy Institute, a nonprofit, nonpartisan research group. He said one reason that lower-than-expected filings have persisted is that people might be afraid or misinformed. He has heard of anecdotal evidence that some debt collectors are incorrectly telling consumers that the new bill bars bankruptcies or makes it nearly impossible to file, though no one has studied the matter.

"It's very possible there's consumer misunderstanding about the extent bankruptcy protection's available and at what cost and at what hassle," Gerdano said.

The National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys, which has opposed the law from its inception, said a survey of its members shows the new law is "failing on an across-the-board basis," adding little except paperwork and expense.

One part of the law that is being closely watched is a requirement that people seek credit counseling from a nonprofit agency approved by the Justice Department. The Internal Revenue Service earlier this year said it would seek to revoke the tax-exempt status of at least 41 of the nation's largest credit counseling agencies, which account for 40 percent of the industry's revenue, saying the firms appear to be primarily interested in making a profit rather than helping debt-burdened consumers.

The section of the Justice Department that oversees the nation's bankruptcy system is the U.S. Trustee Program. Its budget comes from the fees people and businesses pay to file for bankruptcy, and so far, it's approved 150 credit agencies to provide counseling.

Privately, program officials have expressed dual concerns that if bankruptcies return to former levels, there will be a critical shortage of approved counseling agencies. At the same time, if bankruptcies stay unexpectedly rare, the program may find itself short of operating funds.

Trustee Program spokeswoman Jane Limprecht would only say the program has adequate funding and that there will be sufficient counseling if filings increase.

The National Foundation for Consumer Counseling, which represents many nonprofit firms, yesterday released a survey of its members that found that the industry has been able to handle the volume so far. But the survey also found that a firm's average cost of counseling a person is $50 but that on average it can collect only $40 to pay those costs.

Chapter 13 Filings Grow In Gulf Region (USAT)

By Kathy Chu And Barbara Hansen

USA Today, October 17, 2006

A year after a stricter federal bankruptcy law took effect, a growing number of filers in states hit by Hurricane Katrina are having to repay their debts rather than being able to eliminate them.

A big reason is that lenders are increasingly cracking down on past-due mortgage payments in the storm-ravaged Gulf region, consumer bankruptcy attorneys say. The tougher bankruptcy law, which took effect a year ago today, made it harder for people to file for Chapter 7, which erases most debts. Instead, some debtors have been forced to file under Chapter 13, which usually requires a debt-repayment plan.

After Katrina, most mortgage lenders agreed to postpone collecting overdue payments and foreclosing on homes in the Gulf region, at the urging of state regulators. But many lenders resumed collections this summer.

DOJ_NMG_0082325

Homeowners in the Katrina region "are behind on their mortgage payments, the insurance companies aren't paying up and they're trying to keep their homes," says Brad Botes, a lawyer whose firm has offices in the Gulf.

Botes adds that foreclosures are moving forward in the region, leading homeowners to file under Chapter 13.

Throughout the USA, bankruptcy filings are gradually rising again, after soaring before the law took effect and plunging afterward. But they're still nowhere near the levels of prior years.

Compared with the rest of the USA, Chapter 13 filings have grown especially fast in the Gulf region in recent months. In Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, Chapter 13 filings surpassed Chapter 7 filings in the first nine months of 2006, according to LexisNexis CourtLink data.

Botes and other consumer bankruptcy lawyers say that in the states hit by Katrina, many homeowners are filing Chapter 13 to ward off foreclosures on their homes. Chapter 13 usually lets homeowners pay their past-due mortgage debt over three to five years.

The high rate of Chapter 13 filings is likely "minimizing" the number of foreclosures in the Gulf as consumers try to save their properties, says Rick Sharga of RealtyTrac, which tracks foreclosures.

Nationally, one reason Chapter 13 bankruptcies are rising could be that consumers who wanted to file Chapter 7 did so before the tougher rules took effect last October, says Sam Gerdano of the American Bankruptcy Institute, a non-partisan research group.

Laura Fisher of the American Bankers Association says she thinks some people may be opting for Chapter 13 because the law now discourages them from "using the system as a financial planning tool" to avoid repaying their debts.

6 States Stand Up To Divest From Sudan (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, October 17, 2006

A courtroom battle over an Illinois law requiring state pension funds to sell any investments linked to Sudan is shaping up later this month as a critical test for a grass-roots movement seeking to pressure the regime behind the Darfur genocide.

Illinois is one of six states that over the past year have passed laws requiring their pension funds to divest themselves of stakes in companies that do business in Sudan, a central African nation that has been consumed by warfare almost continuously since it became independent in 1956.

Under U.S. sanctions in place since 1997, U.S. companies are largely barred from doing business in Sudan because of the government's complicity in the ongoing slaughter in its western Darfur region. The Illinois law requires more than 600 pension funds, most covering retired police and firefighters, to sell any holdings with links to Sudan.

"It's a moral imperative. … Our public monies should not support genocide. The impact of it? I don't know the impact. I'm taking a moral stand," says state Sen. Jacqueline Collins, the Chicago Democrat who wrote the legislation.

Other human rights activists want to use divestment to discourage corporate activity in Sudan and ultimately cause Sudanese leaders to halt their support for the militias that are killing and raping in Darfur.

"Our end goal is to end the genocide. Divestment is just a means to that end," says Adam Sterling of the Sudan Divestment Task Force, which favors a "targeted" approach aimed at companies that provide revenue to the Sudanese government, fail to benefit the poor or lack a corporate policy on Sudan.

Among them: Chinese oil companies Sinopec and PetroChina, Swiss power giant ABB and German engineering firm Siemens.

The Illinois law takes a broader approach than that used by states such as California, one that even some human rights activists worry won't survive a court challenge. The business group that is suing Illinois over the law says it will hurt retirees' investment returns by narrowing the pension funds' options, without doing anything to stop the killing in Darfur.

The National Foreign Trade Council, a Washington-based pro-trade group whose membership includes the American subsidiaries of a few multinationals that are active in Sudan, argues that the U.S. Constitution prohibits states from making foreign policy in areas where the federal government already has acted.

In 1998, the group won a similar case involving state efforts to punish businesses with links to Myanmar's military junta. "Everyone knows this act is unconstitutional. It's not even a close call," says Bill Reinsch, NFTC president. "The Constitution says the president gets to make foreign policy, not the governor of Illinois."

Collins says the earlier case was "completely different." If the divestment law seriously crimps pension funds' investment options, the state's pension code should be amended to remove other limitations on the funds, she says.

The parties are expected to resume skirmishing in U.S. District Court in Chicago before the end of the month.

DOJ_NMG_0082326

There is no argument, however, over the horrors of Darfur. More than 200,000 civilians have been killed and 2.5 million turned into refugees by three years of savage fighting between the Sudanese government and rebels in the dirt-poor western province.

President Bush last year agreed that the relentless government-sanctioned murders in Darfur constituted genocide. The U.S. in 2005 provided $510 million in humanitarian aid to Sudan.

An already horrifying environment of widespread rape, killing and mutilations has deteriorated since the May signing of a peace deal between the Sudanese government and one of the Darfur rebel groups. Fighting has continued between the government-backed Janjaweed militia and two other rebel armies. Government forces now are "indiscriminately bombing" civilian villages, according to Human Rights Watch.

Reinsch, who insists his group isn't indifferent to the civilian suffering, says well-intentioned gestures will hopelessly complicate global commerce. Global companies, with supply chains and customer rosters spread across multiple continents, also fear the state-by-state divestment campaign will spread. "It was Burma six years ago. It's Sudan today," says Reinsch. "Next year, it'll be Zimbabwe and the year after that Russia and then China."

Divestment campaigners say the genocide in Sudan represents more than a garden-variety human rights abuse. Supporters and opponents alike agree the divestment campaign is gathering steam, with legislative proposals expected in at least 15 states next year.

To John Prendergast of the Brussels-based International Crisis Group, a non-partisan group that monitors global hot spots, such grass-roots activism represents "American democracy at its best." The Sudanese government, deep in debt and desperate to avoid international isolation, is vulnerable to citizen protest.

"The Sudanese government doesn't want a scarlet letter on their shirt. They're not the Taliban," he says. "They want to be a fully integrated member of the global community. … (Divestment) immediately sets them apart. It says, 'There's something wrong with this country.' They don't want that."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Monitor Faults Detroit Police (DEN)

By Paul Egan

Detroit News, October 17, 2006

Report says department is still not complying with federal consent decree.

More than three years after the Justice Department and the city of Detroit signed consent decrees to improve the Detroit Police Department, only 15 percent of the patrol cars inspected have working video cameras required by the court orders, a federal monitor reported Monday.

The Police Department continued to get poor marks in the monitor's latest quarterly report. The monitor examined 89 paragraphs and subparagraphs in the two consent decrees related to use of force and conditions of confinement and reported the department was in compliance with only four of them.

By signing the consent decrees in 2003, the city settled two federal lawsuits that accused the police of repeatedly violating the rights of suspects, prisoners and witnesses.

The longer it takes the department to comply, the longer it will be under the scrutiny and multimillion-dollar expense of a federal monitor. The Justice Department could also ask a federal judge to find the department in contempt and impose sanctions, though that is considered unlikely at this point.

The report also said supervisors are not randomly reviewing the videos recorded by the patrol car cameras as required. The report is by Kroll Inc., a New York City-based risk consulting company that was hired to monitor the Police Department's compliance with the court orders.

The report, filed Monday in U.S. District Court in Detroit, also hammers the department for failing to fill out required reports or filling them out incorrectly.

Commander Jamie Fields, the officer in charge of implementing the consent decrees for the department, said Monday the nature of the monitor's report makes the compliance look worse than it is.

The department is waiting for the monitor to approve lesson plans that will be used to train officers on new policies developed to comply with the consent decrees, Fields said. In many cases, the department has successfully developed and disseminated new policies but does not get credit for satisfying the relevant paragraphs of the decrees until it has also completed training and implementation, he said.

Soon, "it will be like downhill skiing," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082327

The report did say the force achieved a "significant milestone" by providing all officers with newly developed policies related to police lockups, but said the department will have to spend money improving the buildings holding the cells before full compliance is achieved.

On video cameras, the monitor said the department reported that 290 of its 543 scout cars are equipped with cameras but that an Aug. 3 inspection found only 15 percent of those inspected had working cameras.

Fields said the cameras are important because they protect the public and also protect officers from false accusations of brutality. Supervisors view the videos the cameras record but are not yet trained on a random screening process required by the decrees, he said.

The department recently received new cars and has not yet moved cameras to them from older squad cars, he said.

"No car is supposed to go out without a working camera," Fields said.

"Undoubtedly, some probably do on occasion."

Feds Sue City Over Voting Rights Of Spanish-speakers (PHDN)

By Dave Davies

Philadelphia Daily News, October 17, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department has accused Philadelphia of violating the voting rights of Spanish-speaking citizens, and is asking for federal election observers in the city through the end of 2009.

A federal lawsuit filed Friday charges that the city has failed to provide enough bilingual poll workers in Hispanic areas and adequately translate election materials into Spanish.

As a result, the suit alleges, "limited English-proficient Hispanic voters have had difficulty understanding the election process and have been prevented from voting."

Mayor Street's spokesman, Joe Grace, said the city already provides translators and voting materials in Spanish, and will "vigorously contest" the suit.

"The timing of this is a little questionable, coming three weeks before an election," Grace said. Asked if he thought the Republican White House was seeking to suppress Democratic votes in a key U.S. Senate race, Grace said, "The timing is suspect, and we'll leave it at that."

Grace noted that the suit didn't list any specific complaints about Philadelphia election materials or polling-place activity.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said she couldn't be more specific, but officials of the watchdog group Committee of Seventy said they'd provided some of the information that led to the suit.

"We think the city could be doing a much better job with non-English-speaking voters," said Seventy President Zack Stalberg. "It's a shame it had to come to a lawsuit, but if it yields better service, then we're happy with that."

Committee of Seventy volunteers surveyed voters at 60 polling places in the city's Latino community in May, and found complaints about the adequacy and training of interpreters and related issues.

Chris Sheridan, Committee of Seventy policy director, said Justice Department officials were already looking at the issue in Philadelphia, prompted in part by the historically low turnout among Hispanic voters.

Asked if he was concerned that the timing might have partisan motivations, Stalberg said, "I haven't seen any evidence of that at all. The people we've talked to seemed like they were just trying to do their jobs."

The two sides are expected to appear at a court hearing this week.

FBI Reports Slide In Hate Crimes In U.S. (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

Hate crimes in the United States dropped last year by 6 percent, the FBI reported Monday, although violence against people based on their race accounted more than half of the reported incidents.

Police nationwide reported 7,163 hate crime incidents in 2005, targeting victims based on their race, ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation and disabilities. That was down from 2004, when the FBI reported 7,649 incidents.

The vast majority of hate crimes in both years were motivated by race, according the reports, which detailed the data based on so-called "single-bias" incidents. That means the crime was motivated by only one kind of bias against the victim, according to the FBI.

Race-based criminal activity accounted for 54.7 percent of hate crimes last year, up slightly from 52.9 percent in 2004, the FBI found. Another 17 percent of hate crimes in 2005 targeted victims for their religious beliefs, and 14.2 percent for their sexual orientation.

DOJ_NMG_0082328

Victims were assaulted in more than half — 50.7 percent — of the hate crime cases against people. Six people were murdered and another three were raped in reported hate crimes last year. The rest of the victims, or 48.9 percent, were intimidated, the report shows. The FBI also looked at hate crime incidents that targeted property, with 81.3 percent of cases resulting in damage, destruction or vandalism.

Sixty percent of the known offenders in 2005 were white, and 20 percent were black, the report showed.

The data was collected from police agencies across the country, representing city, county, state, tribal and federal law enforcement agencies.

Most Hate Crimes Spurred By Racial Bias, FBI Says (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

More than half of the hate crimes reported last year by police agencies nationwide were motivated by racial bias and many involved intimidation, according to a report released yesterday by the FBI.

The report, by the FBI's Uniform Crime Reporting Program, said that 55 percent of the 7,163 reported single-bias incidents last year were motivated by racial bias -- an increase of one percentage point. The overall number represents a 6 percent drop from 7,649 in 2004.

Religious bias triggered 17 percent of incidents cited in the report, followed by 14 percent for sexual-orientation bias and 13.2 percent by an ethnicity or national-origin bias. Less than 1 percent involved bias against a disability.

The report also noted that of 5,190 hate-crime offenses classified as crimes against people in 2005, intimidation accounted for 48.9 percent of them, followed by simple assaults at 30.2 percent and aggravated assaults at 20.5 percent.

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) yesterday called the 2005 report "clearly incomplete," saying it did not include hate-crime data from two of the largest cities in America: New York and Phoenix. It called the report "a setback to the progress the bureau has made in the program over the past 15 years."

"New York City, which has been a model for police agencies on response to hate violence over the years, and Phoenix should provide their hate-crime data to the FBI as quickly as possible and take steps to ensure timely, full participation in the future," said Deborah M. Lauter, ADL director of civil rights.

"It is also disappointing that thousands of smaller police departments across the country also did not participate in this data-collection effort."

The FBI did not comment on the report.

During 2005, the FBI said the 7,163 criminal incidents involved 8,380 offenses and were reported by city, county, state, federal and tribal law-enforcement agencies nationwide.

A hate crime, also known as a bias crime, is a criminal offense committed against a person, property or society that is motivated, in whole or in part, by the offender's bias against a race, religion, disability, sexual orientation or ethnicity/national origin.

Virginia reported 295 hate crime incidents last year, down from 307 in 2004; followed by Maryland with 195, down from 245 in 2004; and the District with 48, down from 49 in 2004.

The 2005 report also said:

·Of the 3,109 hate-crime offenses classified as crimes against property, 53.6 percent were directed at persons, 9.8 percent were against businesses or financial institutions, 8.9 percent were against government and 6.8 percent were against religious organizations.

·A total of 20.9 percent of the reported hate crimes were directed at other, multiple or unknown victim types. Damage/destruction/vandalism was the most frequently reported crime against property, accounting for 81.3 percent of the total.

According to the report, of the 6,804 known offenders reported in 2005, 60.5 percent were white and 19.9 percent were black. The race was unknown for 12.3 percent and other races accounted for the remaining known offenders.

It also said that the majority -- about 30 percent -- of hate-crime incidents in 2005 occurred in or near residences or homes.

NAACP To Monitor Elections Following Primary Problems (AP)

By Alex Dominguez, The Associated Press

AP, October 17, 2006

BALTIMORE (AP) — The NAACP will monitor voting in Ohio and nine other states next month, sending observers to polling places, taking citizen complaints and notifying the Justice Department of any serious problems, the civil rights organization announced Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0082329

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People planned to have hundreds of volunteers monitoring the election in Ohio, Maryland, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Pennsylvania and Texas, said Bruce Gordon, president of the Baltimore-based organization.

The NAACP said the states were chosen because of pivotal elections, concentrations of black voters, or a history of polling problems.

Gordon said the organization intends to be proactive "to ensure that Nov. 7 comes and goes smoothly and that every citizen across this country, and particularly in the state of Maryland, who has an interest in voting, in fact is able to vote."

Maryland's primary election last month was riddled with problems that caused precincts to open late or other delays, prompting court action in some areas to extend voting hours.

Results of an Associated Press-Pew poll released last week found only 30 percent of black voters surveyed nationwide were confident their votes would be counted.

The NAACP will run an election day voter command center at its headquarters and take calls from concerned citizens at (866) OUR-VOTE. The Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights and People for the American Way will work with the civil rights organization to monitor complaints of voting irregularities and advise voters, the NAACP said.

Gordon said the NAACP believes the best way for its members to vote is "to go to their polling places and cast their votes using whatever machines are on site" and that absentee balloting has normally not served the African-American community well.

While the civil rights group will monitor the election process, Gordon urged voters to head to the polls, "even if it requires extra effort."

"Civil rights activists went to extraordinary lengths to earn the right for black Americans to vote," Gordon said in a statement. "Some lost their lives. We owe it to them and ourselves to honor their sacrifice by voting, no matter what challenges we face."

___

On the Net:

NAACP: http://www.naacp.org

NAACP To Monitor Mich. Polls (DEN)

By Lisa Martino

Detroit News, October 17, 2006

10 states will have observers at next month's elections; Republicans also plan oversight.

The NAACP announced Monday that Michigan is among 10 states that will have observers at polling places during next month's election to take citizen complaints and let the Justice Department know about any serious problems.

The effort comes after numerous reports of problems with the Maryland voting system during the primary last month.

Participating states were chosen using three factors: a high concentration of black voters, a history of polling problems or pivotal elections.

"While the NAACP will take steps to counter obstacles to voter participation, we are encouraging our communities to cast their votes, even if it requires extra effort," NAACP President Bruce Gordon said in a statement Monday.

Locally, in past election years the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People filed injunctions in federal court against individuals harassing people at the polls and challenging their right to vote by questioning their identification, criminal record or whether they paid child support.

"We're very pleased that NAACP national will be monitoring the elections. We in Detroit have been monitoring elections for the last several years," the Rev. Wendell Anthony, president of the Detroit branch of the NAACP, said Monday.

"Certainly, we in Detroit will be out. This is a very important election. People want to use it by any means necessary to suppress a result that may be against their interest, so, yes, we support (the monitoring effort) very strongly."

The Michigan Republican Party announced last week that it will monitor polling sites Nov. 7. Through RSVP, (Republicans Safeguarding Voter Rights Program), the Republican Party will use volunteers to serve as observers at polling places.

"Other states experience outright fraud, and Michigan is not immune to voting problems and irregularities," Saulius "Saul" Anuzis, party chairman, said in a statement last week.

"In 2004, there were hundreds of reported incidents of voter intimidation and illegal election practices by groups such as MoveOn.org, ACORN and PIRGM. Last year in the Detroit city elections, there were so many problems the FBI ended up involved."

The NAACP will also monitor polling locations in Maryland, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0082330

"We're going to make certain everyone is going to get an opportunity to vote without any interference," said Dr. Eugene Rogers, president of the Northern Oakland County Branch of the NAACP.

NAACP To Watch Polling Places (BSUN)

By Kelly Brewington, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, October 17, 2006

Group will look for voting problems on Election Day in Md., 9 other states

With problems from Maryland's chaotic primary elections still being sorted out, NAACP President and CEO Bruce S. Gordon said yesterday that the civil rights organization will monitor polls in Maryland and nine other states on Election Day and report any voting irregularities to the U.S. Justice Department.

But Gordon also called on Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. to take steps before Nov. 7 to ensure a smooth and fair election by fixing the shortage of poll workers and the malfunctioning electronic voter check-in system.

"With all the concerns that were raised, we intend to be proactive and put necessary safeguards in place so that every citizen who wishes to vote has that right," Gordon said at the headquarters of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Baltimore.

The plan announced yesterday would continue recent election-monitoring efforts by the NAACP, in which volunteers have looked for irregularities.

During the 2004 presidential elections, the civil rights organization and its partners enlisted 25,000 volunteers to monitor precincts nationwide and to answer a toll-free voter assistance hot line. Nearly 5,000 of those volunteers were attorneys, prepared to challenge voting irregularities with lawsuits.

Last month, the NAACP's national office and some local branches received complaints from frustrated voters in Maryland's primary, prompting the group and the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights to seek a court order extending poll hours in some jurisdictions by an hour.

In a letter sent to Ehrlich, Gordon peppered the governor with numerous requests: verify that precincts have sufficient provisional ballots; update the check-in system; devise a contingency plan in case machines malfunction; hold additional demonstrations of new voting machines; ensure adequate numbers of election judges; maintain privacy for voters and educate voters on absentee ballots.

But Gordon questioned Ehrlich's recent recommendation that voters worried about the state's voting system vote by absentee ballot.

"Absentee voting normally has not served the African-American community very well," he said during yesterday's news conference.

Gordon and Ehrlich discussed the matter by phone yesterday morning. By the afternoon, Ehrlich followed up with a letter saying he shares Gordon's concerns and that he has asked the State Board of Elections and the state elections administrator to develop a contingency plan and to upgrade the electronic check-in system.

Ehrlich said he would forward Gordon's letter to the chairman of the elections board, asking that the board respond within the week.

In his letter, the Republican governor blamed the Democratic-controlled General Assembly for "virtually eliminating accountability at the top level of the state's elections system," with legislation that prevents the governor from firing the elections administrator, a Democrat with whom Ehrlich has had bitter clashes.

Ehrlich also accused legislative leaders of failing to heed warnings from a voting commission he named this year.

"In their rush to gain every political advantage, the leadership of the General Assembly ignored these warnings and created the unstable elections system that we saw in the primary and still face in the General Election," Ehrlich wrote in his letter to Gordon.

With the fiercely contested campaign for governor in the final stretch, each major political party has blamed the other for the state's voting problems.

Ross Goldstein, deputy state elections administrator, would not comment on Ehrlich's letter, but defended the voting system. He said it makes voting more accessible and eliminates errors, though he added he would look forward to a discussion with the NAACP.

"We'd be happy to sit down and work with the NAACP and address their concerns," Goldstein said. "I think all of the concerns they have raised are things that we have taken a look at. We want people to feel comfortable coming to the polls and voting."

In an interview yesterday, however, Gordon expressed little confidence in the state's electronic voting system.

DOJ_NMG_0082331

"We know the Diebold machines are unreliable," he said, referring to the manufacturer of the state's touch-screen voting equipment. "You have high-ranking officials in Maryland questioning the voting system. If they are concerned, well, we are certainly concerned."

The NAACP's monitoring effort, dubbed "election protection," is a partnership with the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and People for the American Way. Attorneys and volunteers from the groups will answer a toll-free election hot line (1-866-OUR-VOTE) set up at the NAACP's Baltimore headquarters.

In addition, volunteers will monitor the polls at targeted precincts in Baltimore City and Baltimore, Howard, Anne Arundel, Prince George's and Montgomery counties.

Beyond Maryland, the NAACP plans to post volunteers in Michigan, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Texas, Ohio, Georgia and Pennsylvania.

Gordon said the NAACP chose those states because the group has either received complaints about voting there in the past, or because voters are set to act on significant civil rights issues.

Michigan voters, for example, will vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to ban the use of race and gender in university admissions and government hiring. The NAACP has spoken out against the proposal.

Given the issues at hand, voter turnout is critical, Gordon said.

"Civil rights activists went to extraordinary lengths to earn the right for black Americans to vote," he said. "We owe it to them and ourselves to honor their sacrifice by voting, no matter what challenges we face."

Marvin L. "Doc" Cheatham, president of the NAACP's Baltimore branch, said he's most concerned about the ability of the city's board of elections, where he once served as president, to obtain an adequate number of election judges.

"No election board wants what happened during the primary to happen again," he said. "I think they are working hard. Nevertheless, we'll be here this Election Day from 6 in the morning until 11 at night."

kelly.brewington@baltsun.com

NAACP To Monitor Polls For Problems In 10 States (WT)

By Brian Debose, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 17, 2006

The NAACP yesterday said it will send monitors to polls in 10 states, including Maryland, where voting problems have been reported in recent years.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People conducts monitoring at the polls every midterm and presidential election year.

Bruce S. Gordon, the NAACP president and chief executive officer, said he was prompted to announce the group's program this year because of reputed wide-ranging voter irregularities in several Maryland counties, including Baltimore, where the organization is headquartered.

"In light of the problems in the state during last month's primary elections caused by malfunctioning computer equipment and human error, I am pleased to see that you have ordered backup paper ballots to avoid some of the problems with the touch-screen voting machines," Mr. Gordon wrote in a letter to Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican.

In the letter, Mr. Gordon commended Mr. Ehrlich for ordering that backup paper ballots be used to avoid any problems with the touch-screen voting machines.

He also requested the governor order the Board of Elections to hold statewide demonstrations of the new machines, ensure that the electronic registration rolls are updated, and make certain there are adequate numbers of trained election judges at the polls on time and for the entire day.

In addition, he asked that each precinct have a sufficient number of provisional ballots -- many ran out during the primaries -- and maintain privacy for voters, whether they vote using touch-screen or paper ballots.

The NAACP will run an Election Day voter command center at the Baltimore headquarters. Volunteers will observe targeted precincts in the Baltimore area and Prince Georges and Montgomery counties, where the majority of the irregularities occurred.

The voter command center will also be staffed with lawyers from the group's partnering organizations, including the liberal Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and People for the American Way, to monitor complaints of voter irregularities and to advise voters experiencing problems at the polls.

The groups will forward any major problems to the Justice Department for further investigation.

The other nine states were chosen because they have pivotal elections, high concentrations of black voters or a history of polling problems, including Gulf Coast states Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida and Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0082332

The dispersal of residents from those states after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit last year prompted the NAACP to start a registration campaign to help evacuees register to vote in their new location or maintain their home-state registration.

The NAACP will also be monitoring elections in Michigan and Ohio, which had rampant complaints of insufficient voting machines, fewer polling places and polls opening late during the 2004 presidential election.

Georgia and Pennsylvania were selected randomly, said officials of the NAACP, which has established a toll-free number (1-866-OUR-VOTE) to report Election Day voting problems.

NAACP Will Monitor Polls For Voting Irregularities (WP)

By Rosalind S. Helderman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Volunteers for the NAACP will fan out at select polling stations across Maryland on Election Day to monitor balloting for problems similar to those that plagued the September primary.

The group said that poll watchers will observe precincts in Prince George's and Montgomery counties and in Baltimore and that lawyers will be available to document complaints from voters and, if necessary, forward reports of irregularities to the U.S. Justice Department. Maryland is one of 10 states the civil rights organization plans to monitor that day.

During September's primary, some polls in Maryland opened late because election judges or technicians did not show up. Also, an electronic registration system regularly crashed, and many poll workers had trouble submitting results electronically at the end of the day.

The NAACP called on Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) to take all necessary steps to protect voters from technical glitches with machines and mistakes made by inexperienced or poorly trained poll workers.

"While the NAACP will take steps to counter obstacles to voter participation, we are encouraging our communities to cast their votes, even if it requires extra effort," said Bruce S. Gordon, NAACP president and chief executive.

In turn, Ehrlich called on the state's Board of Elections to make certain the group's concerns are addressed.

"To ensure that every Marylander has access to a fair and accurate election system, the state Board of Elections must act expeditiously to address my concerns and those of the NAACP," he said.

In Prince George's, where election officials are still looking for hundreds of new poll workers for the election, Interim Elections Administrator Robert J. Antonetti Sr. urged the NAACP to send volunteers for training.

"Everyone loves to come and observe," he said. "Let them participate."

John White, NAACP communications director, said the group is encouraging members to volunteer as judges even as it establishes its national monitoring program. Other states the group will monitor on Election Day are Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Texas, Michigan, Ohio, Georgia and Pennsylvania.

Barnes Sues Perdue Over Voter Letter Photo ID Information May Have Misinformed (AJC)

By Ernie Suggs, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 17, 2006

Former Gov. Roy Barnes has filed a lawsuit against his successor, Gov. Sonny Perdue, and the State Election Board for the mailing of 200,000 letters to registered Georgia voters that suggested a photo ID was needed to vote in the Nov. 7 general election.

The problem? The letters were sent out days after a judge ruled the law requiring a photo ID to be unconstitutional.

Barnes filed the civil suit Monday in Fulton Superior Court on behalf of a 60-year old disabled Atlanta woman, Rosalind Lake, who does not have a state-issued photo ID.

In the complaint, the governor and election board are charged with contempt for violating a court order that struck down the photo ID law. Barnes is asking the court to force the state to send out another letter informing registered voters that they do not need a photo ID to vote.

"The delivery of approximately 200,000 'Dear Georgia Voter' letters was a blatant action in which seriously incorrect information on voting was disseminated to a substantial number of Georgia voters," Barnes wrote in the motion filed Monday. "The events after this Court's order make clear that the violation was deliberate."

A hearing has been scheduled for 2 p.m. Friday in the chambers of Fulton Superior Court Judge T. Jackson Bedford.

"I hope this means there will be a full public airing of the Republican attempt to suppress voter participation," said David Worley, a Democrat-appointed member of the election board who had threatened to file a complaint with the U.S. Justice Department about the mailing of the letters.

On Sept. 19, Bedford ruled Georgia's voter ID law violated the state Constitution. At the time of the ruling, the election board was in the process of sending out 300,000 letters to registered voters who did not have a driver's license or photo ID.

DOJ_NMG_0082333

The so-called "Dear Georgia Voter" letter was part of a voter education campaign designed to remind voters about the January legislation that required voters to show one of six forms of government-issued photo identification at the polls. But Barnes and others are contending that after Bedford's ruling, the mailing of letters should have been stopped.

Tex McIver, the Republican-appointed vice chairman of the election board, initially told the election board that all but 20,000 letters had been sent out before the Sept. 19 ruling. But, the secretary of state's election division later confirmed that nearly 200,000 letters were mailed after Sept. 19.

"We would suggest, because they couldn't have the law upheld, they were going to do indirectly what they couldn't do directly," said Jennifer Jordan, an attorney with Barnes' firm. "Which is basically to suppress the vote of the certain portion of the electorate. And using tax-payer money."

The board spent $55,000 to mail the 300,000 letters.

The election board has scheduled a special called meeting at 3 p.m. today. McIver said that at the meeting he will propose developing a public service announcement and a postcard mailer to send to voters to clear up any confusion that voters might have.

"Let's get rid of the issue," said McIver, who headed up the letter program. "I don't think the letter was confusing. But if people are confused, let's fix it."

Perdue did not comment on the motion.

"This situation obviously will not be decided by the courts until after the election," said Dan McLagan, a spokesman for Perdue. "In the meantime, the governor wants to encourage everyone who is registered to get out and vote."

Missouri State Supreme Court Strikes Down Voter ID Law (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kelly Wiese, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

(AP) - JEFFERSON CITY, Missouri-The Missouri Supreme Court on Monday struck down a new law requiring voters to show a photo identification at the polls, upholding a lower judge's decision.

Supporters of the ID requirement, mostly Republicans, said it was necessary to prevent voter fraud and increase confidence in the election process.

Opponents, primarily Democrats, argued people impersonating others when voting is rare, and that the ID requirement would especially harm the poor, elderly and disabled who may be less likely to have a driver's license.

A lower judge ruled last month that the ID requirement was an unconstitutional infringement on the fundamental right to vote. The Supreme Court agreed in a 6-1 unsigned opinion.

The law required voters to present a photo identification card issued by Missouri or the federal government to cast a ballot starting with the November election.

The court found the requirement violated several provisions in the state constitution. The court said requiring otherwise legitimate voters to obtain an appropriate ID imposed too big a burden on their voting rights.

The law would have allowed those lacking such an ID this fall to cast a provisional ballot upon meeting certain conditions. In future elections, only the elderly, disabled and those with religious objections to carrying a photo ID could vote without one, and only by provisional ballot.

Provisional ballots are set apart from regular ballots, and election authorities later determine whether they should count by, among other things, checking whether their signatures match those on file and if they're in the right polling place.

Meanwhile, lawyers opposing the state of Georgia's photo ID law asked a judge to hold the state in contempt for misinforming more than 200,000 voters in a mass mailing that they had to provide some form of photo ID.

The mailing was sent after a court order blocked the law's enforcement for the November general election.

Attorneys are also asking the judge to force the state to send new letters to those voters.

In all, the State Board of Elections mailed more than 300,000 letters to registered voters, telling them they may need to show either a free Georgia voter identification card or one of six forms of photo ID to vote in person. The letter also reminded voters they could vote absentee without a photo ID.

Attorney Jennifer Auer Jordan, who is working with former Georgia Gov. Roy Barnes to oppose the photo ID law, said Monday the mailings were a direct and deliberate violation of the court's order.

Although time is short, she said, "We've got to do whatever we can do to make sure that everybody knows they have the right to vote and if they want to show up at the general election, they can," she said.

The board of elections has called a special meeting Tuesday to discuss the photo ID law.

Agents Take Jail Records (BSH)

DOJ_NMG_0082334

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, October 17, 2006

GULFPORT - The federal government removed boxes of jail records last week from the Harrison County Sheriff's Office for its investigation of an inmate's death and related allegations, U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said on Monday.

Lampton told the Sun Herald that the FBI and prosecutors from the Justice Department's civil rights criminal division took records last week from the sheriff's Gulfport offices at the Harrison County Courthouse and the Harrison County Adult Detention Center.

Lampton said there was no need to use search warrants because Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. and his new warden, Don Cabana, have been "100 percent cooperative." But, he said, "they can't be a part of the investigation."

"When we get to the bottom of everything, people can be secure or satisfied to know everything at that jail has been looked at, and anything that might have been done improperly has been corrected."

Removal of the recordsis the latest in a series of new developments in criminal matters surrounding the death of Jessie Lee Williams Jr. Williams, 40, died after a beating on Feb. 4 in the jail booking room. He was taken off life-support at a hospital within two days, and his death was later ruled a homicide.

Former corrections officer Regina Rhodes, 29, was to be sentenced Monday on guilty pleas to criminal accusations that she assaulted Williams and lied to cover it up. She accepted a plea agreement and became a government witness.

Court records show sentencing was delayed "in the interests of justice" until after the trial of former corrections officer Ryan Teel, 29. Prosecutors' motion to request a delay in Rhodes' sentencing suggests that Teel's trial, set for the Nov. 6 federal document, also may be continued.

Rhodes, who remains free on bond, faces up to 13 years, but she likely will receive a reduced sentence for cooperating with the federal investigation. She is bound by a plea agreement to testify at any future trial regarding any related case at state or federal levels.

Teel, accused of inflicting injuries resulting in death and lying about it, is charged with two counts: deprivation of rights under color of law and destruction, alteration or falsification of records in federal investigations. Deprivation of rights is punishable by any number of years to life in prison. The other count is punishable by up to 20 years.

Prosecutors have not sought the death penalty, but Teel's attorney has referenced that possibility in a flurry of motions that request a change of venue, suppression of evidence including Williams' death certificate and subpoenas of media reports.

Teel remains in custody without bond.

An edited version of Rhodes' plea agreement, recently unsealed, identifies Teel as her occasional supervisor and claims Teel was the principal officer who assaulted Williams with unjustified use of force.

The edited version, first published in court records, had portions of the text blacked out and alleged that Rhodes' occasional supervisor and other corrections officers routinely used unnecessary force against inmates and presented "false, incomplete and misleading" reports to cover it up.

The unsealed version shows Teel's name in portions that previously were blacked out.

Teel and Rhodes are being prosecuted under federal statutes that apply to civil rights violations under color of law.

Payne would neither confirm nor deny that federal agents took jail records last week, but he did say he and his department are cooperating with the investigation.

Sources to the Sun Herald claim federal agents went in with search warrants and bolt cutters and loaded boxes of files and computers into the back of a truck.

Lampton said search warrants weren't necessary.

"You've heard the old saying, 'don't make a federal case out of it.' That is the truth," Lampton said. "The federal government doesn't take on every case, but when we do take on a case, you'd better watch out. The federal government may be slow, but we are thorough."

Supreme Court Turns Away Scouts Appeal (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a setback for the Boy Scouts, the Supreme Court turned away a free-speech challenge to a Berkeley policy that denies city-subsidized dock space to a Scouting group because it excludes gays and atheists.

The court's action lets stand rulings in California and elsewhere that have said cities, schools and colleges may deny public benefits to groups that refuse to comply with broad nondiscrimination rules involving religion and sex orientation.

Some conservative groups had joined the challenge to the Berkeley policy, saying that advocates of "traditional moral values" are being subjected to discrimination across the country by "politically correct" government officials.

DOJ_NMG_0082335

The court's action sets no legal precedent, however, and the justices could well take up the issue in the future.

Six years ago, the high court came to the aid of the Boy Scouts of America when it ruled that a state cannot force a private group, such as the Scouts, to include openly gay men if doing so would violate its professed code of conduct. In that case, James Dale, a former scoutmaster, had sued the group after he was excluded upon acknowledging he was gay.

The New Jersey courts said the Scouts must abide by the state's anti-discrimination law.

The Supreme Court disagreed in a 5-4 decision in the case of Boys Scouts vs. Dale.

But in the wake of the Scouts' victory, some cities and school districts refused to permit Scouting groups to use their facilities on the same basis as they allowed other nonprofit organizations.

Lawyers for the Scouts then went back to court to challenge this exclusion as unconstitutional discrimination. So far, however, they have been rebuffed.

Harold Johnson, an attorney for the Pacific Legal Foundation, which presented the appeal, said he was disappointed the court refused to hear the case.

"We are confident that, eventually, the court will take a case addressing the underlying issues, because there are too many examples of government discrimination against Scouting and other belief-based organizations to ignore," he said in a statement.

For many years, Berkeley had given a rent-free berth in its marina to nonprofit community service organizations, including the Sea Scouts. An affiliate of the Boy Scouts, the group teaches sailing and seamanship to teenagers.

But the Berkeley City Council adopted a new policy that required groups that wanted a free berth to agree in writing that they would not discriminate against persons based on, among other factors, their race, religion, ethnicity or sexual orientation. The Scouts did not sign the agreement because Boy Scouts policy excludes gays and atheists.

Eugene Evans, an adult leader of the Sea Scouts, agreed to pay $500 a month to maintain the berth in the Berkeley marina, but he also led a lawsuit that challenged the policy as violating the group's rights to freedom of speech and the equal protection of the laws. He argued the Scouts were being treated as "second-class citizens" because their views on religion and homosexuality were disfavored by the government.

He lost decisively in the California courts.

In March, the California Supreme Court upheld Berkeley's policy in a unanimous ruling. "Berkeley had not attempted to muzzle anyone's speech," said the state high court. "A government entity may constitutionally require a recipient of funding or subsidy to provide written, unambiguous assurances of compliance with a generally applicable nondiscrimination policy."

The Scouts hoped for a more sympathetic hearing from the Supreme Court. The Pacific Legal Foundation, which is based in Sacramento, said the California ruling "sets an ominous precedent" for Scouting groups. Former Atty. Gen. Edwin M. Meese III, U.S. Rep. Dan Lungren (R-Gold River) and other conservative lawyers backed the appeal and noted that some Christian groups have been denied recognition or funding on college campuses because they too exclude gays and atheists.

"Millions of Americans who believe in traditional moral and religious values are looking to this court to uphold the constitutional rights and equal treatment under the law," they said in a friend-of-the-court brief.

But in a one-line order, the court refused to hear the case of Evans vs. City of Berkeley.

Lawyers for Berkeley had argued that since Evans had appealed on his own, he did not truly speak for the Sea Scouts. Although the justices gave no explanation for refusing to hear the case, this could have figured in the decision.

Evans and the scouting group declined to comment on Monday.

53% Of Voters Say They Back Va. Same-Sex Marriage Ban (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

A majority of Virginians support a proposed constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage and civil unions, although voters split on the measure when presented with interpretations of its potential impact, according to a new Washington Post poll.

Fifty-three percent of likely voters said they would vote for the amendment, and 43 percent would oppose it, the poll found, indicating that three weeks before Election Day opponents still have a long way to go to make Virginia the first state in the country to defeat a same-sex marriage amendment.

The only part of the state to oppose the measure was Northern Virginia, where voters rejected it 55 percent to 42 percent, further evidence that the Washington suburbs have become a political and social world apart from the rest of Virginia. Respondents in the rest of the state backed the measure 58 percent to 38 percent, according to the survey, conducted over three days last week.

DOJ_NMG_0082336

Despite the overall results, the poll provided some hope for opponents of the measure. Their chief argument is that the language of the amendment is too broad and would endanger contracts between unwed heterosexual couples. Supporters contend that the measure is limited to declaring that same-sex marriages would never be approved or recognized in Virginia.

When respondents were read the arguments on both sides of the question, enough voters showed a willingness to reconsider that the gap narrowed to a virtual tie -- 48 percent said they supported the measure and 47 percent opposed it, within the poll's margin of error of three percentage points.

"I really do think that we need an amendment like this that defines marriage," said Ross Williams, 50, a salesman from Annandale, who considers himself a Republican and a likely voter for Sen. George Allen (R) in his reelection bid Nov. 7. "But we don't need to pass something that we don't know what it's going to do. I wouldn't call myself an undecided voter yet . . . but I am going to read the wording and make up my mind about what it's going to do before I vote."

The poll also found that Virginians are virtually split over whether gay couples should be able to form civil unions, which would give them health insurance, inheritance benefits and other legal rights of married couples. The poll found that 48 percent believe gay couples should be allowed to engage in civil unions and 47 percent do not. The amendment would constitutionally ban civil unions between gay couples, although they are already illegal in Virginia.

"We've been seeing this for a long time now: When people read the entire question and think about what it means, they vote no," said Claire Guthrie Gastanaga, campaign director for the Commonwealth Coalition, the group organizing opposition to the amendment.

Victoria Cobb, executive director of the Family Foundation, said that she believed the amendment would pass and that voters understood that the ballot question was simply about defining marriage. She said an internal poll conducted by the group found strong support for the measure.

"We are very confident that Virginia is going to join the other 20 states that have passed constitutional amendments," she said. "Virginians know this is about marriage between one man and one woman, and we have complete confidence that when they step into the voting booth, they will vote for traditional marriage."

Several political scientists who have studied state ballot measures said the polling data from Virginia appeared to defy expectations, given the commonwealth's reputation as a conservative state.

"This is quite a surprise," said Daniel A. Smith, an associate professor of political science at the University of Florida. "In an ostensibly conservative state like Virginia, you'd expect to see the numbers up around 60 or 70 percent."

The lower numbers in Virginia reflect a national trend of weakening support for state efforts to ban same-sex marriage, several experts said. Twenty states have passed similar measures since 1998, many with about 75 percent support. The lowest level of support an amendment received was 57 percent in Oregon in 2004.

But this year, poll results in several states with similar ballot measures show weaker support than in 2004, when 11 states passed constitutional amendments. Polls in Colorado and Wisconsin show results similar to Virginia's; poll results in South Dakota are mixed.

John C. Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum for Religion and Public Life, said the momentum for such amendments at the ballot box has been hurt by recent court cases that have upheld bans on same-sex marriages.

"Two things seem to be going on," Green said. "Opponents [of same sex marriage amendments] are much more organized than they were two years ago. And if you look at what judges have been doing over the past year . . . they've been supporting the definitions of traditional marriage. So some of the edge is off."

The constitutional amendment received its strongest support from Republicans, blacks and those who say they go to church more than once a month, reflecting national trends.

"My religion teaches that marriage is between a man and a woman, and quite frankly, that's all I need to help me understand how I need to vote," said Sandy Ledford, 57, a housewife from Botetourt County, in the state's rural southwest. "It's pretty simple for me."

"I'm not a homophobe," said Charles Wortham, 60, a dentist from Hanover County, outside Richmond. "My view is simply that marriage is there to establish a legal process for the procreation of children. It's Mother Nature. Same-sex couples can't naturally reproduce, so it doesn't seem like they should be able to marry like a traditional family."

Wortham said that he had heard the arguments raised by opponents regarding the measure's unintended consequences but that he didn't believe the claims. "I don't think any of that stuff is going to happen," he said.

The Washington Post poll is based on telephone interviews with 1,004 randomly selected Virginia likely voters and was conducted Oct. 10-12.

The poll results generally hewed to party lines: Seventy-five percent of Republicans back the amendment, and 59 percent of Democrats oppose it. Independents were nearly split, with 49 percent against it and 45 percent for it.

DOJ_NMG_0082337

Seventy-three percent of people who also said they would vote to reelect Allen backed the amendment, and 23 percent said they'll vote against it. Two-thirds of those who support Allen but oppose the amendment are women.

Among those who said they would vote for Democrat James Webb for U.S. Senate, 67 percent opposed the measure and 31 percent supported it. Allen favors the amendment, and Webb is opposed because he thinks the language goes beyond prohibiting same-sex marriage. Webb believes marriage is between one man and one woman.

The only group to significantly cross party lines was blacks. In the poll, blacks supported Webb by 81 percent to 11 percent, but they favored the amendment 61 percent to 34 percent. "I don't believe in gay relationships; I just don't believe that they are right," said Aaron Moore, 26, from Chesapeake, who added that he follows the Pentecostal faith and will vote for Webb. "Even though I'm a Democrat, it's just something that I disagree with most Democrats on."

Whites supported the measure 51 percent to 45 percent, the poll found.

Opponents of the measure include Democrats, those who said they do not attend church often and political independents. "These kinds of rights, being able to get married, they should be open to everybody," said Beverly Gordon, 51, a teacher from Hampton. "Voting, access to schools, marriage -- these are all things that people should have equal ability to have."

Others said they were concerned about unintended consequences. The amendment "doesn't specify anywhere that it's talking only about homosexual couples," said Faye Talhame, 49, a real estate agent from Loudoun County. "This goes way too far. Who knows what it would do? Why do we want to pass such a thing?"

ANTITRUST:

U.S. Extends SRAM Antitrust Probe To Samsung (IDG)

By Ben Ames, IDG News Service, Boston Bureau

IDG News Service, October 17, 2006

Antitrust investigators with the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) have issued a subpoena to Samsung Semiconductor Inc., just hours after asking its competitors Mitsubishi Electric Corp. and Cypress Semiconductor Corp. for information about their sales practices in the SRAM (static RAM) chip market.

Toshiba, another major SRAM chip producer, declined to comment on whether it had also been subpoenaed. A spokeswoman referred questions to the company's Tokyo headquarters.

Samsung plans to comply with the request for information about sales and marketing practices throughout the industry, spokeswoman Chris Goodhart said in a statement.

"Samsung will cooperate fully with the Department of Justice on this matter," she said. "Samsung is committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior."

Samsung has already been charged with antitrust violations in a DOJ investigation of the DRAM (dynamic RAM) market. Justice Department lawyers found evidence that several DRAM chip makers manipulated prices while bidding for business with the U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Apple Computer Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co. and IBM Corp. Several DRAM makers have been ordered to pay fines as high as US$300 million and three Samsung executives were sentenced to time in prison.

SRAM chips can retain data as long as they have power, and are typically used as a memory buffer in devices such as computers and hard-disk drives, or to handle data in low-power devices like mobile phones.

Microsoft Sharing Security Data (SEAPI)

By Dan Richman, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 17, 2006

But software makers say it's still too little, too late

Striving to satisfy European antitrust officials, Microsoft Corp. said Monday that it has given security-software makers some of the data they want to make their products work with Microsoft's forthcoming operating system, Windows Vista.

But one of those companies, Cupertino, Calif.-based Symantec Corp., on Monday reacted to the release by repeating complaints it made at the end of last week: that it's not getting enough information fast enough.

"The operative question remains 'When?' " Symantec spokesman Cris Payden said. "When are we going to get what we need?"

Microsoft Director Adrien Robinson said the means of connecting outside software to Vista's Windows Security Center were uploaded Monday morning to a Web site accessible only by security-software developers.

The Security Center is a set of on-screen controls -- nicknamed the "digital dashboard" -- that customers will use to adjust and monitor their computer's security features.

DOJ_NMG_0082338

Symantec's Paden said the company is inspecting the new Web site "to be sure it has everything we need to let our customers see our digital dashboard instead of Microsoft's."

Microsoft also said Monday that it plans to discuss with Symantec and McAfee Inc. changes they want made to Patch Guard, part of the 64-bit version of Vista that restricts who can alter the operating system's core, or kernel.

But Paden said Microsoft has yet to explain how Symantec's technology can access 64-bit Vista's kernel, or even to say when it will provide that explanation. The 64-bit version of Vista is expected to be popular among businesses, he said.

Microsoft's Robinson responded that the company plans to release more information within 30 to 45 days on the nature and extent of access it will allow to the kernel. She said it will provide that access after Vista for business ships and plans to continually update that package.

As to the developers' impatience, she said: "It requires efforts on both sides. The more they can engage with us, the faster we can get functionality out."

Microsoft's information sharing is an attempt to address the European Union's competitive concerns so it can release Vista on schedule in Europe.

Microsoft said Friday that the guidance it had received from the EU, and the changes it's making in response, have persuaded it to proceed with the product's worldwide release schedule.

"We tried to digest their feedback and take action, and then understand whether we thought that that would really put us in that position where we were in compliance with EU law, which we think we are," Microsoft Chief Executive Steve Ballmer said on the sidelines of a news conference Monday in Rome.

Vista is due out to business customers next month and to consumers in January. But the EU antitrust office has refused to back Microsoft's optimism that European concerns had been resolved.

"The jury is out," EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said Friday.

The EU and Microsoft have fought for years, and the 25-nation bloc levied a fine of $613 million on Microsoft in 2004.

McAfee didn't respond to repeated requests for comment Monday.

This report includes information from Bloomberg News and The Associated Press. P-I reporter Dan Richman can be reached at 206-448-8032 or danrichman@seattlepi.com.

HP Extends Tender Offer For Mercury (FT)

By Kevin Allison In San Francisco

Financial Times, October 17, 2006

Hewlett-Packard, the world's second-biggest computer maker, on Monday announced a further extension of its tender offer for Mercury Interactive, a business software group that was forced to de-list its shares earlier this year because of stock options backdating.

The move marked the third time HP has extended its tender offer, which values the software maker at $4.5bn. It came in spite of news that HP had locked up more than 90 per cent of Mercury's oustanding shares - far more than the amount needed to complete the company's biggest acquisition since its $19bn takeover of Compaq, a rival computer maker, in 2002.

One person familiar with the matter said Mercury's de-lisitng had complicated efforts to receive anti-trust approvals from regulators. The person said the delays were procedural and nature and were not expected to infuence the outcome of the tender offer.

HP declined to comment.

Katherine Egbert, an analyst at Jeffries & Co, said she was confident the deal was still on track. "I don't think anyone thinks it's at risk," she said. "HP want to compete more with IBM, and what they're missing is a substantial software business."

HP's tender offer values Mercury at $4.5bn, or $52 a share - a 33 per cent premium over the comapny's share price the day before the deal was announced in July.

Mercury's shares have traded on the over-the-counter market since January, when they were delisted from the Nasdaq stock market for non-compliance with filing requirements. Mercury has offered to pay $35m to settle backdating claims with the US Securities and Exchange Commission.

More than 100 companies are under investigation in the widening scandal over stock options backdating, which has recently claimed the jobs of several top executives, including William McGuire, the chief executive of UnitedHealth, one of the biggest US health insurers. Amnon Landan, Mercury's former chief executive, and two other top managers were forced out in November 2005 because of the scandal.

E.On Lawsuit Claims Acciona Misled SEC On Interest In Endesa (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082339

E.On AG said it filed a lawsuit in New York to clarify a situation about Endesa SA shares held by Spanish energy-and-construction company Acciona SA.

E.On, a German energy company, has accused Acciona of making misleading statements to the Securities and Exchange Commission about its strategic targets in buying a 10% stake in Endesa. Acciona denied the charges.

E.On has offered €37 billion, or about $46 billion, to take over Endesa, or €35 a share. It had bid €25.40 a share but increased its offer after Acciona bought a 10% stake in the Spanish utility to become its biggest shareholder.

E.On's lawsuit says information Acciona filed to the SEC was "false, inexact and incomplete" among other things, because "Acciona has contracts with third parties who intend to block E.On's bid." An E.On spokeswoman said it is unclear how many Endesa shares Acciona controls and whether Acciona has agreements with third parties on further share purchases.

Acciona said the New York court decided to request more information about the case but declined to grant the injunction by which E.On had sought to block any further stake buildup in Endesa by Acciona.

Silverman Testifies On Walter Forbes' Role In Cendant Merger (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 17, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. — The retrial of former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes took a new twist Monday when Henry Silverman, the hard-driving founder of HFS, testified about his decision to merge HFS in 1997 with Forbes' firm, CUC International, to form Cendant.

Following the merger, in April 1998, Cendant disclosed that CUC executives had overstated their company's revenue by hundreds of millions of dollars.

The disclosure shocked investors, who went on a selling spree, wiping out $14 billion, or half the company's market capitalization, in one day.

Nine years have passed since the revelation of the fraud. Several former CUC executives pleaded guilty to manipulating the company's earnings and have cooperated with prosecutors. E. Kirk Shelton, the former chief operating officer, was convicted by a jury in 2005 and sentenced to 10 years in jail.

But Forbes, 63, has fought the government to a draw. His previous two trials have ended in hung juries.

This third trial, which began last week in federal court here, promised to be a replay of the last two until Silverman took the witness stand Monday.

Before the CUC blow-up, Silverman, 66, was known as a take-no-prisoners CEO who always delivered earnings to Wall Street. He told jurors that after he and Forbes agreed to merge their companies in 1997, they went on a “road show” to convince investors that the match-up would increase shareholder value.

Forbes, he said, did most of the talking about the merged company's strategic vision.

“I was blown away,” Silverman said. “I thought it was incredibly compelling. It was a complex subject, one in which Walter Forbes displayed quite a lot of knowledge. It was a very impressive performance.”

A few months after agreeing to merge the companies, Silverman testified, Forbes told him he was “depressed and unhappy” about the direction the merger was taking. Silverman drove from Manhattan up to Connecticut, where Forbes' business was based, to find out what the problem was. At the coffee shop of a nearby hotel, Forbes complained that Silverman's team was acting as though HFS was buying CUC.

In a previous trial, Forbes testified about the same meeting. But on Monday, Silverman disclosed for the first time that the defendant was particularly concerned about the fate of one employee in CUC's accounting department, Anne Pember. Forbes allegedly told Silverman that Pember was “kind of the glue that keeps the company together” and that if she left, lots of other people would follow.

Pember, who pleaded guilty and testified against Shelton two years ago, said last week that she had very little direct contact with Forbes. It wasn't until the merger with HFS took place that Forbes insisted she stay on to help with certain accounting issues, she testified.

Later this week, the government is expected to call CUC's former CFO, Cosmo Corigliano, to testify. Corigliano has pleaded guilty and is the only CUC executive to allege that Forbes was directly involved in the fraud.

Oshkosh Truck To Buy JLG Industries For $3 Billion (NYT/AP)

The New York Times-AP, October 17, 2006

MILWAUKEE (AP) -- Military and commercial vehicle maker Oshkosh Truck Corp. on Monday said it is buying JLG Industries Inc., a maker of aerial work platforms and booms, for about $3 billion in cash.

DOJ_NMG_0082340

Oshkosh chairman, president and CEO Robert G. Bohn said the deal continues Oshkosh's transformation into a global specialty vehicle maker.

"We will have the size and the scale to be more competitive in the market, and we will be generating a significant amount of cash, cash that we will use to rapidly pay down our debt," Bohn said in a conference call Monday.

The deal, which has been approved by the boards of both companies and still requires the approval from JLG shareholders and antitrust regulators, is expected to close in early December.

The company agreed to pay $28 per share for JLG, which represents a 35 percent premium over the stock's Friday closing price of $20.75. According to the New York Stock Exchange, JLG has 106.7 million shares outstanding.

Oshkosh will also assume more than $200 million in JLG debt as part of the deal.

JLG shares climbed $6.78, or nearly 33 percent, to $27.53 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange while Oshkosh shares sank $3.02, or 5.4 percent, to $52.52.

Oshkosh, which plans to finance the purchase with a $3.5 billion line of credit from Bank of America, expects the deal to add "modestly" to per-share earnings in fiscal 2007.

JLG, based in McConnellsburg, Pa., had $2.3 billion in revenues this fiscal year, with sales estimated to grow between 20 and 25 percent next year, Oshkosh said. The company is the top provider of aerial platforms in North America and Europe.

Oshkosh already has 9,400 employees and will be adding JLG's 4,000, it said. JLG, which makes the Manlift and Toucan brands of aerial work platforms and Caterpillar-branded telehandlers, has manufacturing plants in the U.S., Belgium and France. Aerial work platforms lift workers so they can perform tasks at heights they could not otherwise reach while telehandlers are similar to cranes that lift building materials.

There will be no cuts to factory jobs, said Charles L. Szews, Oshkosh executive vice president and chief financial officer. Oshkosh also expects key officers of JLG to remain, he said.

Bohn said the company estimates annual growth between 3 percent and 6 percent through 2010, with JLG eventually making up 40 percent of sales and income. The integration of JLG should take between 18 and 24 months, Oshkosh said.

Bohn said he was excited about "the opportunity to grow this business on a global basis and to share the best practices between the two companies."

JLG chairman, president and CEO William M. Lasky said the company expects an easy transition into Oshkosh. JLG was not for sale when Oshkosh approached them, he said.

"To be honest, I was hoping to find a reason why I didn't think it would be a good fit for JLG. Unfortunately, that didn't last very long when I looked at the success and track record of Oshkosh," Lasky said.

Also this year, Oshkosh announced cash deals to buy AK Specialty Vehicles from medical device maker HealthTronics Inc. for $140 million and Iowa Mold Tooling Co., a maker of general mechanics, for $131 million.

Macquarie Wins Battle For Thames Water (FT)

By Lina Saigol And Rebecca Bream

Financial Times, October 17, 2006

Macquarie, the Australian bank, on Monday night won the hotly contested auction for Thames Water, the UK's biggest water company, which is being sold by RWE, the German utility group, in a deal valued at £8bn.

Macquarie's European infrastructure fund is leading a consortium called Kemble Water, which bid the highest price for Thames.

It beat three other serious bidders in the auction, including Qatar Investment Authority, which had teamed up with UBS's global infrastructure fund.

The Thames deal, which includes £3.2bn of debt, is subject to approval by RWE's supervisory board at a weekend meeting. If approved, the sale is due to close by early December.

The deal marks the biggest buy-out in the UK this year.

Terra Firma, the private equity group headed by Guy Hands, had also bid for the asset, as had Alinta, the Australian energy group. Alinta was planning to launch a A$5bn (£2bn) share issue to fund the deal if it won.

Final fully financed bids were submitted for Thames on Saturday. The deal comes days after Macquarie sold its stake in South East Water to funds linked to Westpac, a rival Australian banking group, to remove a potential regulatory barrier to its bid for Thames.

RWE had been running a dual-track process on Thames to assess whether it should sell the company or float it.

Goldman Sachs had been appointed to carry out the sale, while Deutsche Bank had been handling a potential initial public offering.

DOJ_NMG_0082341

RWE bought Thames, which has more than 13m customers across London and the south-east of England, for £4.3bn in 2000. The German utility is understood to have booked a profit of about €500m on the sale of the business. RWE, headed by Harry Roels, admitted its foray into water had not been a success.

The German utility said this year that it was selling Thames to concentrate on the higher-growth energy business. The company has repeatedly failed to meet targets set by Ofwat, the water regulator, on leakage.

In July Ofwat ordered Thames to pay an extra £150m to replace old water mains.

RWE is also selling American Water, its US business, through an IPO scheduled for next year.

UK water assets have been attracting high valuations from infrastructure bidders, including pension funds, because they offer stable returns that can match the funds' liabilities.

Stocks in these companies have risen sharply on the back of takeover speculation.

AWG, which owns Anglian Water, is also in play, having received a £2.2bn bid from Osprey, a consortium comprising Australian and Canadian infrastructure and pension funds.

The losing bidders for Thames may turn their sights on AWG. However, Osprey has already increased its offer for the water group in an attempt to see off any possible counterbid.

Steeling Jobs (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

"For decades, U.S. auto companies did not intervene in steel trade cases. We do so now because further relief is unjustified -- and it is undermining American manufacturing competitiveness."

For the sake of the American economy, we hope that statement gets someone's attention at the International Trade Commission (ITC) today. It's from the six largest automobile manufacturers in the U.S. -- General Motors, Toyota, DaimlerChrysler, Ford, Honda and Nissan.

On the table before the ITC today is whether the anti-dumping duties imposed in 1993 on "corrosion-resistant steel" should be lifted. This steel is crucial to making cars. Pushing back against the automakers, steelmakers are expected to argue, as they did 13 years ago, that they need the duties to repel unfair foreign competition and avoid harm.

Well, times change, and it's time to lift these duties on steel. This isn't 1993.

It's hard to overstate the importance of access to corrosion-resistant steel for American manufacturing. Auto makers need it for exterior body panels, doors, hoods, roofs and fenders -- in other words, to produce a car. It is used in making auto parts, construction materials, appliances and consumer hardware. Metal fabricators, many of them small family-owned operations scattered across the American heartland, depend on it. From corporate America to Mom and Pop operations, the U.S. needs this steel to stay in business. The automakers will testify on the side of the foreign companies accused of dumping, but in fact they're testifying for the U.S. economy.

Under U.S. trade law, the duties can't be lifted unless it can be shown that the petitioning industry -- steel -- is no longer exposed to harm from competition. The protectionists at the U.S. Commerce Department haven't helped matters by releasing a report claiming that without the duties "dumping" would resume. But as the nation's steel users are arguing, that report drew its conclusions from market circumstances in 1993. There's little doubt that the dynamics of the global steel market are entirely different than they were 13 years ago.

For starters, since 1993 the U.S. government has absorbed two-thirds of Big Steel's pension "legacy" costs ($9 billion), which was one of the biggest barriers to the industry's consolidation. Data showing a 70% increase in prices for corrosion-resistant steel in 2004-2006, compared with the 2000-2003 period, suggest that the reorganized U.S. industry has strong pricing power. Big Steel is also turning in impressive profitability numbers, easily outstripping the 5.5% profit-on-sales average reported by the Census Bureau for durable-goods manufacturers as a whole in the first half of 2006.

Pricing power and profitability are a direct consequence of the supply restraints caused by anti-dumping duties. Those duties, which can range from 2% to 40%, are also assigned retroactively; so foreign sellers of steel to the U.S. -- which have to collect the duty as part of their price -- never know what their final financial exposure will be. This discourages many foreign companies from even thinking about shipping steel to the U.S. And with global demand for steel strong, why bother? Meanwhile, U.S. users of steel find reliable supplies at globally competitive prices hard to come by. U.S. mills have been known to refuse quotes and limit order size.

Big Steel, which employs 130,000, might want to consider the consequences of squeezing its own customers. U.S. car makers and the auto-parts industry support 2.4 million jobs, and the auto sector buys about half of all U.S. shipments of corrosion-resistant steel. If these businesses move off-shore, U.S. steel will have to compete without the protection of the ITC.

The auto industry says it already buys "the overwhelming majority of [its] steel from U.S. steel mills and will continue to do so irrespective of the outcome of this dispute." But that may not be the case if companies that need steel move their manufacturing businesses off-shore. As Josephine Cooper, Toyota group vice president says, "There is no longer an economic basis for keeping these duties. The steel industry benefits from unnecessary protection while the duties hurt a much wider sector of the U.S. economy."

DOJ_NMG_0082342

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Judge To Decide On Setting Deadlines For Everglades Restoration (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

Lawyers for the state Department of Environmental Protection and South Florida water managers urged a federal judge Monday not to issue an order imposing deadlines for Everglades restoration work, contending it is both illegal and unnecessary.

Charles Demonaco, attorney for the state agency, told U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno that a federal court has no business imposing its will on how a state follows its own laws. Demonaco said a cleanup plan meeting court approval for the Everglades is already enshrined in state law, making a court order unneeded.

"There is a long-term plan that is in effect," Demonaco said at a hearing. "A federal court would be intruding in the daily activities of a state. That would be an unlawful order."

But Dexter Lehtinen, attorney for the Miccosukee Tribe of Indians of Florida, said court orders are the only way to ensure that Florida agencies continue to meet the terms of a settlement reached over a decade ago to restore the Everglades and reduce phosphorus-laden runoff from continuing to damage the ecosystem.

Lehtinen, a former U.S. attorney, said without such court supervision Florida officials could modify their restoration plan unilaterally. The Miscosukees consider the Everglades their ancestral home and have joined the case to ensure enforcement of water quality goals.

"It's a question of ordering them to do what they have promised you they would do," Lehtinen told Moreno. "The long-term plan means nothing without your court order."

Moreno appeared skeptical of claims by the state and South Florida Water Management District that he should do nothing but "monitor" compliance, noting that the state's power to act alone was "a big hole" in dealing with any future violations of the original cleanup settlement.

"They just don't want an order. I'm not understanding quite why they don't," Moreno said.

Edward Geldermann, a U.S. Justice Department attorney representing the federal side of the agreement, said because the state is doing a great deal of work as promised a new court order from Moreno would be "unnecessary." But Geldermann stopped short of saying Moreno had no authority to do so.

The hearing marked the latest skirmish in the implementation of a multbillion-dollar plan by the state and federal governments to restore the Everglades. Moreno must decide what to do in response to a 108-page report by a special master he appointed, who found in July that there have been water quality violations of the court agreement.

The state's position is essentially that everything that can be done is being done and that Moreno need only keep a close watch on how work proceeds. The cornerstone of the project is construction of huge filtering marshes intended to keep phosphorus-laden runoff from farms, towns and other sources from getting into the Everglades.

Moreno did not indicate when he would rule.

ConocoPhillips Will Pay More Than $2.3 Million For Dalco Spill (SEAPI)

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 17, 2006

In a settlement reached Monday with the U.S. Justice Department, ConocoPhillips will pay more than $2.3 million in costs and penalties for a 2004 incident that spilled more than 1,000 gallons of crude oil in Puget Sound's Dalco Passage.

The agreement with the company, and its wholly owned subsidiary, Polar Tankers, was reached following an extensive investigation by the U.S Coast Guard and the state Ecology Department following the Oct. 13, 2004 spill. The investigation found that the tanker Polar Texas released the oil as it took on ballast while departing Commencement Bay.

The spill went unnoticed until the following morning when the captain of a tug boat reported oil in the water south of Vashon and Maury islands. Although state law requires the offending vessel to report and participate in the cleanup, the Polar Texas did neither, the Coast Guard said yesterday in a press release.

The $2,233,293.94 in pollution removal costs under the federal Oil Pollution Act of 1990 represents 100 percent of all costs the federal government incurred during cleanup operations in Dalco Passage. The federal and state government's claims against ConocoPhillips for injuries to natural resources, however, have not been resolved and are not included in the total.

DOJ_NMG_0082343

ConocoPhillips, however, also will pay an $80,000 civil penalty under the federal Clean Water Act. Last Friday, the state Ecology Department settled a $540,000 claim against the oil corporation under state law.

"Today's settlement with ConocoPhillips sends a strong signal to the tank vessel industry that those who spill oil and pollute the pristine waters of Puget Sound will be held fully financially accountable," said Coast Guard Capt. Steve Metruck, Captain of the Port for Puget Sound.

The spill spread patches of oily sheen as far south as the Tacoma Narrows and as far north as Eagle Harbor. The sheen touched more than 15 miles of shore along Colvos Passage, the Narrows and Quartermaster Harbor and left a filmy coating along six miles of southern Vashon and Maury islands.

At its height, the response and cleanup involved nearly 300 people, 10 oil-skimming vessels, 24,000 feet of boom, three helicopters and other boats and equipment, the Coast Guard said.

An estimated 59 tons of oily debris were recovered from shoreline cleanup, as well as nearly 7,000 gallons of oily water from skimming operations.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Money-laundering Scheme Puts Lawyer Through The Ringer (SEAPI)

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 16, 2006

Apparently meant to be a money-laundering scheme, the purchase of this Laundromat didn't wash with federal drug investigators.

Medina lawyer Stephen Plowman, who represented a cocaine trafficker, pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court to a financial reporting crime after helping his client buy the Queen Anne Maytag Laundry.

Plowman, 51, admitted he received more than $100,000 in cash from his client to buy the Laundromat for him in June 2005 and failed to file a currency transaction report, federal prosecutors said.

The Internal Revenue Service requires reporting of cash payments of more than $10,000 received in a trade or business. Willful failure to do so is a felony.

Federal prosecutors said Plowman's client, Carlos Ford, wanted the Laundromat to launder drug proceeds. After buying the business, Ford has been convicted of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and was sentenced last month to 10 years in prison.

Under a plea agreement, Plowman admitted that he had failed to file the required currency transaction report on more than one occasion.

Prosecutors said Plowman received close to $120,000 in cash from Ford's cocaine trafficking, using $100,000 for part of the purchase price of the Laundromat and using the rest for Laundromat expenses and for his fee.

Plowman also received two cashier's checks totaling about $56,000 from Ford for the purchase. He paid $160,000 in cash and check for the Laundromat but wrote a purchase agreement that listed a sales price of $60,000 in an attempt to hide the drug money.

The guilty plea by the lawyer "sends a strong message that no one is above the law," said Rodney Benson, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in Seattle.

Plowman will be sentenced Jan. 27. The prospective sentencing guideline for his crime is 18 to 24 months imprisonment, with a maximum sentence of 10 years.

More headlines and info from Queen Anne.

Clogged Sinuses? Sign In, Please (HARTC)

By Hilary Waldman, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, October 16, 2006

Cold Medicine Goes Behind The Counter

In the two weeks since a federal law put more than a dozen popular cold and sinus pills behind the drugstore counter, the Arrow Pharmacy in Hartford has not sold a single box of Sudafed.

It may be that it's not really cold season yet, pharmacist Eddie Martucci speculated.

Or it may be that customers are put off by a new law that requires them to show a photo ID and sign a logbook before purchasing products that contain pseudoephedrine, the key ingredient in many popular nasal decongestants.

It's a "pain," said Angelo DeFazio, owner of the Arrow Pharmacy on Farmington Avenue.

DOJ_NMG_0082344

The behind-the-counter rule, which started Oct. 1, is designed to make it harder for criminals to buy large quantities of legal pseudoephedrine and to use it to produce the illegal drug methamphetamine. The logbook must be made available to agents of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, who are authorized to inspect pharmacies to enforce all U.S. drug laws.

The law, part of the federal Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act and included in the anti-terrorist Patriot Act, is designed to keep popular nasal decongestants available without a prescription, while curbing their use to make illegal drugs.

Using large quantities of cold medicine, household drain cleaner, ordinary batteries, and recipes available on the Internet, it has been easy for drug abusers to produce large quantities of crystal meth in home laboratories.

On the upside, DeFazio said, the law allows pharmacists to monitor pseudoephedrine sales and to warn people with problems such as heart conditions that they probably should not be taking the drug. He said, despite the hassles, that he supports the law.

"It's well worth it," DeFazio said. "We've had some of these illegal meth labs in some very obscure little towns."

Beyond the hassle factor, some pharmacists suspect consumers may be buying the wrong cold medicine. Some pharmacists say sales of Sudafed and its generic equivalents are down because customers are confused by a look-alike product called "Sudafed PE" - which does not have pseudoephedrine and is still available on open drugstore shelves.

With only look-alikes on the shelves, some people are accidentally settling for cold products that don't work as well as those behind the counter, said Alan Rosenthal, a pharmacist at Suburban Pharmacy on North Main Street in West Hartford.

In a pharmaceutical journal article published last summer, two University of Florida pharmacists said the alternative product, Sudafed PE, or its generic equivalent, is not effective. The "PE" stands for phenylephrine, a compound that is not sufficiently absorbed into the blood stream to make it effective as an oral nasal decongestant, pharmacists Leslie Hendeles and Rancy C. Hatton said in the journal article.

Pfizer, the maker of Sudafed and Sudafed PE has said that the alternative drug does work and that customers who prefer the original are free to ask for it at the pharmacy counter.

Rosenthal said some of his customers have brought the PE products to the counter and asked for his advice.

"I tell them that pseudoephedrine is a better product," Rosenthal said.

He said few customers have balked at producing identification or signing the logbook once he explained the law. To purchase a pseudoephedrine product, customers must record their name, address and date of birth in a log book that pharmacies must keep behind the counter. They also must show a photo ID.

At some pharmacies, asking for pseudoephedrine products at the pharmacy is nothing new. Last year, several large chain stores including Walgreens, CVS and Wal-Mart voluntarily placed products containing pseudoephedrine behind the counter.

The signature requirement also is not unprecedented, said Martucci of Arrow Pharmacy. He recalled that in the late 1970s a customer signature was required for the purchase of paregoric, an opium-based medicine that was used to treat diarrhea in children and teething pain in babies. Paregoric has since been pulled from the market.

White House Commends Montana Meth Project (AP)

AP, October 17, 2006

The Montana Meth Project, a campaign with graphic messages about the perils of methamphetamine use, received White House recognition Monday.

John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, appeared in Great Falls and cited the project as one of the nation's most powerful anti-drug efforts. Walters presented a certificate of recognition, which business tycoon and part-time Montana resident Tom Siebel accepted on behalf of the project.

It is funded by the Thomas and Stacey Siebel Foundation. The project begun in 2005 aims to discourage first-time use of meth by teenagers. The campaign includes gritty television, newspaper and billboard portrayals of meth users.

The project is Montana's largest advertiser, and its messages reach 70-90 percent of the state's teens at least three times a week, according to the White House. Besides the advertising, the project includes work to mobilize community groups against meth.

"The Montana Meth Project is a key component of a balanced strategy against meth and is an extraordinary example of the results we can achieve when we combine the power of advertising with the dedication and expertise of the leaders of this community," Walters said.

Larimer/Weld Summit Takes On Meth Issue (COL)

The Coloradoan, October 16, 2006

About 100 community leaders looking for solutions to the growing use of methamphetamine in Larimer and Weld counties gathered today for a day-long summit at The Ranch, Larimer County's fairgrounds and special events complex.

Participants were told meth, a powerful stimulant that is highly addictive, takes a toll not only on users but on the community as well, through higher human services costs and a clogged criminal justice system.

About 80 percent of the meth found in the United States comes from Mexico or large “super labs,” said John Horton, associate deputy director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

The number of small labs in the country is down 29 percent in recent years, he said.

Partnerships between governments at home and abroad are needed to curtail the production and use of the drug, Horton said.

“We know we can make a difference when state, national and local communities come together,” he said. “That’s why drug use is down in this country.”

Officials Discuss Growing Problem Of Meth Use At Regional Summit (GT)

Greeley (CO) Tribune, October 17, 2006

Multiple, easily-accessible chemicals melded into one substance has created a drug of choice that has led to many social problems.

The problem of methamphetamine use has become so large in the region that its abuse prompted leaders from Weld and Larimer counties to gather Monday at The Ranch in Loveland to discuss the problem of the drug's abuse in northern Colorado.

About 70 people participated in the day-long brainstorming session. State, county and city government officials, law enforcement representatives and people from local treatment centers in both counties joined the discussions.

John Horton, associate deputy director for state and local affairs in the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, spoke early in the meeting about the national problem. He said local governments need to lead the way in tackling the problem and he applauded Colorado's laws that make it more difficult to purchase ingredients used for the drug.

Experts talked about the drug problem that is correlated with child abuse and neglect. More information about the addictive drug set a solemn tone at the meeting.

Deb Hill, a drug and alcohol counselor at Island Grove Regional Treatment Center in Greeley, spoke about the day she discovered meth. The day before she graduated high school, one of her cousins shared the drug with her.

"As soon as I used that first line I knew that things were going to change," Hill said.

But things didn't change immediately. Hill said she found a substance that gave her a surge of energy and empowered her when she was uncomfortable.

"Methamphetamine worked for me," Hill said. "I used it for the weekend and stopped in time to go to work."

Eventually she used the drug during the week and couldn't hold a steady job. Hill said she ended up in a homeless shelter with a 6-month-old child and eventually gave birth to her third child who was born affected by the drug.

But all was not lost.

"We do recover," Hill said. "We become responsible, productive, loving parents."

That message hit Scoot Crandall, executive director of TEAM Fort Collins.

"I came here with the idea that there's no such thing as a recovering meth addict, but that's not true," Crandall said.

Area leaders shared ideas about how to prevent, intervene and treat addictions. Possible partnerships could develop in the future.

"There was good dialogue," said Weld County Commissioner Dave Long. "That's always the beginning step. Everybody had open minds. Now we just have to draw on what the positive ideas are."

Plan Called A Meth Gateway (DENP)

Denver Post, October 17, 2006

Loveland - A proposal on the state ballot to loosen marijuana laws in Colorado would make it harder to fight the war on methamphetamine abuse, a federal drug official said Monday.

John Horton, a former Oregon prosecutor, said Amendment 44 - which would allow people 21 and older to legally possess an ounce or less of pot - would make marijuana accessible to more people and allow them to fall victim to the highly-addictive and destructive properties of methamphetamines.

"Many meth addicts say they started with marijuana," said Horton. "So I don't think we want Colorado to be a testing ground for new marijuana laws."

Horton, associate deputy director for state and local affairs in the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, spoke at a summit sponsored by officials in Larimer and Weld counties.

The meeting was called to compare notes and arrive at strategies to deal with the spread of methamphetamine use and meth labs in northern Colorado.

DOJ_NMG_0082346

Both counties report big increases in meth use in just the past few years. In Weld County, for instance, the Island Grove Treatment Center in 2005 saw a 62 percent increase in women who were pregnant and admitted using meth and a 20 percent increase in the total number of those admitted - 860 - who reported meth use.

Meth is highly addictive and often leads to job loss, homelessness, health problems and deadly violence, say officials and past users.

Deb Hill, a counselor at Island Grove, said she was seduced by meth just before her high school graduation. The drug made her feel confident and outgoing, two qualities she lacked.

"When I used that first line, I knew things were going to change for me," Hill said.

But slowly meth began to chip away at her life and she lost her family and became homeless. "I had track marks up and down my arms, and I went 12 days without sleep or food," Hill said. "I knew my life didn't work."

Social service workers helped her recover, and she implored the 100 or so gathered at Monday's summit to work together to solve the meth problem.

"You are the decision-makers; you are the movers and shakers. You can make a difference," Hill said.

Horton said there have been strides in cutting meth traffic, including reducing the number of small labs in the country by 29 percent. He said efforts like Amendment 44 would only hurt the fight, however, because marijuana is a "gateway drug."

Mason Tvert, campaign director for Amendment 44, said Horton and other officials are using scare tactics to sink the proposal. Recent studies have shown marijuana's status as a gateway drug is overblown and most illicit drug users start with alcohol and tobacco, Tvert said.

He added: "They need to point out to people that there are other drugs out there we need to talk about besides marijuana."

Colombian Man Gets 15 Years In Cocaine Bust (NDN)

Naples Daily News, October 16, 2006

A Colombian man caught with nearly two tons of cocaine in international waters was sentenced today in Fort Myers to 15 years in prison.

Leopoldo Caiceda Caiceda, 57, of Buenaventura, Colombia, pleaded guilty in June to possession of cocaine and conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute cocaine.

He was found last December along with three other men in a fishing boat off the coast of Costa Rica. In their wooden fishing boat U.S. Coast Guard officials found 3,500 pounds of cocaine, said Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Doug Molloy.

"The retail value of this is almost unimaginable," Molloy said.

The drugs are suspected of being en route to Florida, which is why Caiceda was being prosecuted here. Caiceda's 190-month sentence was the harshest among the men found in his boat. He was considered the captain of the boat, which is why he received the harshest punishment from U.S. Magistrate Sheri Polster Chappel, Molloy said.

Fellow Colombians Victor Manuel Lemos Vasquez, 37, of Calle-Primera; Mauro Luis Badillo Lozano, 41, of Bahia Solano; and Jaime Beltran, 53, of Cali; each received 135-month sentences.

This is the second time Caiceda was caught transporting drugs. In the mid-1990s he was picked up with 27,000 pounds of marijuana, Molloy said. For that offense he served five years in prison and was deported to Colombia.

Border Patrol, Lawmen Outgunned By Cartels (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, October 17, 2006

Homeland Security panel also says traffickers are forming ties with U.S.-based gangs

The U.S. Border Patrol and other law enforcement agencies at the U.S.-Mexico border are outgunned by increasingly ruthless and well-armed Mexican drug cartels, a new congressional report concludes.

"The cartels use automatic assault weapons, bazookas, grenade launchers and improvised explosive devices," the House Homeland Security oversight subcommittee report said. "In contrast, U.S. Border Patrol agents are issued 40-caliber Beretta semiautomatic pistols."

The report, scheduled to be released today by U.S. Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Austin, said drug cartels are able to break the encryptions on Border Patrol and sheriffs' deputies' radios.

"Lookouts for the cartels, using military grade equipment, are positioned at strategic points on the U.S. side of the border to monitor movements of U.S. law enforcement," it continued.

Fear of terrorismEven as the traffickers expand their drugrunning routes to smuggle immigrants into the United States, they are forming dangerous alliances with U.S.-based criminal gangs such as MS-13 and the Latin Kings, according to the congressional panel.

DOJ_NMG_0082347

McCaul, whose district stretches into western Harris County, chairs the subcommittee.

The former federal prosecutor expressed concern that trafficking networks could use their delivery routes to smuggle terrorists or weapons of mass destruction into the U.S.

"The thing that keeps me up at night when I think 'What can we do to prevent another 9/11?' is that they own these delivery routes," he said in an interview Monday.

Hezbollah members already have entered the U.S. from Mexico, the report confirmed.

"As if narco-terrorist violence were not enough, extensions of Middle East terrorism have crept into the United States," the report stated. "Islamic radical groups that support Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamiya Al Gamat are all active in Latin America."

McCaul said he commissioned the report to bring focus to the national security threat and rising violence at the border, which has witnessed a spree of murders and kidnappings linked to warring drug cartels, particularly in Nuevo Laredo.

The federal government has added Border Patrol agents, detention beds and high-tech surveillance systems to deter illegal crossings, he said, with less attention to the border's other problems.

"We put billions of dollars in trying to stop the flow coming in, in a more reactive way, and what I'm suggesting is we also need to take a look at the other piece of this problem and identify what is the root cause and attack the root cause head on," he said. "In my view, the head of the snake is the cartels."

McCaul urged better intelligence gathering in Mexico and Latin America. And he called for greater cooperation with the Mexican government to crack down on the cartels.

Still, he acknowledged that expanding the partnership is difficult in light of persistent corruption in Mexican law enforcement ranks and the deadly attacks the cartels have launched on Mexican authorities.

Growing populationCiting federal estimates that the Border Patrol apprehends only 10 percent to 30 percent of illegal crossers, the report said as many as 10 million illegal immigrants may have entered the U.S. last year.

Estimates by the Pew Hispanic Center and other experts peg the illegal immigrant population in the U.S. at 11 million to 12 million.

And while federal law enforcement seized 1.1 million pounds of cocaine and 6.8 million pounds of marijuana, McCaul's staff estimated the total cocaine flow may have topped 11 million pounds.

"While the United States has taken positive steps to secure its borders, much more is needed to combat an increasingly powerful, sophisticated, organized and violent criminal network which seeks to move illegal contraband ... into our country for profit," the report concludes.

Rebel Head Said Plotted To Keep Hostages (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, (AP) -- The government said Monday that a top Latin American rebel leader plotted to keep three Americans hostage and use them as political bargaining chips after their plane crashed in Colombia.

But the defense portrayed Ricardo Palmera as a tangential sympathizer of the leftist FARC group who unfairly got caught in the middle after trying to negotiate a deal between guerrilla fighters and the U.S.-backed Colombian government.

"This man had nothing to do with the capture of the three Americans," said Palmera attorney Robert Tucker. "He became the pawn in the power play."

Justice Department attorney John Crabb opened his case by arguing that Palmera — better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad — was guilty on charges of hostage-taking, conspiracy and providing material support to terrorists.

"We'll trade you hostages — including three Americans — for all FARC prisoners in jail. That was Simon Trinidad's offer," Crabb said.

"He admitted he was a member of FARC, he admitted FARC takes hostages," he said. "That man, Simon Trinidad, tried to use them as get out of jail cards for FARC."

Tucker countered that there was little evidence tying Palmera directly to the hostage-taking after the plane carrying the U.S. military contractors encountered engine trouble and crashed in February 2003.

"There's no evidence he's ever seen them," Tucker said. "There's no evidence he ever made any demand or talked to anybody."

A panel of 15 jurors and alternates listened intently. In the courtroom audience sat family members of the three American hostages.

"Despicable," muttered Jo Rosano, mother of Marc Gonsalves, as prosecutors laid out their case against Palmera.

A relaxed Palmera, dressed neatly in a dark suit and green tie, flashed a smile to the packed courtroom audience when he entered the courtroom. Once arguments began, he sat quietly, using headphones to listen to a Spanish translator.

DOJ_NMG_0082348

The jury will decide the fate of Palmera in the 3-year-old kidnapping case, in which three Americans are believed to be held by guerrillas in the thick jungles of southeastern Colombia. The trial is expected to last five to six weeks.

Palmera, 56, was extradited in late 2004 after his capture in Ecuador.

FARC is demanding that the Colombian government release all of the group's imprisoned members, including Palmera, in exchange for the release of 62 hostages. The hostages include the three Americans on the plane — Gonsalves, Thomas Howes and Keith Stansell — who authorities say were defense contractors involved in a counternarcotics mission.

Palmera is also charged in the killings of two others on the plane, U.S. pilot Thomas Janis and Sgt. Luis Alcides Cruz, a Colombian soldier, who were found near the crash site, apparently shot to death. The prosecution has argued that the plane was shot down, although that is in dispute.

The trial is the latest evidence of a toughened U.S. stance against FARC. Since 2000, the U.S. has given more than $4 billion to Colombia to fight the insurgency and the world's largest cocaine industry.

If convicted, Palmera could face 30 years in prison, the maximum allowed under the extradition treaty between Colombia and the United States.

A former banker from a wealthy family, the Harvard-educated Palmera says he took up arms to fight social injustice. FARC, along with a smaller leftist rebel group, has battled to topple the Colombian government for 42 years in a conflict that has claimed more than 3,000 lives every year.

He told The Associated Press in 1999 that he had chosen to "be alongside the progressive people fighting the 10 percent of landowners who are monopolizing 90 percent of Colombia's land."

The group funds itself through drug trafficking, extortion and kidnapping.

US General: Military Aid To Colombia Should Be Reduced (AP)

AP, October 16, 2006

The U.S. military's commander for Latin America says Washington should gradually reduce its roughly $600 million in annual military and anti-drug aid to Colombia, support that has been crucial to putting the region's most potent rebel force on the defensive.

"I'm not concerned there's going to be a loss of funding," Gen. John Craddock said Monday when asked about reports that the State Department wants to phase out Plan Colombia, which has provided the country with some $4 billion in total aid since 2000.

"First of all, there should be (decreased funding), over time. It makes sense. The Colombians are winning," said Craddock, a four-star general and former tank commander who this week ends a two-year stint as chief of the U.S. Southern Command.

"(The Colombians) are taking every year more and more responsibility for the conduct and the resources. That's the way it ought to be," said Craddock, who will be assuming command of U.S. forces in Europe and Africa and of NATO.

In an interview with several news organizations at his headquarters, Craddock said Colombia's defense minister, Juan Manuel Santos, is in agreement with reductions in U.S. military funding.

The U.S. aid has helped President Alvaro Uribe, elected in May to a second four-year term, make Colombia's highways and cities safer and cut the world's highest kidnapping rate roughly in half by putting the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, on the defensive.

And though it is questionable whether Plan Colombia has put a serious dent in drug trafficking from the world's leading cocaine producing nation, from which the FARC and other illegal armed groups benefit, the Colombian military's gains are measurable.

U.S. analysts say the FARC has been reduced by some 5,000 fighters to 12,000 since 2002 as Uribe boosted the number of police and soldiers by 30 percent, created elite anti-insurgency units and benefited from training by U.S. Special Forces and closer intelligence-sharing.

Colombia's military has also gained air mobility with the acquisition of a fleet of UH-60 Blackhawk helicopters.

But Uribe's armed forces have recently been beset by a series of scandals, including accusations of dozens of civilians killed by soldiers who claimed they were rebels and allegations that military intelligence officers have staged bombings and FARC surrenders to make it appear as if they have been weakening the rebels.

The most egregious scandal involved the May massacre of 10 anti-drug police by a military unit - a hit allegedly ordered up by cocaine mafiosos.

On other topics, Craddock said he believes there is greater democracy in the region than when he assumed command two years ago of Southcom's 1,200 soldiers and civilians in the Caribbean and Latin America south of Mexico.

"I think that if you take it on balance and look at the entire region there's cause for optimism," he said, adding that the results of Sunday's elections in Ecuador indicate democracy is working even in that chronically unstable country.

DOJ_NMG_0082349

Leftist economist Rafael Correa, who vowed not to renew the U.S. base at Manta when its lease runs out in 2009, scored far fewer votes Sunday that pre-election polls indicated, forcing a November runoff with Alvaro Noboa, Ecuador's wealthiest man. Noboa is far more acceptable to Washington.

Craddock said the rise of populists in Latin America - he was careful not to name names - highlight his greatest concern about the region: that even with economic growth, little has been done to bridge the wide gap between rich and poor.

"I think that what we're seeing is a recognition that governments have an obligation in the region to eliminate poverty, reduce corruption and reduce the inequality," he said.

Craddock has in the past accused President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela of playing a "destabilizing" role by trying to export his "extreme populist movement" elsewhere.

Asked for evidence of that Monday in the case of Bolivia, Craddock would not comment. But he denied that U.S. military ties with Bolivia have suffered, even as populist President Evo Morales strengthens military cooperation with Venezuela. He said U.S. soldiers are currently planning a humanitarian assistance mission in Bolivia under the "New Horizons" program, in which U.S. soldiers engage in construction projects and provide free medical care.

Craddock's replacement as Southcom chief, Adm. James G. Stavridis, takes over on Thursday. Like Craddock before him, Stravridis wears four stars and comes to the job after serving as a top military aide to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

U.S. Taking Wait-and-see Approach On Ecuador, General Says (MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

McClatchy Newspapers, October 16, 2006

MIAMI - Hailing democratic gains in Latin America, the departing head of the U.S. Southern Command said Monday that the Pentagon is taking a wait-and-see approach to whether Ecuador's elections will lead to the loss of a U.S. military base there.

In a wide-ranging interview with several reporters, Army Gen. Bantz "John" Craddock offered an upbeat assessment of the region where he has overseen U.S. military operations for the past two years. He next moves to Europe as NATO commander.

"I know there's been a lot of rhetoric from presidential candidates in Ecuador," he said - casting vows by the leftist candidate to end the U.S. military presence there as an "if, then" hypothesis.

"We'll have to see how it all sorts out," Craddock said. "And then we'll talk to the new government and see what kind of accommodations and agreements we can reach."

There is no certainty that the United States will have to abandon its down-range air operations at Manta, Ecuador, used by U.S. surveillance aircraft and other forces for anti-drug operations. A runoff election Nov. 26 will pit billionaire banana magnate Alvaro Noboa, who favors close ties with the United States, against Rafael Correa, a leftist who has vowed to close the base. Correa placed second in first-round elections over the weekend.

Craddock came to the Southcom post after serving as senior military assistant to Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld.

His replacement, Adm. James Stavridis, takes command at Southcom Thursday, in a ceremony at the Doral, Fla., headquarters - a nine-mile commute from the Coral Gables residence that comes with the job.

"I won't miss the traffic. But I really like the area," said Craddock, who described South Florida as "eclectic," "international in flavor" and populated with academics and others who have keen interest in the region.

Coral Gables Mayor Don Slesnick, who has been among the staunchest backers of basing Southcom in South Florida, said Craddock led the headquarters at a tumultuous time in the region.

"I'll give credit to General Craddock for giving a steady course of action during his tenure and certainly helping calm the waves of a troubled sea," said Slesnick, who added that Craddock also found time to serve on the Orange Bowl Committee and speak to the Greater Miami Chamber of Commerce.

In the interview, Craddock said he was not concerned by predictions that the United States would cut funds to Plan Colombia, the roughly $600 million a year multi-agency U.S. program that has over the years spent billions of dollars to disrupt the drug trade and insurgencies that profit from it.

"First of all, there should be reductions over time. It makes sense," he said.

"The Colombians are winning, they are taking every year more and more responsibility for the conduct and for the resources. That's the way it ought to be."

In two years on the job, he said he has seen enhanced democracy across the region - and pointed to a dozen elections in the past year as the proof of it.

"I do think there is freedom of expression; look around at the elections this year. Think about it. Twelve or 13 that's happened already. It's been significant. The second round in Brazil, the second round in Ecuador - the process is working!" he said. "It's not like our process. But that's OK; it's fine. Every place is a little different. Some of the countries have 20 and 30 political parties."

DOJ_NMG_0082350

Craddock spoke expansively for nearly an hour in a conference room outside his office, beneath a poster of Uncle Sam pointing and the slogan: "We're at war. Are you doing all you can?"

Craddock said the left-right struggles in the region don't threaten democracy - so long as the people can "hire and fire their government" through elections.

Democracy is endangered, he said, when people take their political grievances to the streets or resort to "extreme viewpoints on the left and right," and, ultimately, violence.

"I know there are many with pessimistic views of Latin America and the Caribbean basin in terms of fragile democracies, populist movements," he said.

"But I think if you take it on balance and look at the entire region I think there's cause for optimism. ... As these democracies, however strong or fragile as they may be, continue to exist and grow, mature, I think that over time, the trends will be positive."

Moonshiners Nearly Extinct In W.Va. (CDM)

By Justin D. Anderson, Daily Mail Staff

Charleston Daily Mail, October 17, 2006

The West Virginia moonshiner is a vanishing breed made all but extinct by economics and modern law enforcement techniques, experts say.

Moonshine is not profitable to make for widespread sale anymore.

And in the modern era of ATVs and helicopter aerial searches, it's harder for a moonshiner to hide.

But moonshine hasn't gone away entirely.

An elderly Roane County man was recently arrested for allegedly shooting his nephew after a night of drinking moonshine. When police found Wayne Howard Mallory passed out in his trailer, they roused him and asked him about the shooting. Mallory couldn't remember anything about it.

In August, authorities seized $1 million worth of marijuana and a moonshine still at a Greenbrier County couple's 29-acre property.

"There's probably a bit of it going on, but I don't think it's a problem," said Paul Cross, agent in charge of the Charleston office of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Cross said his agency hasn't come across a real case of moonshine-making in about seven years. "People get into that stuff to make money," he said. "It doesn't seem to be economically viable to do it at this time."

Paul Rakes, a history professor at WVU Tech in Montgomery, knows a little something about moonshine. His grandfather made it in the basement and ran the exhaust from the still out the chimney.

The classic, romantic image of the moonshiner came from journalists writing after the Civil War, he said.

"The moonshiner, he's this person that's lived this agrarian life and the only thing that made him a criminal was the interference of the government," Rakes said.

Most were farmers who didn't have the means of transportation to get all their corn to market. It was easier to get corn whiskey to market.

People who made moonshine back then had to fight off taxmen -- or revenuers -- who trudged into the mountains to collect on the product. Moonshiners developed an attitude of "negative liberty," Rakes said, which means "If people leave me alone, I'll leave them alone."

Modernization mostly did away with that kind of attitude, Rakes said, but it still exists in some remote pockets of West Virginia. And these usually are the places where there's still some moonshine going around.

However, Rakes said: "The tools to locate and defeat moonshining are so advanced now. They've simply advanced beyond the ability to produce moonshine. It's just too risky.

"And the culture of the people is changing. You have skills and intelligence of the mountain that are passing away with these old practices of rebellion."

As late as 1988, Rakes said he went to a Christmas party where some state troopers showed up and brought some "excellent" hooch. He didn't ask them where they got it.

Kevin Barksdale, who teaches Appalachian history at Marshall, said the moonshine that's still around today is mostly made and kept within the small circle of family and friends. "It's always been a very familial thing passing around the jar," he said.

There's still pride in being able to make a good batch, he said. The social stigma of breaking out a jar seems to have passed, too. Barksdale said he was just at a bluegrass concert when, in the middle of the show, someone pulled out a big jar of moonshine.

DOJ_NMG_0082351

Col. David Lemmon, superintendent of the West Virginia State Police and a longtime law enforcement officer can remember busting stills back in the 1950s and 1960s while he was stationed at the Chelyan detachment.

Even back then, he said it was a declining problem. Lemmon said they'd occasionally find a still in an out-building or an abandoned mineshaft.

Lemmon said he remembers patrolling the area around Campbell's Creek back in the early 1960s when he dropped in behind a Beckley man driving a Buick on U.S. 60.

The guy took off and Lemmon gave chase. The suspect went around a curve a little too fast and ended upside down in the creek. Jars of moonshine busted everywhere.

"He was bringing it in," Lemmon said. "He wasn't drunk, he was just driving too fast. He didn't get hurt seriously."

Those days are mostly gone, though, Lemmon said. It's unusual for troopers to make this kind of discovery.

And that's all right for Lemmon, who never did see the big attraction in moonshine, anyway.

"I never did taste any of it that tasted good," he said. "I always thought it smelled like kerosene."

Contact writer Justin D. Anderson at justin@dailymail.com or 348-4843.

IMMIGRATION:

Child Abuse Lawsuit Creates Immigration Waves (CBS2CHI)

By Rob Johnson

CBS 2 Chicago, October 17, 2006

(CBS) CHICAGO A child abuse lawsuit aimed at helping illegal immigrants stay in the country is creating some waves.

Some people believe the lawsuit in support a Chicago mother and her son misses a critical point, and CBS 2's Rob Johnson reports that others believe it's right on target.

The immigration debate has become one of America's most pressing issues. The latest salvo fired came last week with the filing of a class action lawsuit on behalf of children like 7-year-old Saul Arellano, whose mother Elvira is hunkered down in a Humboldt Park church fighting deportation.

The suit names President Bush and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, among others, and claims that such deportations are a form of child abuse.

"They should be able to live in this country with their parents and that is not happening," said Emma Lozano with the Center Without Borders.

That strategy, says CBS 2 legal analyst Irv Miller, is a long shot.

"It's probably not going to be a class action, which is what the mom and the child want it to be to gain the notoriety," Miller said.

But UIC child psychiatry professor Dr. Bennett Leventhal believes that a child in that type of situation faces real emotional damage.

"I think it would be an abusive thing to forcibly separate children from their parents under circumstances like that where it is clearly avoidable," Leventhal said.

But there are others, like Michelle Jacobsen with the Chicago Minuteman Project, who contend that Elvira Arellano is confusing the entire issue.

"Why did a mother put her child in this situation? Because the government didn't do that to her. The government didn't force her to come over the border," Jacobsen said. "The government didn't force her to fraudulently use a Social Security number or to have a child over here when she was illegal. She made all of those choices herself."

Supporters of undocumented immigrants are planning to have many of these children at a huge rally in Washington on Nov. 3, hoping the president will hear their pleas.

Their opponents vow to continue talking about how they believe illegal immigration is hurting this country.

Some Democrats Send A More Conservative Immigration Message (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., Oct. 11 — In Washington, the Democratic leadership in Congress has maintained a united front on immigration, demanding legislation that would legalize illegal immigrants and create a guest worker program to ensure a reliable legal flow of foreign workers.

DOJ_NMG_0082352

But here in Tennessee, and in at least a dozen other fiercely contested Congressional races, Democratic candidates are publicly breaking with that message.

In North Carolina, Heath Shuler, a former Washington Redskins quarterback who is running for Congress, ran a television advertisement declaring he would never "give amnesty" to illegal immigrants. In Georgia, Representative John Barrow has played up his vote to build a fence on the southwest border. In Ohio, John Cranley, the challenger to the Republican incumbent, Representative Steve Chabot, has accused Mr. Chabot of voting to legalize hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants.

In this state, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., the Democrat running for Senate, reminds voters repeatedly that federal agents raided his Republican opponent's business and found four illegal immigrants working there. Mr. Ford also proudly describes his vote for the border security legislation passed by the House last year, a measure condemned as anti-immigrant by many Democrats in Congress.

"I'm the only person on this stage who has ever voted for an anti-illegal-immigration bill, matter of fact the strongest in the country," Mr. Ford said this week in a debate with his Republican opponent, Bob Corker. The congressman emphasized that his position put him at odds with his party and with President Bush, who pushed for legislation to grant legal status to illegal immigrants.

The vast majority of Democrats in Congress support their leadership's call for legislation that would grant legal status to illegal immigrants and toughen border security. And politicians of all stripes go against their party leaders, on occasion, to address regional concerns. But the appearance of some candidates vying to be tougher than Republicans on border security, particularly in tight races in conservative states, shows how divisive the immigration issue remains.

The tough border security message is carried mostly by Democrats in the South and the Midwest, where a surge of Hispanic immigration is transforming small towns and cities. In such communities, some candidates are deriding legalization as amnesty, proclaiming border security as their priority or criticizing Republican challengers as failing to stem the tide of illegal immigration.

This stance has fueled an outcry from immigrant advocacy groups, including the National Council of La Raza and the Tennessee Immigrant and Refugee Rights Coalition, which have accused some Democrats of abandoning their principles. They warn that Democrats and Republicans who demonize immigrants risk alienating Hispanic voters, who are expected to constitute a powerful bloc in coming years.

Democratic leaders have been treading carefully. This summer, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee withdrew an advertisement from its Web site displaying images of people scaling a border fence along with images of Osama bin Laden and President Kim Jong Il of North Korea. Several Hispanic groups had complained that it unfairly likened immigrants to terrorists.

"There is a disconnect between what the national party sees as rational policies and what Congressman Ford and other Democrats have determined they need to do to win," said David Lubell, the director of the Tennessee immigrant rights coalition. "These Democrats are trying to out-right the right."

Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, who supports the legalization of illegal immigrants, also lamented the emergence of the trend in his state. "It's who can claim 'I'm not for amnesty' and who can say that the loudest," Mr. Flake said.

Republican campaign officials dismiss the phenomenon as insignificant, arguing that most Democrats still remain vulnerable on immigration, particularly among conservative voters.

"Democrats may try to talk a good game," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, "but most of the incumbents have voting records opposite to what they're now trying to claim."

Some Democrats praise the shift in tone, saying internal polling shows that the traditional message of support for legalization for illegal immigrants lacks the backing of many middle-class voters, regardless of party affiliation.

"They think that Democrats are on the side of illegal immigrants even at the expense of citizens," said Jim Kessler, vice president for policy at the Third Way, a centrist Democratic research group that has conducted polling on immigration. Mr. Kessler, who in recent months has briefed senior Democratic campaign officials and the staffs of dozens of Democratic candidates, has been advising them to take the offense on border security by charging that immigration enforcement has faltered under Republican leadership.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who is leading the Democrats' campaign to win Congress, and Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, Mr. Emanuel's Senate counterpart, publicly praised Mr. Kessler's research this year.

All three men emphasized that they supported the legalization of illegal immigrants but said that it was important to note the Republicans' weaknesses on enforcement.

Mr. Kessler acknowledged that his message was hard for some Democrats "to swallow." But adopting a tougher message, he said, would make Democratic candidates less vulnerable in the November elections.

DOJ_NMG_0082353

"Immigration is an incredible source of strength for Americans," he said. "But it's also a source of angst for Americans. I don't think we should just shrug that off."

The mounting Democratic ambivalence over immigration was apparent in September in the last frenetic weeks of lawmaking before the Congressional recess.

With the November elections looming, 62 House Democrats voted to support a strict border security measure championed by the Republican leadership, up from the 36 who supported tough legislation last December. In the Senate, 26 Democrats voted in favor of building 700 miles of fencing along the Mexican border, outnumbering the 17 Democrats who opposed it.

Since then, on the campaign trail, Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, who is up for re-election and often breaks with his party, has accused his Republican challenger of supporting the legalization approach favored by two Democratic senators, Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry, both of Massachusetts.

"I support border security first; my opponent supports amnesty," Mr. Nelson said in a television advertisement this month.

Tessa Hafen, who hopes to unseat Representative Jon Porter, Republican of Nevada, said this month that Mr. Porter favored Mr. Bush's approach to immigration, "a plan Porter called amnesty." But she acknowledged in an interview that she personally favored legalization, too, along with tougher border security.

In Tennessee, Mr. Corker and his allies in the Republican Party have been trying to raise doubts about Mr. Ford's commitment to border security. In television advertisements, they say he voted against sending the military to the border and against hiring more border agents. They often note that he has voted with his party more than 80 percent of the time.

And in this week's debate, Mr. Corker, who did not return a call for comment, said that the illegal immigrants found at his work site had been hired by a subcontractor.

Mr. Ford, who is known as something of an ambitious maverick in his party, countered that he had made those votes before the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and that he had been tough on illegal immigration since then.

"They think they can come in here and just malign me as this Democrat that is out of touch, whose views don't comport with mainstream conservative values," Mr. Ford said. "But we've been able to withstand that."

Law On Overseas Brides Is Keeping Couples Apart (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

PALM COAST, Fla. — Adam Weaver thought everything was set to bring his Colombian fiancée, Yesenia Meza, to the United States.

But Mr. Weaver did not count on being hindered by a Congressional effort intended to protect women from potential abuse by American men who seek brides from other countries on the Internet. In June, the federal immigration service froze 10,000 visa applications for foreign fiancées because they did not conform with a law that went into effect in March.

Mr. Weaver and Ms. Meza, who were expecting to be together here by now, were caught in the net.

"Smuggling a ton of cocaine into this country," Mr. Weaver fumed, "is probably easier than bringing your fiancée."

The law, known as the International Marriage Broker Regulation Act, or Imbra, is intended to give foreign women and the American government more information about the men who seek so-called mail-order brides.

"This is an unequal partnership where you have somebody dependent on somebody else in a profound way," said Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, who was a leading sponsor of the law. "It puts women at a significant disadvantage, in a potentially violent situation."

Reports of violence in international marriages, some of them Internet matches, have increased in recent years. In 1998, fewer than 2,500 foreign women applied to become permanent residents under the Violence Against Women Act, which allows abused wives to apply for residence without the support of their husbands. In the fiscal year that ended in September, 9,500 applied.

The new law has angered many men, who argue that there is no definitive evidence that violence is more likely to take place in an international marriage arranged over the Internet than in a domestic one. Unwilling or unable to find a spouse in the United States, some worry that the law could make it more difficult to find a wife abroad.

"We should have the right to correspond with, date and marry the person of our choosing," said David Root, who has been involved with many women from the former Soviet Union in the past decade but has not married any of them. "The government shouldn't interfere in this."

Helped by the Internet, international matchmaking has mushroomed. In 1999, a report by the immigration service found some 200 international dating agencies in the United States. A study in 2004 found 500.

The immigration service said 37,500 women entered the country last year on fiancée visas or temporary visas for spouses of American citizens. That was a 50 percent increase from 2002, when the temporary spouse visa came into existence, and a fourfold increase over the 9,500 women who entered on fiancée visas in 1998. Estimates based on the 1999 government report suggested that one-third to one-half of these visas were for women who had met their American partners through matchmaking brokers.

DOJ_NMG_0082354

Under Imbra, dating agencies that specialize in matching American men with women overseas must first obtain information about a man's criminal record and marital history, relay it to the woman and then get her consent before disclosing her contact information. Men must also provide this information to the government when applying for a fiancée visa. Generally, applicants have a lifetime visa limit of two foreign fiancées.

Web sites offer men in affluent countries contacts with women from just about everywhere in the developing world; Brazil, Colombia, the Philippines, Russia, Ukraine and Vietnam are among the most popular countries.

The businesses vary in their approaches. Russianladies.com, owned by European Connections, based in Georgia, charges men for membership and requires a fee for sending and receiving e-mail messages. Two others, A Foreign Affair and Filipina Ladies, organize trips to places like Bangkok, where a dozen men may meet several hundred women.

"It all started with women's lib," said Sam Smith, a former salesman of insurance and mutual funds, who founded I Love Latins in Houston six years ago. "Guys are sick and tired of the North American me, me, me attitude.' "

Mr. Smith and others in the industry said most clients were middle-aged and middle-class, and able to spend several thousand dollars courting a woman overseas. Seventy percent of Mr. Smith's clients are divorced, he said.

Mr. Weaver, a 40-year-old construction manager, had almost given up on dating after a two-year marriage and a strained six-year relationship with a mother of three, which ended when she left him "for a younger man who liked to dance."

At his age, Mr. Weaver figured, the only American women who would be interested in him would be divorced, with a former husband and children in the background. "Been there, done that, not going back again," he said.

Moreover, he said, American women are self-centered, competitive and too critical. "I would prefer a more old-fashioned girl," he said.

Last year, he found Ms. Meza, a Colombian 17 years his junior, on the I Love Latins Web site. "Her profile," he wrote in an e-mail message, "was one of the only ones that said, 'I want to know a man who knows about God.' "

Mr. Weaver bought Ms. Meza a computer, a digital camera and a high-speed connection so they could talk every day by Internet phone. He sends her money on occasion, paying for her English and driving lessons. In September, he visited Ms. Meza in Colombia for the third time.

"My relationship with Yesenia," he said, "is real and more valid than anything I ever had in my life."

Ms. Meza also says she is eager to start her life with Mr. Weaver. "In Colombia most men are womanizers and want to dominate women," she said in a telephone interview. "I want a loving man who will treat me like a queen."

So far, however, they have not cleared immigration. A spokesman for the immigration service said that most of the backlogged visa applications frozen in June had been processed.

"Innocent people are being punished by a law aimed at the misdeeds of a few," Mr. Weaver said. The only time he was ever involved in a violent episode, he said, was a barroom brawl some 20 years ago.

Supporters of the law insist they are not trying to stop marriages between American men and foreign women but say the women should be informed about what they are getting into.

Seeking a woman on some matchmaking sites is not unlike shopping at Amazon.com. The sites often allow men to search for women by age, weight, height, religion and command of English, among other characteristics. And they frequently market the women as untouched by modern American culture.

Russianladies.com states, "Russian ladies are traditional, unpretentious, down-to-earth, and their views of relationships have not been ruined by unreasonable expectations." BarranquillasBest.com offers tips on how to prevent foreign brides from becoming "Americanized."

Randall Miller, a lawyer in Washington who has represented abused women, said such depictions were an invitation to violence.

"The guy doesn't have to be a predator," Mr. Miller said. "He wants to be the king of the house and buys into the promotional claim that he can get a more traditional woman in Russia — she will cook dinner and have sex and otherwise shut up. And he is taken aback when the woman is outspoken and has opinions and wants to get a job."

Two matchmaking companies have sought to block the law in court.

Mr. Weaver, for all his exasperation over the wait, acknowledges that providing the extra information required by the law may be warranted. So does Ms. Meza. But they do not see why they should have to suffer in the meantime.

"If men are investigated it will be good for all women," Ms. Meza said. "But when you are in love and want to go there, you get desperate."

DOJ_NMG_0082355

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Losing Faith In The President (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

White House officials realized they had a problem, former staffer David Kuo writes in his new book, "Tempting Faith," when they saw how a panel rated the first applications for grants under the "faith-based initiative," President Bush's vaunted effort to help religious charities.

On a scale of 1 to 100, respected national organizations such as Big Brothers Big Sisters of America scored in the mid-70s to mid-80s, "while something called Jesus and Friends Ministry from California, a group with little more than a post office box," scored 89 and Pat Robertson's overseas aid organization, Operation Blessing, scored 95, according to Kuo.

"It was obvious that the ratings were a farce," he writes, adding that he and other White House aides feared that if the list became public, "it would show once and for all that the initiative was purely about paying off political friends for their support."

Portions of Kuo's explosive book, which formally went on sale yesterday, were leaked last week by MSNBC. They brought heated denials from White House press secretary Tony Snow and other current and former Bush administration officials.

The book is full of insider anecdotes and details, many of which were not reported by MSNBC, and some of which can be read as defending rather than attacking the Bush White House.

In the case of the grant applications, for example, Kuo says that the ratings obviously favored conservative Christian groups but that the White House "really did have nothing to do with" it. The problem, he asserts, is that the "peer review" panel chosen by the Department of Health and Human Services came from the "faith-based policy world."

"There are, at most, 100 people in think tanks, foundations, major nonprofits and the like who really work on these issues and who support the president. Virtually all of them are very compassionate and dedicated evangelical Christians who tend to be politically conservative," Kuo writes. "They were supposed to review the application in a religiously neutral fashion. . . . But their biases were transparent."

Kuo tells a story about meeting a member of the review panel at a party. He says she giggled as she recalled, "when I saw one of those non-Christian groups in the set I was reviewing, I just stopped looking at them and gave them a zero." Kuo says he laughed but, at the same time, was aghast.

"Some in the press would later 'expose' that we in the White House had doled out grants to friends. They were technically wrong," he writes. "We didn't do it. We didn't have to. The White House influence was so great that its will was carried out by other appointees in other departments without thinking."

In addition to being a memoir of his three years in the White House, where Kuo was deputy director of the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives until December 2003, the book is a saga of falling in, and out of, love with conservative Christian politics.

Kuo, 38, recounts that in college, he was a liberal who interned for Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). But he got a girlfriend pregnant, and they went together to an abortion clinic. "We regretted it. We were relieved. I knew what we'd done. I had no idea what we'd done," he writes.

Haunted, Kuo became an antiabortion activist. When he moved to Washington to work for the National Right to Life Committee and, later, for the CIA, he began attending First Baptist Church in Alexandria. It was there, he said in an interview yesterday, "that I learned that being a good Christian means being a conservative Republican."

Before the age of 27, Kuo took William J. Bennett as a mentor, wrote speeches for Ralph Reed and Robertson, and was domestic policy adviser to then-Sen. John D. Ashcroft (R-Mo.). In 1998, he joined George W. Bush's campaign for president.

Kuo said he was "dazzled" by Bush's talk of compassion. But in his telling, the administration's actions never matched its rhetoric. During the scramble to win tax cuts, for example, the promise of $8 billion per year for charities was scrapped.

To try to climb up the White House's list of priorities, Kuo said, he and others working in the faith-based office offered to politicize their efforts. The White House political affairs office gave them a map of battleground states in 2002, and they used it to plan conferences to win support for GOP candidates. "Smart politics, bad morals," he said in retrospect.

In 2003, Kuo was diagnosed with a malignant brain tumor. It is still growing slowly, he said, giving him perhaps five or 10 years to live.

"I feel a pressing spiritual need to say what I think is important," he said. "And I really think that what is important is to be able to warn Christians about politics, that they should not throw so much at politics, because they're being used, and it will not answer the problems, and it corrupts the name of the God we're trying to serve."

DOJ_NMG_0082356

A Faith-Based Battle For Voters (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

The very fact that it took David Kuo's book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction," to put President Bush's faith-based initiative back into the news proves that the author's thesis is right.

His argument -- Kuo went on the record with it long before this book appeared -- is that the White House never put much money or muscle behind Bush's "compassionate conservatism." It used the faith-based agenda for political purposes and always made tax cuts for the wealthy a much higher priority than any assistance to those "armies of compassion" that Bush evoked so eloquently.

As a result, the faith-based initiative has largely been off the public radar for years. And after Sept. 11, 2001, the president made the war on terrorism his central cause, both for substantive reasons and because (until now, at least) it proved to be a great vehicle for winning crossover votes. Compassionate conservatism gave way to martial conservatism.

The headlines that have come Kuo's way have focused on the author's claims that White House staffers ridiculed some of their evangelical supporters as "nuts" and "goofy" and that public events surrounding Bush's faith-based initiative were geared toward Republican electoral fortunes. As a former deputy director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, Kuo has a fair claim to knowing what he's talking about.

ExposÃ©s of hypocrisy are the mother's milk of Washington journalism. Yet the most useful thing that could flow from Kuo's revelations would not be a splashy exchange of charges and countercharges but rather a quiet reappraisal by rank-and-file evangelicals of their approach to politics.

I hope Kuo's book promotes serious discussions in religious study groups around the country about whether the evangelicals' alliance with political conservatism has actually made the world, well, more godly from their own point of view. What are evangelicals actually getting out of this partnership? Are they mostly being used by a coalition that, when the deals are cut, cares far more about protecting the interests of its wealthy and corporate supporters than its churchgoing foot soldiers?

Kuo is being cut up by some administration loyalists. That's not surprising, but it's painful for me. I met Kuo in the 1990s through a conservative friend and was impressed by the power of his religious faith and his passion for developing a conservative approach to helping the poor that would be as serious as liberal efforts but, in his view, more effective.

The faith-based initiative was one of the few Bush policies I defended against liberal attacks during the administration's early months -- before I concluded that it was not really an administration priority. Kuo and I are both friends of John DiIulio, who briefly headed the faith-based office and brought Kuo in. DiIulio and I collaborated on research into religiously inspired social service work in the 1990s.

All of which is to say that I once hoped -- and, for the future, still hope -- that left and right might meet in some compassionate center to offer support for expanded government help to the needy while also fostering the indispensable work of religious and community groups.

Kuo has always thought that nongovernmental groups could carry a larger share of the load in fighting poverty than I do. Kuo, you see, really is a conservative, although he does acknowledge that not all past efforts by government to help the poor are failures.

Despite our disagreements, I have always shared Kuo's view that liberals who care about the poor should be less squeamish about building stronger alliances between government and religiously based social action work. Government can do things the religious and community groups can't, but the religious and community groups can do things government can't.

Kuo's book comes on the eve of an election in which the odds suggest that voters will administer a strong rebuke to Republicans and the administration. It will thus be read as another argument for why such a reproach is merited.

But the power of his case should be felt after the election. Kuo suggested on "60 Minutes" that evangelical Christians take "a fast from politics." Personally, I don't favor "fasts" from political participation, even if the one Kuo proposes might help the sort of candidates I support. Instead, I hope Kuo's reflections will encourage a less rigidly partisan approach to the role of religious faith in our public life.

When Kuo says there's something wrong with "taking Jesus and reducing him to some precinct captain, to some get-out-the-vote guy," he sounds a trumpet that makes you want to follow him into the battle.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

He's Got Folks Waving Flags -- Red Ones

DOJ_NMG_0082357

David Kuo , the former White House staffer who claims the Bush administration cynically manipulated evangelical Christians, has plenty of GOP loyalists furious with him right now. They can line up behind organizers of the October 2001 "United We Stand" concert, who say Kuo stiffed them to the tune of $25,000.

Kuo was the administration's point man for the star-studded concert at RFK Stadium (featuring Michael Jackson , Aerosmith, James Brown, Janet Jackson, Mariah Carey, P. Diddy, Rod Stewart, Destiny's Child), which was thrown together in the weeks following the 9/11 attacks to benefit the American Red Cross and other relief funds.

Since the principal promoter, Clear Channel Entertainment, was based in Philly, it asked D.C. Republican fundraiser Rob Jennings to help with corporate fundraising. Jennings told us Kuo seized on an idea to hand out 50,000 American flags to the audience and repeatedly assured organizers he could find an underwriter for the $25K cost -- and so the flags were ordered and paid for by the promoter. "It was such a hurried effort that everyone was just trying to do what they could," said Jennings.

The concert came and went -- with all those little flags waving for the cameras -- but the money never arrived, despite Kuo's continued promises. Kuo eventually stopped returning calls, and organizers were quietly asked by the White House to back off, said Jennings. He added that he didn't see Kuo again until he popped up on "60 Minutes" Sunday promoting his new book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction."

"If I did something wrong, I'm sorry," said Kuo yesterday. "That's all I'm going to say, just to save time and apologize to people. I don't want to have hurt anybody."

Kuo said that he doesn't remember much about the concert discussions, but that he regrets if he didn't produce the promised money. He also notes that plenty of Republicans are determined to portray him in the worst possible light right now: "Of course the long knives are out for me. I've had lots of calls from friends about people who are going to 'take me down' or destroy me. I'm not going to back down. I'll confess to whatever it is, so I can keep on talking about what I want to talk about."

Jennings told us he would like Kuo to take the first $25,000 he earns from the book and write a check to the Red Cross. "That would be the right thing to do."

Kuo called us back to ask us for Jennings's phone number so he can apologize.HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

Â· Former representative Connie Morella and husband Tony at the KenCen's Family Theater on Saturday night, back in town from her diplomatic posting in Paris to see her actor son, Paul , in the title role of " Teddy Roosevelt and the Treasure of Ursa Major."

Â· Former Wizards center Gheorghe Muresan holding court at the annual Meridian Ball Friday night, a dozen black-tie-clad fans craning their necks to chat with the 7-foot-7 star.THIS JUST IN . . .

Â· Vince Vaughn , who never officially acknowledged dating Jennifer Aniston during their widely reported relationship of one year, is now threatening to sue tabloids that claimed he cheated on her with a mystery blonde. A statement from his lawyers, reported by People, added that the stars "had not ended their relationship either at the material time or since."

Internal Specter Review Found No Wrongdoing (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

An internal investigation of a senior aide to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and spousal connections to Congressional earmarks found that no illegal or unethical activity occurred, according to a copy of the report reviewed by Roll Call.

However, the report found that Senate ethics rules do not adequately address the large number of spouses, children and other immediate family members who also work as lobbyists, prompting Specter to institute a series of changes to his internal rules of conduct.

The investigation was conducted following news reports that questioned the role that Specter aide Vicki Siegel may have played in securing earmarks sought by clients of a lobbying firm founded by her husband.

The report, completed last spring, looked at six earmarks given to clients of American Defense International, a lobbying firm founded by Siegel's husband, Michael Herson.

In all six cases, internal office records showed that for the earmarks Specter helped secure, aides to Specter were lobbied either by company officials directly or by other lobbyists not associated with Herson. The report also concluded that Herson worked on behalf of these clients on unrelated matters and limited his lobbying in the Senate to the delegations of other states.

Nevertheless, the report acknowledged that a lack of controls on the access of Herson and other lobbyists with familial ties to Specter aides led to the appearance of a conflict of interest, and it recommended a series of firewalls to limit access to the office. These included a ban on family members of aides lobbying Specter or his staff; barring aides from dealings with firms that employ their family members; and full disclosure of any such relationships throughout the earmark consideration process.

Specter put those changes in place this spring, an aide said, noting that staff members were also required to attend a briefing by a Senate Ethics Committee aide.

FBI agents in April reviewed financial disclosure forms for Specter on the same day that USA Today published an article about lobbyists, relatives and earmarks.

However, Specter's decision to order an internal investigate his own staff and change his rules is contrasts with the more defensive posture taken by some other lawmakers who have come under scrutiny for their earmarking efforts.

Hastings Leads Way In Page Investigation (AP-Y)

By Matthew Daly

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

He would rather talk about the latest apple crop, but these days Rep. Doc Hastings is spending more time scrutinizing salacious allegations against a former colleague.

Hastings, a 65-year-old Republican from Washington state, is chairman of the House ethics committee, which is investigating sexually explicit electronic messages sent by ex-Rep. Mark Foley to teenage male pages.

A former small-town paper supplier who represents a rural district best known for its apples and pears, the taciturn Hastings has long sought to blend into the scenery on Capitol Hill. Before taking over the committee last year, he had never held a Washington news conference.

That changed when the committee got the politically uncomfortable job of investigating former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas. The panel had hardly begun meeting before DeLay resigned from Congress.

Now Hastings finds himself in the spotlight again as he leads the Foley inquiry. Foley, R-Fla., resigned last month after he was confronted with instant messages sent to former male pages.

While clearly uneasy about his renewed visibility, Hastings pledges that the Foley investigation will go wherever the evidence leads.

"I take that responsibility that I have as the chairman of the ethics committee very seriously," he told The Associated Press. "Life gives you all sorts of responsibilities, and sometimes you just have to deal with them. I feel very confident in the direction we are moving."

While still in its early stages, the inquiry already has had some missteps.

After an Oct. 5 news conference announcing the investigation, critics accused Hastings of being too close to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., a key focus of the Foley investigation. Some Democrats and others contend Hastert and other House leaders did not do enough to stop Foley after they became aware of some of the electronic messages he had sent.

Asked whether he personally supports Hastert, who named Hastings to lead the ethics committee, Hastings said, "I think the speaker has done an excellent job."

Hastings later clarified that his remarks were "not related to the matter at hand here."

"They should have brought in an outside counsel," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a group that monitors congressional ethics. The ethics panel rejected that idea in favor of a four-member subcommittee of two Republicans and two Democrats from the full committee.

The lack of an outside counsel "gravely undermines the public credibility of the House investigation and calls into serious question whether we will ever get to the bottom of what happened here," Wertheimer said.

Hastings and Rep. Judy Biggert, R-Ill., also were criticized for old political contributions from Hastert's political action committee. The Keep Our Majority committee gave $2,500 to Hastings in 2000, and $6,000 to Biggert in 2002.

In an interview with the AP, Hastings declined to say whether he expects to have the investigation completed by the Nov. 7 election, as some Democrats and outside groups have advocated.

"We are moving to have this done in weeks," he said. "Obviously there are logistics we have to deal with. We are moving as quickly as we can."

But some critics say Hastings has already shown his hand.

"The doctor was out when the patient was very sick," said James Thurber, a political scientist at American University who has studied Congress. Since Hastings took over the ethics panel in early 2005, the committee has met just a few times.

It was only after West Virginia Rep. Alan Mollohan — the former top Democrat on the ethics committee — stepped down under his own ethics cloud that the partisan squabbles ended. Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif., replaced Mollohan in April and established a good working relationship with Hastings.

Berman, who has pledged that he "wanted no part of an incumbent protection agency," said he has been impressed by Hastings.

While the two men disagree politically, "on this committee and for purposes of this investigation, we are going to put those partisan considerations totally aside — as I have seen and witnessed from the chairman during the past five-and-a-half months," Berman said.

In a burst of activity last May, the ethics panel announced a flurry of investigations, focusing on Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, with links to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and on Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., who was at the center of a separate bribery probe. Ney pleaded guilty on Friday in the Abramoff scandal and he faces up to 10 years in prison.

But Thurber said those probes were too little too late.

"I think it's hurt his reputation," he said of Hastings' service on the ethics panel, "and I think he likely will move to get off the ethics committee if the Republicans lose" the majority in November.

Page Board Said Discussed Other Charges (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

Allegations of improper conduct toward House pages, which do not involve ex-Rep. Mark Foley, were discussed Monday by the board overseeing the program, a Democratic lawmaker said.

Rep. Dale Kildee, D-Mich., the only Democrat on the House Page Board, would not elaborate on whether the discussion involved lawmakers. He said, however, that none of the allegations discussed have been proven.

Kildee commented after he testified before the House ethics committee on the Foley matter. He said the House Page Board held the discussions in a conference call.

"It was about other allegations and I'd like to leave it at that," he said. "Let me just say, not about Mr. Foley. It's only been allegations."

The page board consists of three House members and two House officers, the clerk and sergeant at arms.

Kildee has said previously, and repeated again after his testimony, that he was not informed about Foley's e-mails and instant messages to former male pages until the scandal became public in late September.

Kildee has been on the House Page Board for 21 years.

The GOP: Slugged On The Nose (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

"On the nose" is a Hollywood expression. It refers to an idea or a scene or even a piece of dialogue that is too obvious or too good to be true. Hollywood would have said the whole Mark Foley sex scandal is on the nose. Let's just start with the fact that this confessed gay stalker of teenage congressional pages was co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus. All over Hollywood, fingers would go to the tip of the nose: Can't we make it Armed Services?

No, we cannot. To change anything at all about the Foley matter would be to trifle with its essential vacuity, its reliance on bigotry and ignorance, its resplendent Beaver Cleaver qualities (congressional pages, for crying out loud!) and, not least, the fact that so far this is the ultimate Washington sex scandal: There is no sex.

Maybe there will be sex. Maybe some underage page or former page will be discovered to have had sex with Foley, but so far this has not happened. This lack of a physical victim -- with the arguable exception of Foley and the entire Republican Party, that is -- may explain why certain GOP congressional bulls, from committee chairmen to the speaker of the House himself, did not bolt from the joint, pulling every alarm on the way out. Foley was creepy and appallingly inappropriate, but so far that seems to be it.

The lack of a victim hardly gets noticed as politicians coil their ropes, measuring Foley or some other poor chap for a proper lynching. Dennis Hastert should have known. George Bush should have known. Karl Rove should have known. (Why not? He knows everything else.) How come this did not come up on one of those unconstitutional wiretaps? Did anyone in the House leadership think of waterboarding Foley? The man was gay after all. What has happened to the Republican Party we used to loathe?

That, too, is on the nose. That this happened to the GOP is too, too much. It is no longer the party of Lincoln but the party of gay-bashing. Its base, its vaunted base, is among those who embrace ignorance of homosexuality and, while they are at it, ignorance of sexual matters in general. It is deeply blue Massachusetts, after all, that has gay marriage -- Did you notice that the late Gerry Studds's "husband" was quoted in some of his obits? -- and the state was once represented by not one but two gay members of Congress (the other being Barney Frank).

Put the finger back on the nose. It was the GOP that stood for family values. It was the GOP that cozied up to churches and preachers who likened homosexuals to the vilest people of all time and called on them to cease their wicked ways, go from homosexual to heterosexual, which everyone knows they can do but will not because, apparently, it is easier to be gay and reviled than it is to be straight and comfy about it.

DOJ_NMG_0082360

With regard to this sort of haranguing demagoguery, the leaders of the GOP have not just looked away, they have encouraged it. They have set themselves up as the little Dutch boys of American politics, their fingers in the dike, holding back such unspeakable X-rated evil that it is a miracle any child in this great country can grow up to be heterosexual or devout or an accountant.

So it is not possible now to call the whole thing off, to say it was overblown and -- look, folks -- nothing happened with Foley and those kids. It is not possible even to suggest that all those kids are not 8-year-olds but American teenagers, some of them undoubtedly sexually active, probably none of them sexually naive. In all likelihood, nothing Foley messaged them was entirely new to them, and it's even possible to argue that, no matter what was said, psychological trauma is not likely to follow.

The abuse of trust is no laughing matter, and the corruption of children is in a class by itself. But a sex scandal-turned-political panic involving just one person lacks a certain something. That it has attained such critical mass, that it threatens the speaker of the House and the GOP majority, says little about the repellent Foley but a lot about how the GOP has been hoisted by its own petard. It's on the nose all right, but sometimes so is life itself.

Reid To Amend Ethics Reports To Fully Account For Land Deal (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) announced yesterday that he will amend four years of ethics reports to Congress to more fully explain a real estate transaction that allowed him to collect $1.1 million in 2004.

At the same time, he said he will personally reimburse his political campaign $3,300 that his campaign fund contributed for the Christmas bonuses of support staff at the Ritz-Carlton in Washington, where he lives.

The actions, prompted by reports by the Associated Press, are proving to be a headache for Democrats as they press their case that Republicans have succumbed to a "culture of corruption." The land deal, in particular, has brought comparisons to a real estate transaction last year that netted House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) $2 million. In both cases, congressional leaders reaped significant windfalls from land that was purchased in rapidly growing regions and then sold as part of ventures that appear to have obscured the lawmakers' involvement.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley dismissed any comparison, saying Reid noted ownership of the land on his financial disclosure forms. But in his amended ethics statements, he will also note that he transferred ownership to a limited liability corporation in 2001. Subsequent disclosure statements will list ownership under the company's name, Patrick Lane LLC.

"The fact is that this case is simple," Manley said. "He bought the land. He sold the land, and he fully reported that he owned it. Now he's going to go above and beyond all the requirements to ensure the facts are clear for all to see."

Manley said the profit on the deal was about $700,000, after Reid's initial $400,000 investment is subtracted from the amount of the sale.

The Associated Press reported last week that Reid gained the 2004 windfall even though he had not owned the property for the previous three years. Reid had not divulged the 2001 transfer of the land to Patrick Lane LLC, which he co-owned with Jay Brown, a friend and former casino owner.

On the Ritz-Carlton Christmas fund, Reid aides denied any wrongdoing. They said the staff of the hotel, where Reid lives in a condominium, frequently has the burden of additional work because of Reid's political activities. Doormen, valets and other staff members are called on to deal with a stream of visitors and political events.

On advice of counsel, Reid said, he gave the Ritz-Carlton Christmas fund $600 in 2002, $1,200 in 2004 and $1,500 in 2005 from his reelection campaign. Federal election law bars candidates from using political donations for personal use. Reid said he did no such thing but will reimburse his campaign "to prevent this issue from being used in the current campaign season to deflect attention from Republican failures."

Reid Rewrite (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Kate Ackley

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

Under fire from Republicans for alleged ethical lapses, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) announced Monday that he would amend his financial disclosure reports to more fully reflect a 2001 Las Vegas land deal.

While admitting no wrongdoing, the top Senate Democrat said he has directed his staff to revise his ethics reports to make clear that he didn't sell the property in question in 2001, but merely transferred the title to the land to a limited liability corporation.

Reid also said he would address "two minor matters" left off his original disclosure forms relating to two smaller land transactions.

DOJ_NMG_0082361

Reid called the land transaction a "routine legal move" that allowed him to keep ownership of the land through the LLC until 2004, when he sold it for a profit of $700,000.

"Republicans may believe in cover-ups," Reid said. "I believe in ensuring all the facts come to light."

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said by making the changes to his disclosure forms, "the Senator is aggressively getting ahead of the story."

Crawford Charged. The U.S. attorney's office filed charges Monday against former Food and Drug Administration Commissioner Lester Crawford. He was charged with conflict of interest and making a false statement after an investigation into statements he made about his financial holdings during confirmation hearings before the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee.

Court papers allege that Crawford said he no longer owned stock in the companies Sysco and Kimberly-Clark, even though he "and/or his wife held shares in both" and that he held stock in PepsiCo while looking at recommendations for food labels that would affect the company.

Crawford's attorney was quoted in news reports saying he planned to plead guilty as early as today to charges related to the case.

Senator Reid Used Donations For Condo Tips (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 (AP) — The Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, has been using campaign donations instead of his personal money to pay Christmas bonuses for the support staff at the Ritz-Carlton hotel here, where he lives in a condominium.

Federal election law bars candidates from converting political donations for personal use.

Questioned about the campaign expenditures, Mr. Reid's office said Monday that his lawyers had approved them but that he nonetheless was personally reimbursing his campaign for the $3,300 he had directed to the staff holiday fund at his residence.

The bonuses — $600 in 2002, $1,200 in 2004 and $1,500 in 2005 — went from Mr. Reid's re-election campaign to an entity listed as the REC Employee Holiday Fund. His campaign listed the expenses as campaign "salary" for two years, which Mr. Reid said was a clerical error, and as a "contribution" one year.

Mr. Reid also announced he was amending his ethics reports to Congress to account more fully for a Las Vegas land deal, highlighted in an Associated Press article last week, that allowed him to collect $1.1 million in 2004 for property he had not personally owned in three years.

In that matter, the senator had not disclosed to Congress that he first sold land to a friend's limited liability company back in 2001 and took an ownership stake in the company. He collected the seven-figure payout when the company sold the land again in 2004 to others.

Mr. Reid portrayed the 2004 sale as a personal sale of land, not mentioning the company's ownership or its role in the sale.

Reid To Reimburse Campaign For Donations (AP-Y)

By John Solomon

AP-Yahoo, October 17, 2006

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid has been using campaign donations instead of his personal money to pay Christmas bonuses for the support staff at the Ritz-Carlton where he lives in an upscale condominium. Federal election law bars candidates from converting political donations for personal use.

Questioned about the campaign expenditures by The Associated Press, Reid's office said Monday his lawyers had approved them but he nonetheless was personally reimbursing his campaign for the $3,300 he had directed to the staff holiday fund at his residence.

Reid also announced he was amending his ethics reports to Congress to more fully account for a Las Vegas land deal, highlighted in an AP story last week, that allowed him to collect $1.1 million in 2004 for property he hadn't personally owned in three years.

In that matter, the senator hadn't disclosed to Congress that he first sold land to a friend's limited liability company back in 2001 and took an ownership stake in the company. He collected the seven-figure payout when the company sold the land again in 2004 to others.

Reid portrayed the 2004 sale as a personal sale of land, not mentioning the company's ownership or its role in the sale.

DOJ_NMG_0082362

Reid said his amended ethics reports would list the 2001 sale and the company, called Patrick Lane LLC. He said the amended reports also would divulge two other smaller land deals he had failed to report to Congress.

"I directed my staff to file amended financial disclosure forms noting that in 2001, I transferred title to the land to a Limited Liability Corporation," Reid said in a statement issued by his office.

He said he believed the 2001 sale did not alter his ownership of the land but that he agreed to file the amended reports because "I believe in ensuring all facts come to light."

Reid labeled the AP story as the "latest attempt" by Republicans to affect the election. AP reported last week that it learned of the land deal from a former Reid adviser who had concerns about the way the deal was reported to Congress.

On the Ritz-Carlton holiday donations, Reid gave $600 in 2002, then $1,200 in 2004 and $1,500 in 2005 from his re-election campaign to an entity listed as the REC Employee Holiday Fund. His campaign listed the expenses as campaign "salary" for two of the years and as a "contribution" one year.

Reid's office said the listing as salary was a "clerical error" and that the use of campaign money for the residential fund was approved by his lawyers. "I am reimbursing the campaign from my own pocket to prevent this issue from being used in the current campaign season to deflect attention from Republican failures," he said.

Residents and workers at the Ritz said the fund's full name is the Residents Executive Committee Holiday Fund and that it collects money each year from the condominium residents to help provide Christmas gifts, bonuses and a party for the support staff.

Federal election law permits campaigns to provide "gifts of nominal value" but prohibits candidates from using political donations for personal expenses, such as mortgage, rent or utilities for "any part of any personal residence."

The law specifically defines prohibited personal use expenses as any "obligation or expense of any person that would exist irrespective of the candidate's campaign or duties as a federal officeholder."

Land deeds show Reid and his wife, Landra, purchased a condominium for their Washington residence at the hotel for $750,000 in March 2001. The holiday fund has existed for years at the condo, workers said.

Reid said Monday he believed the expenses were permissible but he nonetheless was reimbursing the campaign.

"These donations were made to thank the men and women who work in the building for the extra work they do as a result of my political activities, and for helping the security officers assigned to me because of my Senate position," Reid said.

Larry Noble, the Federal Election Commission's former chief enforcement lawyer, said Reid's explanation is aimed at a "gray area" in the law by suggesting the donations were tied to his official Senate and political work.

"What makes this harder for the senator is that this is his personal residence and this looks like an event that everybody else at the residence is taking out of their personal money as they're living there," Noble said.

Back in 2000, Congress rebuked powerful House Transportation Committee Chairman Bud Shuster, R-Pa., for among other things creating the appearance, through poor record-keeping, that campaign committee expenditures were for personal rather than bona fide campaign uses.

On the land dealings, Reid announced Monday he had failed to disclose two other transactions on his prior ethics reports and would account for those on his amended reports along with the 2001 sale.

The first, he said, involved the sale in 2004 of about one-third acre of land in 2004 he owned in his hometown of Searchlight, Nev. And he said he had not reported his ownership since 1985 of a quarter acre of land his brother gave him in 1985.

Reid said the failure to disclose those transactions previously was due to "clerical errors" and they amounted to "two minor matters that were inadvertently left off my original disclosure forms."

He had asked the Senate Ethics Committee last Wednesday for an opinion on the 2001 land sale but decided to amend his forms prior to the committee acting.

Reid's announcement came after numerous newspapers nationwide published editorials criticizing both his initial failure to disclose the full details of his Las Vegas land deal and his response to AP's story.

The $1.1 million land deal was engineered by Jay Brown, a longtime friend and former casino lawyer whose name surfaced in a major political bribery trial this summer and in other prior organized crime investigations. Brown has never been charged with wrongdoing, except for a 1981 federal securities complaint that was settled out of court.

Ethics experts told AP that Reid's inaccurate accounting of the deal to Congress appeared to violate Senate ethics rules and raised other issues concerning taxes and potential gifts.

Reid Used Campaign Funds To Pay Bonuses To Staff (WT/AP)

By John Solomon

The Washington Times-AP, October 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082363

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid has been using campaign donations instead of his personal money to pay Christmas bonuses for the support staff at the Ritz-Carlton, where he lives in an upscale condominium.

Federal election law bars candidates from converting political donations for personal use.

Questioned about the expenditures by the Associated Press, Mr. Reid's office said yesterday that he was personally reimbursing his campaign for $3,300 in donations he had directed to the staff holiday fund at his residence.

Mr. Reid also announced he was amending his ethics reports to Congress to more fully account for a Las Vegas land deal, highlighted in an AP story last week, that allowed him to collect $1.1 million in 2004 for property he hadn't personally owned in three years.

In that matter, the senator hadn't disclosed to Congress that he first sold land to a friend's limited liability company back in 2001 and took an ownership stake in the company. He collected the seven-figure payout when the company sold the land again in 2004 to others.

Mr. Reid portrayed the 2004 sale as a personal sale of land, making no mention of the company's ownership or its role in the sale.

Ethics experts told the AP that Mr. Reid's inaccurate accounting of the deal to Congress appeared to violate Senate ethics rules and raised other issues concerning taxes and potential gifts.

Mr. Reid said his amended ethics reports would list the 2001 sale and the company, called Patrick Lane LLC. He said the amended reports would also divulge two other smaller land deals he had failed to report to Congress.

"I directed my staff to file amended financial disclosure forms noting that in 2001 I transferred title to the land to a limited liability corporation," Mr. Reid said.

He said he believed the 2001 sale did not alter his ownership of the land but that he agreed to file the amended reports because "I believe in ensuring all facts come to light."

Mr. Reid labeled the AP story as the "latest attempt" by Republicans to affect the election. The AP reported last week that it learned of the land deal from a former Reid adviser who had concerns about the way the deal was reported to Congress.

On the Ritz-Carlton holiday donations, Mr. Reid gave $600 in 2002, $1,200 in 2004 and $1,500 in 2005 from his re-election campaign to an entity listed as the REC Employee Holiday Fund. His campaign listed the expenses as campaign "salary" for two of the years and as a "contribution" one year.

Mr. Reid's office said the listing as salary was a "clerical error."

Residents and workers at the Ritz said the fund's full name is the Residents Executive Committee Holiday Fund and that it collects money each year from the condominium residents to help provide Christmas gifts, bonuses and a party for the support staff.

Federal election law permits campaigns to provide "gifts of nominal value" but prohibits candidates from using political donations for personal expenses, such as mortgage, rent or utilities for "any part of any personal residence."

The law specifically defines prohibited personal use expenses as any "obligation or expense of any person that would exist irrespective of the candidate's campaign or duties as a federal officeholder."

Land deeds show Mr. Reid and his wife, Landra, purchased a condominium for their Washington residence at the hotel for $750,000 in March 2001. The holiday fund has existed for years at the condo, workers said.

Mr. Reid said yesterday he thought the expenses were permissible but he nonetheless was reimbursing the campaign.

"These donations were made to thank the men and women who work in the building for the extra work they do as a result of my political activities, and for helping the security officers assigned to me because of my Senate position," Mr. Reid said.

Larry Noble, the Federal Election Commission's former chief enforcement lawyer, said Mr. Reid's explanation is aimed at a "gray area" in the law by suggesting the donations were tied to his official Senate and political work.

"What makes this harder for the senator is that this is his personal residence and this looks like an event that everybody else at the residence is taking out of their personal money as they're living there," Mr. Noble said.

On the land dealings, Mr. Reid announced yesterday he had failed to disclose two other transactions on his prior ethics reports and would account for those on his amended reports along with the 2001 sale.

The first, he said, involved the sale in 2004 of about one-third acre of land he owned in his hometown of Searchlight, Nev. And, he said he had not reported his ownership since 1985 of a quarter acre of land his brother gave him in 1985.

Mr. Reid said the failure to disclose those transactions previously was due to "clerical errors" and they amounted to "two minor matters that were inadvertently left off my original disclosure forms."

He had asked the Senate Ethics Committee on Wednesday for an opinion on the 2001 land sale but decided to amend his forms prior to the committee acting.

Mr. Reid's announcement came after numerous newspapers nationwide published editorials criticizing both his initial failure to disclose the full details of his Las Vegas land deal and his response to AP's story.

The $1.1 million land deal was engineered by Jay Brown, a longtime friend and former casino lawyer whose name surfaced in a major political bribery trial this summer and in other prior organized crime investigations. Mr. Brown has never been charged with wrongdoing, except for a 1981 federal securities complaint that was settled out of court.

Relatives Have 'inside Track' In Lobbying For Tax Dollars (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Peter Eisler

USA Today, October 17, 2006

Members of Congress and their staffs are barred from using their positions for personal profit. But their spouses and other relatives can — and often do — cash in when lawmakers spend taxpayer dollars.

Lobbying groups employed 30 family members last year to influence spending bills that their relatives with ties to the House and Senate appropriations committees oversaw or helped write, a USA TODAY investigation found. Combined, they generated millions of dollars in fees for themselves or their firms.

The connections are so pervasive that, in 2005 alone, appropriations bills contained about $750 million for projects championed by lobbyists whose relatives were involved in writing the spending bills.

"It smells bad; it is bad," Mickey Edwards, a Princeton University lecturer, said when told of the newspaper's findings. "If it is not already completely outlawed, it should be." Edwards served on the House Appropriations Committee during his 16 years as a Republican congressman from Oklahoma.

USA TODAY examined the family ties between lobbyists and the 94 members of the House and Senate appropriations committees, as well as 250 top staffers who serve those members. Those committees control the federal government's purse strings, allocating hundreds of billions of taxpayer dollars each year.

The family connections between lobbying and lawmaking are prompting complaints that Congress is not doing enough to police itself. No rules or laws prevent lawmakers or their staffs from being lobbied by relatives, and proposals to address the practice have stalled on Capitol Hill.

Neither lawmakers nor lobbyists must report if they are related to each other, so USA TODAY reviewed thousands of pages of financial disclosures and lobbyist registrations, property records, marriage announcements and other public documents to identify which lawmakers and staffers had relatives in the lobbying business.

The newspaper found 53 cases in which relatives of lawmakers or their top aides worked at lobbying firms last year. In 30 instances, those relatives, or firms in which they are principals, sought money in the appropriations bills their family members or their family members' bosses helped write. Of those 30 relatives, 22 succeeded in getting specific language inserted in the bills that guaranteed money for their clients, USA TODAY found. Among them:

·Lobbyist Juliet Pacquing collected $60,000 last year from Rhode Island manufacturer TPI Composites, lobbying disclosure forms show. Her husband, Kevin Cook, is the top staffer for the House Appropriations subcommittee on energy and water, chaired by Rep. Dave Hobson, R-Ohio. In news releases, Hobson took credit for securing money for TPI to develop an Army vehicle similar to the Humvee but with lighter materials. The total: $4.5 million. Hobson said Pacquing's relationship did not influence him.

·Lobbyist William Clyburn Jr., received $60,000 last year from two consulting firms to seek federal funding for the Augusta, Ga., airport, disclosure forms show. His cousin is Rep. Jim Clyburn, D-S.C. In an interview with USA TODAY in July, lobbyist Clyburn said he secured $2.5 million for the airport after speaking with lawmaker Clyburn about having the money put into an appropriations bill. In September, a spokeswoman for Rep. Clyburn disputed that characterization. A day later, lobbyist Clyburn reversed his earlier statement and said he did not speak with his relative about getting funding.

·Lobbyist Holly Piper's firm took in $220,000 last year from e-Cavern, a company seeking federal funding to build an underground facility to protect financial information in a Kentucky cavern. Piper's husband is Billy Piper, chief of staff to Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., a senior member of the Appropriations Committee and the second-ranking Senate Republican. McConnell added $1.5 million to an appropriations bill for the project. McConnell's spokesman said Holly Piper's relationship had nothing to do with the senator's decision.

·A start-up lobbying firm co-founded by Cindy Young took in $40,000 last year for helping Dynamic Defense Materials win federal funding to develop new body armor for the military. Young's father-in-law, Rep. C.W. "Bill" Young, R-Fla., chairs the House Appropriations defense subcommittee. Rep. Young acknowledged that his daughter-in-law had set up meetings between him and her clients, including the defense contractor. Rep. Young included $1 million in his bill to fund the company's body armor project. He denied there was any special treatment.

Lawmakers who wrote or approved such spending language sometimes received campaign contributions from the clients and the lobbyists that represented them, the newspaper found. For instance, federal records show Rep. Hobson received a total of $8,000 in campaign contributions from 2005 through 2006 from Pacquing and executives at TPI, the company that hired Pacquing to lobby him.

DOJ_NMG_0082365

"It pays to be related to a member of the appropriations committee," said James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University in Washington. "It shows a serious conflict of interest between those appropriators who are supposed to be appropriating for the public interest and their relatives, who obviously have special access to these individuals.

"In the balance of the public interest vs. private interest," Thurber said, "it seems the public interest loses again."

The lobbyists, lawmakers and staffers who spoke to USA TODAY insist that no special treatment was sought or given. Many lobbyists say they have no contact with their family members on appropriations business, though they admit lobbying others who work with or for their relative.

Lawmakers say they are not swayed by their family ties. That's the position of Florida Rep. Young, whose daughter-in-law Cindy Young is a partner in a small Pennsylvania lobbying firm that primarily serves defense contractors. Rep. Young said his daughter-in-law handles legal and business issues for the firm, but she has not registered to lobby Congress.

"Cindy has said, on occasion, 'Hey, would you see this client?' and I've done that," Young said. "But they don't get any special treatment." He said all of the projects had to have another congressional sponsor before he would meet with company officials or consider funding them — a rule he said he enforces for all lobbyists seeking money from his panel.

Young said he accepts no campaign contributions from any clients of his daughter-in-law's firm. And he points out that he rejected requests from two of those clients because he wanted to give the military more of an opportunity to review the projects. "Bottom line," he said, is that those companies "don't get any special treatment, no different from the clients of any other lobbyists who bring people in to see me."

Young said his daughter-in-law is within her rights to run a lobbying firm, even if it represents companies seeking federal funding from his panel. He said his office consulted with the House ethics committee to ensure that her status with the firm, and his interactions with her and her clients, all were within the scope of House rules.

"My daughter-in-law has a right to make a living," the congressman said. "I don't know that I can see one lobbyist or one attorney and not see another just because she has a relationship to my son."

Last year, clients of Cindy Young's firm won $2 million in funding in the defense spending bill that her father-in-law oversaw. In one case, $1 million was directed to one of Cindy Young's clients, Dynamic Defense Materials, to develop body armor for the military. The money came in the form of an "earmark," a provision that lawmakers add to spending bills for an item or program that wasn't requested by the agency getting the money, or authorized by previous legislation.

Cindy Young did not respond to requests for an interview.

Juliet Pacquing's husband, Kevin Cook, is the top staffer for the House Appropriations subcommittee for energy and water programs. The chairman of that subcommittee — the lawmaker who relies most heavily on Cook as a staffer — is Rep. Hobson.

During the past two years, one of Pacquing's main clients, TPI Composites, has received more than $500,000 in federal contracting work under programs funded by Hobson's energy and water appropriations bill.

Hobson also sits on the Appropriations defense subcommittee. In a defense appropriations bill, TPI got $4.5 million to help the Army develop a composite vehicle similar to the Humvee. In a news release, Hobson took credit for getting the money, noting that some work on the vehicle would be done at a TPI facility in his district.

Pacquing acknowledged that she has lobbied Hobson for defense earmarks on behalf of TPI. But she said she never seeks money under the energy and water bill that Cook helps the congressman write. She said she was unaware that her client benefited from the bill. "I don't lobby my husband," she said. "There's a conflict there."

Pacquing said her lobbying work relies on contacts she made in her previous job as a staffer on the Appropriations defense panel. Those clients, she said, are almost exclusively defense contractors. "I'm just a small fish," she said. "I don't know why you're talking to me."

Hobson said he was also unaware that TPI has a financial stake in programs funded by his energy and water bill. That legislation controls spending for a variety of programs, including research into wind energy technology. TPI manufactures blades for experimental wind turbines being developed by Sandia National Laboratory.

"I didn't even know that the contracts were there or that (TPI) even dealt with Sandia," Hobson said. "There's no problem there, because (the Sandia contracts) were competitively bid. … (But) we have to make sure that we continue to have this firewall" between Pacquing and Cook.

As for the earmark for the Army vehicle, Hobson said Pacquing's relationship to Cook "had absolutely nothing to do with it." He said he has been pushing the Pentagon for years to develop lighter, better-armored tactical vehicles, and TPI has been at the forefront of that effort.

TPI declined to comment. Executives with the company donated a total of $6,000 to Hobson's campaign in 2005 and 2006, federal records show. Pacquing gave $2,000 to Hobson in the same span.

"I don't know whether you can say I encouraged" the contributions from TPI, Pacquing said. "It's just common sense to donate. They've been working with Congressman Hobson, and they'd like for him to be re-elected."

Lobbyist William Clyburn Jr. said he sees no benefit to having family on the Appropriations Committee. The lobbyist is the son of Rep. Clyburn's first cousin, and Clyburn said he grew up calling the lawmaker "uncle." Rep. Clyburn is the third-highest-ranking House Democrat and a member of the Appropriations panel handling transportation projects.

Cedric Johnson, chairman of the Augusta (Ga.) Airport Commission, said that the board knew of the lobbyist's family ties to Rep. Clyburn but that he wasn't hired for his family connections. He said the board sought William Clyburn's help because they knew him from his days as a staffer for then-senator Zell Miller, D-Ga.

Regardless, Johnson said the board could not have won the $2.5 million for terminal improvements without the lobbyist. "He helped us quite a bit with showing us the ropes and what we needed to do to get funding," Johnson said.

In an interview in July — before the newspaper contacted Rep. Clyburn's office — lobbyist William Clyburn acknowledged that he discussed funding for the Augusta airport with his congressman cousin. He didn't credit that relationship for his success. Instead, he talked of the contacts he made during more than a decade in Washington as a congressional staffer and member of the Surface Transportation Board.

"There hasn't been anything that, 'Because Jim is your relative, you're going to get this or that,' " William Clyburn said. "It was really dependent on the network I had developed over the years."

Kristie Greco, a spokeswoman for Rep. Clyburn, told USA TODAY in September that the congressman and his cousin had not discussed the Augusta airport funding or any other business. "He doesn't lobby before the congressman," Greco said of William Clyburn. She suggested that the newspaper contact the lobbyist again.

The next day, in a second interview, William Clyburn reversed what he had told the newspaper in July. He said he discussed other matters with his cousin but had not discussed the Augusta airport funding with him. "Going to a relative, that doesn't make it happen for that project," he said. "You have to have both House and Senate, both Democrats and Republicans."

Just months after Holly Piper left her job as an aide for Sen. McConnell to join the lobbying business in 2004, she married his chief of staff.

Piper went to work for Bates Capitol Group, a Louisville lobbying firm with a client list heavy on Kentucky businesses. One company for which Piper sought money, is e-Cavern, lobbying records show. The company has teamed with local universities to turn a 3-million-square-foot cavern near the city into an underground "technology business park." There, companies or government agencies can build secure facilities to store critical infrastructure and financial records.

As a senior member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, McConnell secured $1 million in federal funding for the facility in 2004, Piper's first year as a lobbyist for e-Cavern. In 2005, McConnell secured another $1.5 million for the project. In those two years, e-Cavern's annual lobbying payments to Bates Capitol climbed from $80,000 to $220,000. Last year, two of e-Cavern's top executives contributed $1,000 each to McConnell's campaign account.

McConnell spokesman Don Stewart said Piper's relationship to the senator's top staffer had nothing to do with McConnell's steering federal funds to the project. "The senator's priorities have been (focused) on making the commonwealth's universities world class, making them competitive," Stewart said, "so that (funding) flows right into his objective."

Stewart said McConnell barred any lobbying contacts between Holly Piper and her husband after they were married. And a year later, in spring 2005, he expanded that policy to forbid anyone on his staff from having any contact with lobbyists who have a relative in the senator's office. Holly Piper has since left the lobbying business and declined to comment.

McConnell's no-contact policy for Piper "was just him trying to go above and beyond what was required," Stewart said. All of his funding decisions are made on their own merits and "are completely justified," Stewart said of McConnell. "He's willing to defend any of them."

In the case of e-Cavern, Stewart said, any lobbying of McConnell or his staff would have been done by the company's other lobbyist at Bates Capitol: company president Hunter Bates — the man who served as McConnell's chief of staff before Billy Piper got the job.

Unlike Congress, the judicial and executive branches have strict guidelines on nepotism and contacts with lobbyists and business interests, said Ronald Utt, a budget expert at the conservative Heritage Foundation think tank.

For example, laws bar executive branch employees from taking action affecting the financial interests of their spouses or minor children. Federal judges are required to remove themselves from cases affecting the financial interests of their spouses or minor children, or when lawyers or parties to the case are related to the judge. "It's particularly troublesome, because (Congress is) in an environment that has very limited, formal ethical standards to begin with," Utt said.

DOJ_NMG_0082367

"The ethics of it are terrible," he said of the newspaper's findings. "It's getting to the point where no one bothers to hide what appear to be raging conflicts of interest."

Utt said it's "both impossible and preposterous" to believe that relatives who are lobbyists don't influence their family members.

Congress appears unlikely to act this year to address how lawmakers and their staff should deal with family members in the lobbying business. As the congressional session enters its final weeks, lobbying bills passed in the spring by the House and Senate have stalled. Congressional leaders have yet to set up a committee of House and Senate members to reconcile differences between the two pieces of legislation. Those differences must be resolved before a final bill can be voted on, let alone passed.

The Senate bill would bar all "official contact" with a lawmaker's office by a registered lobbyist who is an "immediate family member" of that lawmaker — a definition that includes spouses, children and certain in-laws. That bill does not address situations in which a lobbyist is related to a staff member.

The House bill is silent on the issue of lobbying relatives.

Currently, the only official pronouncement on the issue of family ties is an opinion by the Senate Ethics Committee. The committee recommended that a lobbyist related to a senator's chief of staff should not be allowed to lobby anyone in that senator's office. The opinion was never adopted as a rule. And it has no bearing in the House.

"There has to be a serious review of congressional rules in terms of the lobbying done by spouses of members and other relatives," said Fred Wertheimer, a longtime advocate of tighter lobbying restrictions who heads the reform group Democracy 21. "In effect, Congress as an institution has said with regard to all the congressional corruption scandals, 'It's none of your business,' " Wertheimer said. "That's just dead wrong. … It's the public's interest that Congress is responsible for protecting."

Little Accountability In Earmarks (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Peter Eisler

USA Today, October 17, 2006

Family ties give lobbyists insight into how legislation is written — and access to those who are in positions to secure millions for specific projects.

"These are the insiders' insiders," said Ellen Miller, executive director of the Sunlight Foundation, a budget watchdog group. "Lobbyists rule the legislative process. But lobbyists who are family members really have the inside track."

One of the most popular ways to ensure a project gets funded is by adding a provision called an "earmark" to an appropriations bill.

An earmark commits the government to spend a specific amount on a specific program. Earmarks that benefit companies usually direct money to a project that the companies are hired to handle, not to the companies themselves.

Members of the appropriations committees can add earmarks. Often, their staff members, who write much of the legislation, are in position to encourage their bosses to do so.

John Scofield, a spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee, says earmarks are an appropriate way for Congress to put its stamp on federal policy. "That's the way (the legislative branch) is supposed to work," he said.

There is little accountability in the earmark process, however. Lawmakers can add the language anonymously. Until recently, no rules required Congress to disclose an earmark's sponsor, and the information is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act or other public-records requirements.

The House changed its rules Sept. 14 to require that spending and tax bills include the name of the lawmaker sponsoring an earmark. However, that rule expires Dec. 31.

In the past decade, the number of earmarks in appropriations bills has more than tripled, to almost 16,000 in 2005, according to the Congressional Research Service. Taxpayer groups and fiscal conservatives in Congress point to earmarks as a major source of waste.

"There's no question that unaccountable earmarking leads to wasteful spending and special favors for campaign contributors or family members who are lobbying for stuff," Miller said.

Occasionally, a company will announce that it has received funding via an earmark. Lawmakers sometimes take credit for them, too, to show that they are fighting for a local project.

In February, USA TODAY reported that Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., added 13 earmarks over four years that set aside almost $50 million for clients of a lobbyist married to a top aide.

Specter said he did not know the beneficiaries were clients of his aide's husband. The FBI is now investigating whether the aide, Vicki Siegel Herson, broke the law by helping her husband Michael Herson. Specter has said he did nothing wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0082368

Congress's Charity Cases (NYT)

By Frances R. Hill

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

Coral Gables, Fla.

A REPORT issued last week by the minority staff of the Senate Finance Committee details how the fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff exploited tax-exempt organizations — both sham nonprofits and otherwise legitimate charities — to move money from clients he disdained to congressmen he hoped to influence.

Why were charities Mr. Abramoff's go-to vehicles as he sought to transfer funds covertly through Washington's corridors of power? The primary attraction was their opacity: their ability to raise money in any amount, without limit, from any individual or entity anywhere in the world without disclosing the contributors to anyone.

This makes good sense for honest charities helping people in need. But Mr. Abramoff took advantage of this situation to circumvent campaign finance laws and Congressional ethics rules and provide illicit benefits to powerful politicians.

Though members of Congress are subject to strict rules regarding gifts, travel and entertainment, there have long been exceptions for "value received from charity" — ostensibly to permit officials to help charities raise money for worthy causes.

So the tax-exempt treasuries of willing nonprofits like Americans for Tax Reform, run by the Republican strategist Grover Norquist, became conduits through which funds from lobbyists like Mr. Abramoff and other special interests were transferred to elected officials, their families and their aides in the form of lavish travel, expensive meals, golf outings and tickets to sports and entertainment events.

The rules that govern charitable giving obscured the true source of these gifts, while at the same time affording lobbyists private access to the congressmen they were trying to influence.

In its 2003 decision upholding the campaign finance law, the Supreme Court repeatedly expressed its concern that tax-exempt organizations could be abused in just this way.

And now this grim report from the Senate Finance Committee's Democratic investigators should remind Congress and tax-exempt organizations that reform is overdue.

The guiding principle should be simple and direct: a politician's only relationship with a charity should be as a contributor. Elected officials should not accept travel or meals or golf course fees, even if they claim that participating in charity events will induce others to write checks for a good cause.

In order to put this principle into effect, Congress should begin by eliminating exceptions in ethics rules, campaign finance laws or lobbyist registration laws for benefits channeled to politicians through nonprofit, tax-exempt entities.

Any funds or benefits that a charity gives to a politician or a political committee should be traced back to the original contributor on regularly-filed disclosure reports. Just as important, politicians should be prohibited from raising money from third parties for charities they control, directly or indirectly.

If politicians help other charities raise money, they should accept absolutely nothing in return from those organizations or any organizations related to them. The same rules should apply to politicians' spouses, children and children's spouses, as well as to current and former staff members and their immediate families.

Finally, Congress should establish an electronic database where members list all their contributions to charities, benefits they receive from charities and their leadership positions in such groups.

As I.R.S. commissioner Mark Everson noted back in January, when the government announced Mr. Abramoff's plea agreement, "The mixing of politics, money and charities is, simply stated, a bad cocktail."

Indeed, it's distressing to see that in exchange for a taste of the high life, members of Congress were apparently selling what cannot be for sale in a representative democracy — access to the public policy process and possibly even their votes. Charities serve many indispensable purposes, but financing the livings of the powerful and privileged is not one of them.

President Bush To Visit Greensboro Elementary (News14NC)

By Kira Mathis

News 14 Carolina, October 16, 2006

GREENSBORO -- One Greensboro elementary school will be welcoming a very exciting visitor this week. President Bush is scheduled to visit Falkener Elementary School on Wednesday, and that means Greensboro has plenty of preparing to do in time for the president's big visit.

"I didn't believe it," said Principal Amy Holcombe, "I thought it was one of my brothers playing a joke on me at first."

But the news that Holcombe heard was no joke at all. President George W. Bush will in fact be visiting her school on Wednesday

DOJ_NMG_0082369

The White House picked Falkener Elementary because it is a successful example of the No Child Left Behind legislation.

President Bush is scheduled to visit Falkener Elementary School on Wednesday. The White House says Falkener is a successful example of the No Child Left Behind legislation.

"We're very honored to have him come and visit Falkener. We're sure he picked the best school he could have," Holcombe said.

Students at the school have already made a sign to welcome the president. It also has a special message for the first dog, Barney.

"They're thrilled. The students are so excited about the visit. It's all they're talking about around the school today," Holcombe said.

The school is also taking extra steps in the classroom, so the students realize the meaning of the visit.

These school children will spend time this week learning about the significance of the visit.

"We're putting an additional focus on this particular area of the curriculum. Our students normally study local, state and federal government but we're shifting that to this week, so they have a heightened awareness of who is coming to visit and the significance of the visit," Holcombe said.

That means until Wednesday, Falkener Elementary will put all of its effort into making the school look great for President Bush's visit.

Falkener Elementary School has only been open for five years, but it has continually met adequate yearly progress and they have been named a School of Distinction in North Carolina.

President To Visit Greensboro Students (WGHP)

WGHP-TV High Point, North Carolina, October 16, 2006

Greensboro -- President George W. Bush returns to the Piedmont Wednesday. Among his stops will be Greensboro's Falkener Elementary.

The national recognition will spotlight the success Falkener has made in raising test scores. The majority of the school's students come from economically depressed backgrounds.

The success, according to Principal Amy Holcombe comes after hard work and good student-teacher relationships. The school uses money from the federal No Child Left Behind program.

Holcombe said the President plans to visit a few classes and plans to speak to all students via closed-circuit television.

As TSP Grows, Participants Get Chance To Chart Future (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Account balances in the Thrift Savings Plan could grow to $200 billion by year's end, the chairman of the board that oversees the 401(k)-type plan for government employees said yesterday.

Hitting $200 billion would make the TSP twice as large as four years ago, Andrew M. Saul , the head of the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, said at the board's monthly meeting. "That's really a milestone," he said.

TSP participants, like many other investors, are benefiting from the recent run-up in the stock market. Since the start of the year, the TSP's international stock index fund has gained 14.55 percent, and the large, common stock index fund has returned 8.49 percent, according to data presented to the board.

Trading costs also have jumped for the TSP, according to data released yesterday. For the first six months of this year, the plan's investment expenses totaled $9.85 million, slightly more than the trading costs incurred by the plan for all of 2005. TSP officials said most of this year's trading costs were driven by increased transactions in the international index fund, which is more expensive to buy and sell in than other TSP funds.

Despite the interest in the international fund, it is not the most popular investment choice for government workers. At the end of September, 37 percent of TSP assets were in the government securities fund and 35 percent in the large, common stock index fund. Only 9 percent of TSP assets, about $16.7 billion, were in the international fund. The rest of the account balances were spread across the bond index, small-company and life-cycle funds.

The life-cycle funds, which were launched a year ago, are showing steady growth. Last month, officials noted, TSP investors pulled out about $689 million from the government securities fund and transferred most of it into life-cycle funds, bringing the balance in those accounts to $14 billion.

The L Funds, as they are known, allow participants to diversify their savings by selecting an investment mix that most closely meshes with the time that they expect to draw down their retirement savings.

DOJ_NMG_0082370

The TSP was created by Congress about 20 years ago and has 3.66 million participants. About 86 percent of workers covered by the Federal Employees Retirement System contribute to the TSP and receive matching contributions from their agencies. FERS-covered employees also qualify for Social Security and a pension.

Other government workers who typically qualify for a traditional pension or military retirement pay do not receive matching contributions from their agencies. About 67.5 percent of employees in the old Civil Service Retirement System participate in the TSP, and 23.6 percent of the armed forces and other uniformed services make contributions.

TSP officials plan to put a questionnaire in the mail at the end of the month to gather feedback on what participants think of their retirement plan and what changes they might support. About 20,000 participants will receive the survey.

Officials hope to use the feedback and a consultant's study to make decisions late this year or next year on whether to recommend new investment options for the TSP, such as real estate, commodities and emerging markets.

Other issues likely to come before the board next year include:

· Whether to ask Congress to require automatic enrollment in the TSP for new hires. Government employees now must sign up for a payroll deduction.

· Whether to ask Congress to designate a new default fund for FERS employees who do not enroll but receive a mandatory agency contribution of 1 percent of salary. That money now goes into the government securities fund, but TSP officials think the L Funds would be a more appropriate, long-term investment.

· Whether to add a Roth 401(k)-like feature, similar to private-sector Roth individual savings accounts, to the TSP. With a Roth option, participants would make contributions with money that had been taxed, but the contributions would grow tax-free and account balances would be withdrawn tax-free. Employees now contribute pre-tax dollars to the TSP and pay taxes when they withdraw their savings.

Our View On Higher Education: Time To Grade Colleges (USAT)

USA Today, October 17, 2006

Fears of proposed database are hypothetical, but need for it is real.

Shoppers looking for a vacuum cleaner or a plasma TV can check Consumer Reports to compare ratings and value. For a car, dozens of websites assess prices, safety and gas mileage.

But for parents and students mulling one of the biggest investments of their lives, a college education, comparison shopping is nearly impossible. The most popular college guides tell more about the test scores of incoming students than about how many came out four years later with a degree. While the federal government calculates graduation rates, nearly 50% of students are missing from the data.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings wants to change that. Last month, she proposed a privacy-protected database that would collect information on all students attending college. It would open the way to comparative data and greater accountability. But given the controversy the proposal has kicked up, Spellings will likely need a go-ahead from Congress to spend money on it.

While most of the nation's public universities and community colleges favor the plan, private schools are vehemently opposed, arguing that its very existence would compromise student privacy.

That's dubious. The proposed system would not identify individual students by name or give other identifying information, and experience shows privacy can be protected. Forty states have systems that track individual student information for public universities and colleges; 17 of those also gather data from private colleges, according to the National Center for Higher Education Management Systems.

Peter Ewell, the center's vice president, could recall no breaches of individual records. Nor could the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, which opposes a federal tracking system.

While fears of compromised privacy are hypothetical, the need for a new system is real. The current state systems are incompatible, so comparison among schools in different states is impossible. Federal statistics miss students who start part-time, enter later or transfer from other institutions.

Better data, through either a comprehensive database or scientifically valid sampling, could answer many pressing questions. Consumers who now see only a school's sticker price might learn what students actually pay, after financial aid is calculated. Researchers might learn why students drop out and where they go. Or what impact college has on their future success.

American taxpayers spend $30 billion a year on financial aid for college students, so they have a right to information about the return on their investment. For parents and students, the average cost of four years of college is $49,000 at a public college and $116,000 at a private school. They certainly deserve a more accurate picture of what they're getting for all that money.

Don't Invade Student Privacy (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0082371

By David Shi

USA Today, October 17, 2006

College transparency is needed, but tracking individuals would go too far.

The most difficult choices in public policy mimic the most difficult choices in life. Choosing between good and evil is easy; choosing one good over another is not.

This is the real issue behind the intense debate over the Education Department's proposal to require colleges to report individual student record data rather than aggregated totals, as is now done.

Opponents, including most private colleges and universities, agree that greater transparency is a good thing. However, the proposed database would put at risk fundamental privacy rights, especially the right of students to control their academic records — a federally protected right since 1972.

Most of the nation agrees with us: 62% in a recent national survey opposed requiring colleges to report individual student data to the government. Last spring, the House voted to prohibit the Education Department from creating such a database because of privacy concerns. That vote occurred before startling revelations that several federal databases had been compromised, including the department's own student loan system.

Advocates of a new database ignore the wealth of data already available online from colleges, such as Furman University, and from the government. Prospective students have access to graduation and retention rates, financial aid data, estimated student expenses, degrees awarded and much more. Yet the department has done little to make this data user-friendly. In 2004, the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities proposed a better way to do that, but the plan was met with silence.

We oppose a new individual tracking system because we fear a larger, more intrusive government bureaucracy. Greater transparency and accountability in higher education can be achieved without threatening privacy. To their credit, some proponents of a student unit-record system are willing to try to address our concerns. Yet more needs to be done. My colleagues and I are eager to work with the department to find ways for colleges to provide more useful and accessible data for applicants while protecting parents' and students' fundamental privacy rights.

David Shi is president of Furman University and chairman of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities.

Sen. Brownback's Litmus Test (WP)

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

IF YOU THOUGHT that fights over judicial nominations couldn't get any worse, consider the case of Janet T. Neff, whom President Bush has nominated to a federal district judgeship in Michigan. Judge Neff, who serves on the Michigan Court of Appeals, is part of a multi-judge deal between the White House and Michigan's two Democratic senators resolving a long-standing fight over federal court nominees from that state. Yet in reaching an accommodation with the home-state senators, Mr. Bush finds himself with another problem. For Judge Neff, it turns out, once attended a commitment ceremony for a lesbian couple -- and that has Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R) reaching for the smelling salts and blocking the nomination.

Mr. Brownback has said he wants to satisfy himself that the judge was not presiding over an "illegal marriage ceremony" in Pittsfield, Mass., in 2002 -- before the state legalized same-sex marriage. He has written to Judge Neff asking for an explanation, his spokesman says, and will hold up her nomination until he learns the nature of the ceremony and its legality. "It seems to speak about her view of judicial activism," the senator told the Associated Press.

In fact it does nothing of the kind. A commitment ceremony is not a marriage; it has no legal force whatsoever but is a private expression of the love and devotion of two people. The idea that such a ceremony could be "illegal" is deeply offensive; Americans are entitled to gather, speak, celebrate and worship as they see fit. An administration official says Judge Neff has told Mr. Brownback that she didn't preside. But even if she did, that would say nothing about her jurisprudential views -- merely that she wished to help a couple recognize their relationship informally in the absence of state sanction for it. Keeping Judge Neff off the federal bench over such a matter is perilously close to declaring her unfit to serve because she has lesbian friends.

It also does a disservice to Mr. Bush. We have criticized Democrats for obstructing qualified judicial nominees; it is no more acceptable when Republicans do it. In this case, Mr. Bush has finally reached a compromise with Michigan senators to ease one of the more intractable irritants in the wars over lower court nominations. Judge Neff is a piece of that deal, all of which could get derailed if Mr. Brownback does not back off.

DOJ_NMG_0082372

OTHER NEWS:

Lower Deficit Sparks Debate Over Tax Cuts' Role (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

With great fanfare, President Bush last week claimed credit for a striking reversal of fortune: New figures show the federal budget deficit shrinking by 40 percent over the past two years, a turnaround the president hopes will strengthen his push for further tax cuts.

Bush hailed the dwindling deficit as a direct result of "pro-growth economic policies," particularly huge tax cuts enacted during his first term. "Tax relief fuels economic growth. And growth -- when the economy grows, more tax revenues come to Washington. And that's what's happened," Bush said.

Economists said Bush was claiming credit where little is due. The economy has grown and tax receipts have risen at historic rates over the past two years, but the Bush tax cuts played a small role in that process, they said, and cost the Treasury more in lost taxes than it gained from the resulting economic stimulus.

"Federal revenue is lower today than it would have been without the tax cuts. There's really no dispute among economists about that," said Alan D. Viard, a former Bush White House economist now at the nonpartisan American Enterprise Institute. "It's logically possible" that a tax cut could spur sufficient economic growth to pay for itself, Viard said. "But there's no evidence that these tax cuts would come anywhere close to that."

Economists at the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office and in the Treasury Department have reached the same conclusion. An analysis of Treasury data prepared last month by the Congressional Research Service estimates that economic growth fueled by the cuts is likely to generate revenue worth about 7 percent of the total cost of the cuts, a broad package of rate reductions and tax credits that has returned an estimated $1.1 trillion to taxpayers since 2001.

Robert Carroll, deputy assistant Treasury secretary for tax analysis, said neither the president nor anyone else in the administration is claiming that tax cuts alone produced the unexpected surge in revenue. "As a matter of principle, we do not think tax cuts pay for themselves," Carroll said.

But, he said, "we do think good tax policy can lead to important economic benefits. . . . The size of the tax base is larger than it would have been without the tax relief."

The subtleties of that argument have been lost on the campaign trail. With less than three weeks to go until the Nov. 7 election, Republicans are promoting the good fiscal news, eager to talk about something other than the House page scandal and mounting casualties in Iraq.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) claimed credit for "driving down the deficit" and accused Democrats of plotting to roll back the tax cuts if they win a majority in the House, a move Hastert said "would destroy jobs and hurt the economy." Bush, meanwhile, called on Congress to permanently extend the cuts, which are scheduled to expire by 2010, at an additional cost to the Treasury of $2.2 trillion by 2016, according to CBO estimates.

Democrats criticized the president for celebrating a deficit that still ranks among "the largest in our nation's history," as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California put it. And they pointed to CBO projections that the deficit will rise again next year and balloon in coming decades as 78 million retiring baby boomers make claims on Social Security and Medicare.

"The truth is that the administration's fiscal policies have failed," said Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.), the senior Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee. "They have not benefited most Americans. They have dramatically worsened our long-term budget outlook. And they are putting our fundamental economic security at risk."

Without question, the deficit is receding. Despite spending swollen by storm cleanup on the Gulf Coast and the war in Iraq, the deficit fell to $248 billion in the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30, down from a record $413 billion in 2004, as higher tax receipts poured into the government's coffers.

If growth induced by Bush's cuts doesn't explain the surge, where did all those extra tax dollars come from?

The short answer is spectacularly high corporate profits and the advancing fortunes of wealthy Americans, economists said.

Skyrocketing profits caused corporate tax receipts to jump 27 percent, to $354 billion, in 2006, the largest increase in any tax category. "After three years of strong profits, corporate tax receipts as a share of [the economy] are at levels not seen since the late 1970s," the CBO said in its August budget report.

DOJ_NMG_0082373

Meanwhile, individual income tax receipts rose 12 percent, to more than $1 trillion, largely on the strength of higher salaries, bonuses and non-wage income from stock market gains, a subcategory that climbed by 20 percent, according to CBO estimates.

Why those earnings are increasing so rapidly is, at the moment, a bit of a mystery, economists said, noting that details of individual tax returns will not be available for analysis until 2008. A robust economy and a strong stock market deserve the bulk of the credit, the economists said, but tax collections are growing far faster than the economy as a whole, so those factors cannot completely explain the Treasury's good fortune or suggest how long it might last.

As recently as March, the CBO was projecting a 2006 deficit of $371 billion, despite a strong economic outlook. And administration officials in February predicted that Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath would help push the 2006 deficit to $423 billion, the largest ever in nominal dollar terms. The record is held by the 2004 deficit, though that budget gap was smaller than some deficits of the 1980s when measured against the size of the economy.

"The money flowed in in a way that no one expected," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former Bush White House economist who retired last year as CBO director. "Good economic growth is not the surprise. The surprise is that profits as a whole are so much higher."

Over the past decade, the budget deficit has tracked the economy with seeming indifference to federal tax policy, shrinking during good times and swelling during downturns. The Treasury last saw a huge influx of unexpected revenue in the 1990s, after the Clinton administration and a Democratic Congress raised taxes.

In 2000, the economy was booming and the budget was in surplus when Bush campaigned for president on a promise to cut taxes. The nation then slid into a recession soon after he took office, a downturn exacerbated by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the cost of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and big job losses. Tax revenue plunged, spending rose, and the budget swung into deficit.

The White House successfully pushed tax cuts in 2001 and 2003, partly as remedies for an ailing economy. At the same time, the Federal Reserve slashed interest rates to four-decade lows to spur consumer spending. The economy gradually gained steam, growing at a faster-than-average pace of more than 3 percent in 2004 and 2005. The housing market took off, corporate profits surged, the stock market rebounded and many upper-income Americans pocketed big gains.

Holtz-Eakin and other economists said they can only speculate about why that economic growth generated a disproportionate jump in revenue. There have been changes in the tax code, such as the 2004 expiration of a tax that allowed businesses to immediately deduct half the value of new assets. Economists said corporations chastened by recent accounting scandals may also be paying more taxes on more of their income. And with large and growing incomes going to chief executives, athletes, entertainers, and even star lawyers and academics, those people are paying more taxes.

"The simplest way to think about it, I think, is we know we have growing income inequality, especially at the top," said Isabel V. Sawhill, a Brookings Institution economist who worked for the Clinton administration. "The very rich are pulling away from the ordinary rich and the middle class. Those very rich people pay higher tax rates. When the distribution of income shifts upward, as it has in recent years, you get a revenue kicker from that."

It's A Faith Thing (WSJ)

By Brian S. Wesbury

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

With equity markets steadily gaining ground and the Dow Jones Industrial Average reaching record highs, it is getting harder for cynics and pessimists to argue that the U.S. economy is doing poorly. But this does not stop them from trying. Lately, the old class-warrior standby, that "Wall Street may be doing fine, but Main Street suffers," is echoing down the alleyways.

Fortunately, no matter how many times this theory bounces off the walls, there is little in the way of facts to back it up. The so-called "jobless recovery" was dealt a severe blow when the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) reported that its annual recalibration of employment statistics will add 810,000 jobs to its previously calculated total. This is one of the largest revisions in history, exceeding the combined payrolls of GM, Ford, United and American Airlines.

In an additional blow to those who find things to worry about everywhere, the Treasury released its latest estimate of the budget deficit -- now expected to be $248 billion in FY 2006. Just eight months ago, the CBO guesstimated a $337 billion shortfall and the White House forecast a $423 billion deficit.

While cynicism and pessimism are part of human nature, handwringing based on out-of-date models and inaccurate data is unnecessary. Bad data and bad models are a dangerous combination that can bias political views and impact policy decisions. Recent revisions reflect the problem; the very data that caused so much indigestion previously now reveals a strong and resilient economy.

DOJ_NMG_0082374

The driving force behind the good news is productivity growth fueled by innovation. If the 1980s and 1990s saw the invention and proliferation of new technology, the early 21st century is witnessing its implementation. The impact is immense, and it changes everything. The 2003 tax cuts have also played a major role. Before those tax cuts, the economy, job growth and the stock market were sluggish and stagnant. After them -- because they increased the incentives for risk-taking -- the economy and markets improved dramatically.

Business investment has boomed and nonfinancial corporate sector productivity has grown an annualized 4.3% over the past three years -- its most rapid growth in 45 years. Pre-tax corporate profits have doubled in just five years. Still, fears about growth and geopolitics have kept stocks cheap. A simple capitalized profits model (corporate profits divided by interest rates) suggests that even after recent strength, the broad U.S. equity market is 35% undervalued.

Part of this undervaluation reflects a view that the U.S. economy is fundamentally fragile, especially the consumer sector. But as long as tax rates are low, the economy will do just fine. It's a faith thing. Those who lack faith in free markets fret constantly about weak job growth, problems at old-line manufacturing firms and some signs of weakness in incomes. But this pessimistic view is heavily reliant on the BLS Establishment Survey, which was designed in a paternalistic age of large businesses and time-clock punching. It has difficulty capturing small business employment, the self-employed, independent contractors and many limited liability corporations. As a result, I have argued for at least a decade that it misses a great deal of our New Era Economy.

It is easier than ever to start and manage a new business and harder for the government to track those new businesses. Software programmers can work anywhere, any time. So can those who buy and sell on eBay. Masseuses, manicurists, landscapers, realtors, painters, dry-wallers and many other professions are naturals for small partnerships that avoid paying unemployment insurance, which means they escape the BLS establishment survey.

They do show up in a second BLS jobs survey -- the household survey, which is done in person or over the phone, and asks people, not employers, if they are working. A perfect example of these forces at work surfaced two weeks ago when the assets of Tower Records were sold off, including the flagship store on Hollywood's Sunset Boulevard, putting 3,000 employees out of work. Technology -- in this case, digital music downloading -- is boosting productivity rapidly. This type of creative destruction is both real and widespread. If former Tower Records employees use their intimate knowledge of the music business to make a living on eBay or consult to online music providers, they would disappear from the establishment survey, but remain in the household survey.

During the 12 months ending in September 2006, the household survey reported 2.54 million new jobs. Going back 24 months shows 5.5 million new jobs, an annual average of 2.75 million. This exceeds the booming 1995-2000 average of 2.34 million new jobs per year. The household survey, in contrast with the establishment survey, has consistently signaled a resilient economy. And it continues. In the past two months, the household survey has expanded by 261,000 per month, while the establishment survey rose by an average of just 120,000.

But that's not all. Because the payroll survey is the major source for both average hourly earnings and wage and salary estimates, these measures of income have also underestimated potential consumer strength. But like job growth, recent revisions found $160 billion of personal income that was previously uncounted.

This helps to explain the awesome tidal wave of tax revenues flowing into federal government coffers. Tax revenues grew 12% in 2005 and are up by 11.8% this year. Despite lower tax rates, total federal revenues are $410 billion higher this year than they were at their previous high water mark in 2000.

The problem is on the spending side. Federal government spending this past fiscal year was $907 billion higher than it was in 2000 -- the equivalent of adding both the Australia and Ireland GDPs to annual spending. If ranked, total annual U.S. government outlays of $2.7 trillion in 2006 would be the world's fourth largest GDP: Just below Germany, but 10% larger than China's entire economy. These spending increases make it even more amazing that the U.S. economy has been able to grow at a 3.7% annual average rate in the past three years. While pessimists fret about global competition, they rarely think about the fact that U.S. entrepreneurs must compete while carrying a government larger than China on their backs.

My estimates suggest that every percentage point increase in government spending as a share of GDP subtracts roughly 0.2% from real GDP growth. Between 2000 and 2006, spending jumped from 18.4% of GDP to a 20.3% share, a 1.9% increase. Whether this spending is financed by borrowing or taxation, it still crowds out the private sector and reduces potential real GDP growth by roughly 0.4%.

Nonetheless, tax cuts and productivity growth have overcome the negative impact of this spending splurge. Looking back, despite a dozen Fed rate cuts, the stock market did not bottom until the early months of 2003, when the pro-investment tax cut was finally on its way to passage. Since then, the Dow industrials is up 51%, the S&P 500 63%, and the Nasdaq 80%.

The lesson of all this is that when tax cuts and technology work together to encourage productivity growth, the economy and markets perform well. Massive positive revisions to employment and incomes, rising stock prices and a flood of new tax revenues paint a much different picture than conventional wisdom had expected. But history is clear. As long as government policies do not hinder entrepreneurship, the U.S. economy can overcome even the most daunting of challenges. Have faith.

DOJ_NMG_0082375

Dow Industrials Inch Closer ... Ever Closer (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rallied to another record despite a third straight rise in crude-oil prices and analyst downgrades of two of its component companies.

The blue-chip indicator is less than 20 points shy of its first close above 12000, after pulling within four points of that milestone during yesterday's session. The Dow rose 20.09 points, or 0.2%, to 11980.60, up 11.8% on the year. It was the seventh record close in 10 trading sessions,

Market watchers said, as they have several times recently, that investors seem increasingly confident that third-quarter earnings reports trickling out from companies will show strong profit growth. Two Dow components -- International Business Machines and Intel -- rose ahead of their reports due out today.

Although IBM trades on the New York Stock Exchange, these technology-companies' market gains helped to boost the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index, which gained 0.3%, or 6.55 points, to end at 2363.84. It is up 7.2% on the year and just slightly more than seven points below a 5½-year high.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock Index rose 0.3%, or 3.43 points, to 1369.05, up 9.7% on the year and at a new 5½-year high.

Crude-oil futures for November delivery leapt $1.37, up 2.3%, to $59.94 a barrel, the biggest rise in more than two weeks on the New York Mercantile Exchange. The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries called an emergency meeting Thursday to discuss an output cut. The cartel's members have disagreed in recent days over whether to reduce production by a million barrels a day and, if so, who should shoulder that burden.

On the year, crude prices are off 1.8%.

"A lot of companies have been able to offset energy costs by raising prices," said Chris Meeker, analyst and portfolio manager at asset-management firm Farr, Miller & Washington. "It's certainly a concern that those energy costs could get out of control again. But it's not enough for us to change our thesis," that large companies like those in the Dow and S&P 500 are poised to do well in the months ahead.

Keeping yesterday's stock-market gains in check, shares in Home Depot and General Electric, both Dow components, fell more than 1%. Analysts at Goldman Sachs downgraded Home Depot to a neutral rating from buy, citing concerns over recent management departures. Merrill Lynch analysts made a similar ratings change for General Electric, citing risks to its long-term earnings.

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, rose 0.76%, or 1.70 points, to 224.56.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.3 billion shares, as 2,305 stocks advanced and 1,014 fell.

Bond prices rose. The 10-year note gained 6/32 point, or $1.875 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.784%. The 30-year bond rose 10/32 to yield 4.915%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 119.12 yen, compared with 119.67. The euro rose to $1.2532, compared with $1.2510.

Stock Market Surge May Boost Charities (USAT)

By Sandra Block

USA Today, October 17, 2006

If the stock market sustains its strong performance through the rest of the year, investors won't be the only winners. Charities will likely benefit, too.

Historically, stock market performance has been closely correlated with charitable giving, research by the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University shows. Charitable giving rose sharply in the '90s, then dropped off as the market sank.

“I'm very optimistic for charities this holiday season,” says Trent Stamp, president of Charity Navigator, which rates charities. “I think it could be the biggest year in five to 10 years.”

DOJ_NMG_0082376

Most charitable donations are made near the end of the year. “For the stock market to be going up in advance of people making those year-end decisions — that's a good thing for philanthropy,” says Patrick Rooney, director of research for the Center on Philanthropy.

Even before the most recent run-up in stock prices, charities were bullish about prospects for year-end giving. A survey the center conducted this summer found that most charities expect donations to increase during the second half of the year compared with the same period in 2005.

Nearly 60% of charitable groups reported an increase in giving in 2005, according to the Center on Philanthropy. Contrary to what some had feared, donations to relief groups that helped victims of Hurricane Katrina and the Indonesia tsunami did not lead to a drop-off in contributions to other types of charities last year, Rooney says.

Along with the stock market's performance, Rooney says, continued growth in the economy and stable interest rates are likely to encourage charitable giving. Though housing prices have declined, the center's research shows that home values tend to have a lesser effect on charitable giving, he says.

Other factors contributing to a cheery outlook for charity:

·A rise in contributions of securities. Contributions to the Fidelity Charitable Gift fund, which typically receives about 70% of its donations in the form of appreciated securities, are up 29% year to date compared with the same period in 2005, says David Guinta, president of the fund. When stocks do well, contributions of securities typically rise. Donors can deduct the market value of the shares at the time of the contribution and avoid paying tax on capital gains.

·Online giving. Charities expect online giving to rise significantly during the holiday season, particularly among young donors. Though it still represents just 2% to 3% of overall giving by individuals, online giving is tracking the trend in online shopping and banking, according to Network for Good, an Internet site that lets donors contribute to thousands of charities. While the majority of “offline” donors are in their 60s, the median age of donors who contribute through Network for Good is 38, says Katya Andresen of Network for Good.

The Internet is “bringing in a new group of people who haven't been philanthropic in the past,” Stamp says.

Consumers Face Test As Gas Prices Fall (WSJ)

By Joseph B. White

The Wall Street Journal, October 17, 2006

October is turning into a big month for alternatives to century old gasoline car technology.

Just last week, Toyota Motor Corp. officially launched production of its gas-electric hybrid Toyota Camry sedan at its big factory in Kentucky. Toyota's betting that 60,000 Americans a year will want a $26,200 family car that averages 39 mpg.

The small but vigorous lobby that wants auto makers to put more muscle behind so-called "plug-in" hybrid technology got a symbolic boost when AutoNation Inc., owner of the largest chain of car dealerships in the U.S., issued a call for car companies to build such vehicles, and said it will take orders from customers who want them.

A plug-in hybrid takes the technology of a car like the Toyota Prius to the next level by allowing the driver to operate the car solely on battery power for up to 60 miles. The owner recharges the batteries by plugging the car into a wall socket. A plug-in hybrid can still rely on its gasoline engine for longer trips or if the battery runs out. Advocates say that a hybrid car that allows for a significant amount of all-electric operation can save far more petroleum than a conventional hybrid car which needs to run its gasoline engine often.

But that's not all. Fans of European diesel technology, which enables family cars to average around 40 miles per gallon or more, are cheering because after years of wrangling, regulations requiring refiners in the U.S. to remove 97% of the sulfur previously allowed in on-road diesel fuels finally take effect. Ultra-low sulfur diesel is a prerequisite to various car makers' plans to try to re-launch diesel engines as a mass-market alternative for cars and sport utility vehicles. Several car makers have recently announced plans to add or expand diesel models in the U.S. market over the next three years.

To top it off, President Bush on Thursday used the podium of a Renewable Energy Conference in St. Louis to express his enthusiasm for a wide range of oil-conserving technologies, including corn and cellulosic ethanol, fuel cells, and plug-in hybrids, as well as nuclear power, natural gas and coal. The president explicitly linked reducing oil consumption to protecting national security and economic security.

With all of these developments, you'd think the Green Revolution is right around the corner.

There's just one problem: Gasoline is once again getting cheap, or at least, cheapish. That's great if you drive a long way to work. But if you really want to end what the president has called America's "addiction to oil," it's a problem, as the president himself acknowledged.

DOJ_NMG_0082377

"Look, let me just put it bluntly: We're too dependent on oil," Mr. Bush said, according to a transcript posted on the White House Web site. "…And see, low gasoline prices may mask that concern. So, first, I want to tell you that I welcome the low gasoline prices, however it's not going to dim my enthusiasm for making sure we diversify away from oil. "

Mr. Bush's quandary reflects a much longer term dilemma. The U.S. has been having an argument with itself about automobile fuel efficiency for more than 30 years. Over those decades, the momentum of the argument has shifted from one pole to another. In the 1970s, oil prices spiked and Washington for the first time demanded that auto makers meet certain Corporate Average Fuel Economy standards, commonly known as CAFE. The societal urge to escape the squeeze of Middle Eastern oil producers also brought on the 55 mile-per-hour speed limit, a surge in demand for small Japanese cars and Jimmy Carter's cardigan.

In the later 1980s and 1990s, gasoline prices plunged, and American culture lurched back the other way. Cardigans, Drive 55, and econoboxes were out. Hummers and Explorers were in.

The constant in all of this: An unwavering commitment by the government to cheap gasoline.

So instead of clear signals, there is static. The political rhetoric says, "Keep America Strong! Buy a plug-in hybrid that burns E85 ethanol." But the everyday message sent by prices at the gas pump is, "Aren't you glad that $3 a gallon business is over? Fill 'er up."

Moreover, there is no serious talk right now of substantially raising car and truck fuel economy targets -- the better to force fuel-saving technology into production. And there is no serious discussion of reordering national priorities by say, diverting some of the billions spent on highways to construct high-speed intercity rail links.

The big question is, what signals will consumers heed, and what signals will they send?

The next several months will be a test. Auto industry executives say they believe that a greater number of American consumers now rank fuel economy high on their list of priorities, despite the recent gas price drop.

In September, as gasoline prices eased under $2.50 a gallon in many parts of the country, interest in fuel economy oriented gas-electric hybrid vehicles such as the Honda Civic and Ford Escape and the Toyota Prius remained relatively strong, according to data from the Power Information Network. An Escape hybrid, for example, took 24 days, on average, to move off a dealer's lot in August and September, according to PIN data. That compares to 63 days to sell in March. The Escape had an average $1,305 rebate in August and $568 rebate in September. During the past two months, the Civic and Prius moved after just 10 days and 5 days, respectively, with no rebates.

The few diesel cars on the U.S. market aren't quite as hot as the Civic and Prius hybrids. But the diesel Volkswagen Jetta in September sold in an average of just 18 days, compared to 67 days for the gasoline version, according to PIN data.

Meanwhile, data from Edmunds.com, the big shopping site, indicates that many of the best selling large SUVs are still struggling. The average discount offered on a Dodge Durango in September was over $11,000, or about 30% of sticker price. And the vehicles still are sitting unsold for an average of 182 days.

One car to watch is the Camry hybrid. The hybrid Camry is rated at 39 miles per gallon in combined city/highway driving, compared to an EPA rating of 27 miles per gallon in city/highway driving for a four cylinder Camry with a five speed automatic transmission. The Hybrid Camry has features similar to the four cylinder Camry with the most expensive XLE trim level, which starts at $24,700. That puts the hybrid premium at about $1,500. But if you wanted to be rigorous about it, the cheapest Camry sedan starts at $18,270, and the average Camry sells for about $22,700, according to Power Information Network data. On those terms, the hybrid premium is more like $3,500. Toyota says Camry hybrids purchased after Oct. 1 will qualify for a $1,300 tax credit.

Toyota has publicly defined success as selling 60,000 Camry hybrids a year, or 5,000 a month, which is roughly equivalent to 15% of total U.S. Camry sales. If the Camry misses that target, it could be a sign that President Bush is right to be worried about the resolve of Americans to end oil addiction, just because they should.

Energy Shortage (NYT)

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

President Bush touched a lot of the right bases in a speech in St. Louis that focused on the urgent need for increased efficiency and alternative fuels to address the country's energy problems, including its dependence on imported oil. It would be helpful, though, if he could get his Department of Energy on the same page.

One of the department's most important tasks is to periodically review and improve efficiency standards for appliances and other equipment. The department has always been sluggish in issuing these standards. But under Mr. Bush it has been more passive than ever, failing to issue a single strengthened efficiency standard since he took office. It also tried to roll back strong Clinton-era standards for central air-conditioners. Only a lawsuit filed by New York's Eliot Spitzer, nine other state attorneys general and the Natural Resources Defense Council prevented it from doing so.

DOJ_NMG_0082378

Mr. Spitzer and others also sued the department for violating Congressionally mandated deadlines for revising standards for 22 products. In the wake of that lawsuit, and under new management — Secretary Samuel Bodman took the helm at the end of 2004 — the department has at least begun proposing new standards, most recently for home furnaces and for distribution transformers, the gray cans that hang on electric wires and change the voltage on the grid to household levels.

The bad news is that the proposed standards are not nearly strong enough. The standard for distribution transformers, issued for public comment in August, was so low as to antagonize the industry itself — a rare event. Top executives from 10 major utilities, led by Exelon and New Mexico-based PNM, argued that more efficient transformers would not only save energy and cut pollution from power plants but would save the companies money.

For home furnaces and boilers — big users of oil and natural gas — the department proposes only trivial efficiency increases that would leave consumers with heating bills almost as high as their current ones. The department's reasoning seems to be that the more efficient (but more costly) equipment needed for colder climates could impose an unnecessary financial burden on consumers in warmer climates.

At the same time, however, the department said that it did not have the authority to establish regional standards, and instead invited individual states to set their own standards — an uncertain process at best. From where we sit, it appears that a department that has long retreated from its statutory obligations has done so again.

As Talk Radio Wavers, Bush Moves To Firm Up Support (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 — On an overcast Friday morning last month, White House aides ushered an influential group of conservative radio hosts into the Oval Office for a private audience with the president.

For an hour and a half, Mr. Bush discussed his case for the war in Iraq, his immigration proposals and even the personality of his Scottish terrier Barney, who scratched on the door during the session until the president relented and let him into the office, according to several hosts who attended.

The meeting, which was not announced on the president's public schedule, was part of an intensive Republican Party campaign to reclaim and re-energize a crucial army of supporters that is not as likely to walk in lockstep with the White House as it has in the past.

Conservative radio hosts are breaking with the Republican leadership in ways not seen in at least a decade, and certainly not since Rush Limbaugh's forceful advocacy of the party in 1994 spawned a new generation of stars, said Michael Harrison, publisher of the industry's lead trade publication, Talkers.

Disgruntlement can now be found not only among the more flamboyant radio voices, like Michael Savage, who raged against Mr. Bush's proposals on immigration and other issues, but also among more mainstream hosts, like Laura Ingraham, who told her listeners in the wake of the scandal involving former Representative Mark Foley and under-age Congressional pages, "You have to ask yourself, the people who are in positions of power now in the Republican Party, are they able to credibly articulate the conservative agenda to the American people — to rally the base, to rally the country?"

Such questions, coming from such quarters, have created yet another challenge for the White House and the central party leadership as they work to steer Republicans to victory next month in the face of low approval ratings and dissatisfaction among the party faithful.

Strategists on both sides agree that the party's greatest hope for holding control of Congress now rests with its ability to get core Republicans to vote, and that talk radio, which reaches millions of them, is crucial to the task.

Democratic strategists say talk radio remains a fearsome Republican advocacy force for which they have little direct answer. (Air America, which features liberal hosts, including Al Franken, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy last week.) The top two rated conservative hosts, Mr. Limbaugh and Sean Hannity, have done more than their part to rally their listeners this year, especially during the Foley scandal, to the great relief of Republican Party officials. And even those critical of Mr. Bush or the party on specific issues still consider themselves major supporters in general, with perhaps the exception of Mr. Savage.

But Mr. Savage is the third most popular host in the nation, with at least eight million listeners weekly, according to Talkers. And the Democrats have watched happily as he and others have at times sent reverberations of conservative frustration into what they often call the "Republican echo chamber."

The challenge now falls to party strategists to persuade the hosts to overcome the frustrations of many hard-core listeners over issues like spending and border security without alienating them.

"When conservatives are agitated at the president, radio hosts feel pressured to stand with the conservatives against the president to prove their independence," said Tim Graham, an analyst at the Media Research Center, a conservative news monitoring group. But, Mr. Graham said, "realizing what life would be like if we lost the House is concentrating people's minds."

DOJ_NMG_0082379

The White House and the Republican National Committee are hammering home that point in interviews, talking-point bulletins and a healthy dollop of pomp that only a White House can provide.

The effort will peak on Oct. 24, when the administration will hold something of a talk-radio summit meeting, inviting dozens of hosts to set up booths on the White House grounds, where top cabinet officials are expected to sit for interviews.

The party chairman, Ken Mehlman, has already been working overtime on the talk radio circuit. From Wednesday to Friday of last week, he was interviewed a total of 20 times in Missouri, Tennessee and Ohio, promoting party stances on tax cuts and terrorism.

But, several hosts said, the most telling development so far this year was the White House decision to invite some of the most popular hosts to the Oval Office for off-the-record time with the president.

Kevin Sullivan, the White House communications director, said the meeting was among the latest examples of the administration's effort to put Mr. Bush in front of more news media as his own best spokesman. The president also gave interviews recently to several television anchors and held an Oval Office chat with a group of conservative writers.

And Mr. Bush granted an on-camera interview to Bill O'Reilly of the Fox News Channel. The first of three parts ran Monday night.

Still, officials said, the meeting with the radio hosts gave Mr. Bush a chance to speak intimately with a group that reaches an overwhelmingly Republican audience of 30 million people per week.

"You want to make sure that your friends are friendly," said Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, who has been crucial to the effort and who was a conservative radio host who turned harshly critical of Mr. Bush just months before he went to work for him last spring.

Mr. Snow said that while "any party has its disagreements," there was little division among Republicans on the top two issues Mr. Bush has tried to push this year: terrorism and taxes.

And the fight against terrorism dominated the discussion at the meeting.

"This was clearly, clearly an effort to kind of rally the troops when the troops need rallying," said Mike Gallagher, who attended the meeting and whose daily program reaches at least 3.75 million people each week. "They know that we've got an audience of people who may or may not be on the political fence right now."

Mr. Gallagher said that he and the other hosts — Mr. Hannity, Ms. Ingraham, Neal Boortz and Michael Medved — talked about the experience on their programs "for days and days and days."

(Mr. Limbaugh said that he met with Mr. Bush and Karl Rove, the president's chief strategist, in the Oval Office in June, but generally tried to keep his distance to maintain independence.)

On his Web site, Mr. Medved wrote how Mr. Bush spoke about his commitment to his immigration plan in terms of the fight against terrorism. He said the president made a case that if he were to give in to conservative complaints, "the nation's enemies (and the rest of the world) would take away the belief that the president could be bullied, prodded, overwhelmed and intimidated."

Mr. Hannity said of the meeting, "I think he'd have an 80 percent approval rating if he could bring people into the Oval Office six people at a time and explain it all to them."

But Ms. Ingraham, who recently went bike riding with the president, has continued to complain about federal spending, progress in Iraq and, lately, the Republican leadership's handling of the Foley scandal. Ms. Ingraham likened herself to a sports fan who nonetheless has occasional criticism of the coach. But, she said pointedly on her show: "I am not an advocate for the G.O.P. I'm an advocate for conservative ideas."

Bush's Appearances Revolve Around Core Themes (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's political pitch boils down to two words and one argument.

The words are taxes and terrorism. The argument: Democrats are wrong on both.

Those themes dominate the half-hour stump speech Bush gives on behalf of Republican candidates across the country. Seeking to preserve precarious GOP majorities in Congress, he has delivered nine campaign speeches in October and could give as many as 20 more before the elections Nov. 7.

This week, he will speak at a Republican National Committee dinner in Greensboro, N.C., and on behalf of two embattled GOP incumbents, Rep. Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania and Sen. George Allen of Virginia. Sherwood admitted an extramarital affair last year after his mistress sued him. Allen is in a tight race for a second term with Democrat Jim Webb.

"I like campaigns," Bush said at a fundraiser Oct. 4 for Rep. Rick Renzi, R-Ariz. "It's a good chance to explain the philosophy of the two different parties."

DOJ_NMG_0082380

Like an old song with new verses, Bush's basic text is constantly updated. White House communications director Kevin Sullivan said most of Bush's speech comes from the president's handwritten notes, from an outline he developed.

Before each event, speechwriters provide a list of local dignitaries to be acknowledged, Sullivan said. They also provide an insert on the message of the day that is either tied to the candidate's own history or news events. That could mean talking about a candidate's role in energy or environment legislation, in addition to standard hits on taxes and the war on terrorism.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president's stump speech also carries a "subtext. He's got a plan, and it's not clear the other guys do."

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg said she hears a different message: "They are desperate to scare voters in any way they can." She said the middle class does not feel safe or financially secure because of Bush's policies.

Wayne Fields, author of Union of Words: A History of Presidential Eloquence, noted that Bush is "not a very good speechmaker" who sometimes mangles his syntax. For example: In saluting Colorado secretary of State candidate Mike Coffman, an Iraq war veteran, Bush said, "Proud to have been able to call you commander in chief."

This kind of thing doesn't necessarily hurt Bush, Fields said, because many voters regard him as "an ordinary guy in the way he talks."

What's Behind Bush's Stump Speech (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 17, 2006

Topic

Bush quote

What he's doing

Notable

The introduction

"I'm proud to be here with … (fill in name)" or "It's good to be in (fill in city or state) ..."

— A typical opening line Bush salutes local officeholders and dignitaries, and the cities he visits. If he's going to make a quip to relax the audience, this is where he'll slip it in. At a Sept. 28 event in Alabama, Bush referred to the 6'9" lieutenant governor candidate, Luther Strange, as "a man who will stand tall" for the state.

This is standard political fare. Bush, like most politicians, adjusts to the situation. For example: At an Oct. 12 campaign event in Chicago hosted by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Bush defended the Illinois Republican who is under fire for his handling of lurid communications between former representative Mark Foley and teenage male pages. Hastert is "not one of these Washington politicians who spews a lot of hot air."

The first lady

"Now, I wasn't Dean's first choice. He wisely had put in a request for Laura."

— Oct. 2, for Nevada congressional candidate Dean Heller Most Bush campaign speeches contain a homage to the first lady, including an oft-told line about how he married well. If Laura Bush is not in attendance, he says she sends her regards. This is where he'll thank a candidate's spouse.

Bush isn't entirely joking. Laura Bush's popularity has consistently rated above 60% in polls since 2001, and she is considered one of the president's top political assets. The first lady also stumps on her own for Republican candidates.

The economy

"The issue is (if) the Democrats get control of the Congress, they're going to have their hands on your wallet."

— Oct. 4 for Rep. Bob Beauprez, the GOP candidate for Colorado governor The meat of Bush's stump speeches starts with the economy and a call for more tax cuts. He credits them for the rising stock market and falling unemployment rates. Bush accuses Democrats of wanting to increase taxes, such as this Oct. 10 reference to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.: "She said, 'We love tax cuts.' Given her record, she must be a secret admirer."

Pelosi and other Democrats said they support tax cuts that help the middle class. Pelosi says her party's stance is a "stark contrast" from Bush's "tax breaks for the super-rich that have led to a budget that is grossly out of balance and a national debt that is morally indefensible."

The Iraq war and terrorism

"They talk tough on terror, but when the votes are counted, their softer side comes out."

— Oct. 3, about Democrats during an event for Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif. Bush spotlights Democratic opposition to a variety of anti-terrorism efforts: the Iraq war, expanded law enforcement powers, a warrantless wiretapping program and techniques used by the CIA to interrogate "high-value" terror suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0082381

Democrats such as Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont said the war in Iraq has spawned terrorism. Leahy also said expanded law enforcement authority and warrantless wiretaps spark concerns about civil rights and privacy. Leahy said the bill to be signed today by Bush that establishes rules for CIA interrogation of terror suspects omits "checks against mistreatment of prisoners" that will make it harder to boost the image of the United States around the world.

The last pitch

"If you want people in Washington who are not going to sit back and wait to be attacked again, you make sure you send people like John Doolittle back to the United States Congress."

— Oct. 3, endorsing Doolittle at a California fundraiser As he winds up the terrorism section of his speech, Bush says it's the GOP — and the candidate on stage next to him — that can best keep the nation safe.

Until recently, most polls showed Americans believed the GOP was the party that could best handle issues of national security and terrorism. A new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds respondents believe Democrats are now best suited to deal with terrorism, 46%-41%.

Sources: White House and USA TODAY research. Reported by David Jackson. Graphic by Mark Pearson, USA TODAY

Cheney Hits Heartland, And He Can Feel The Love (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 17, 2006

TOPEKA, Kan., Oct. 12 — Grace Mosier lives with her mom and dad, goes to birthday parties, takes ballet classes and is just like a lot of other 6-year-old girls. Except that she happens to be obsessed with Dick Cheney.

"I really, really like him," says Grace, who can tell you what state the vice president was born in (Nebraska), where he went to grade school (College View, in Lincoln) and the names of his dogs (Dave and Jackson). She gets her fix of Cheney fun-facts by visiting the White House Web site for children. It says there that his favorite teacher was Miss Duffield and that he used to run a company called Halliburton.

So when Mr. Cheney came to town Thursday, Grace was at Forbes Field, holding a little American flag and a sign that said, "Welcome, Mr. Vice President, pet Dave and Jackson for me." She watched him get off Air Force Two, step into a car and speed off to a fund-raiser.

"Like a rock star coming to town," says Dene Mosier, Grace's mother. And while Mr. Cheney might be an unusual object for a 6-year-old's fixation, it is probably less unusual here, in the heart of Cheney Country.

The terrain consists of hotel ballrooms, military bases and private homes deep in the reddest of red states like Kansas (where President Bush and Mr. Cheney won by 25 percentage points in 2004). As a rule, people still love Mr. Bush in Cheney Country, at least relative to some locales. But the president cannot be everywhere, so Mr. Cheney comes instead, exposing as he goes the durability and devotion of his party's base.

He is dispatched around the country — to Topeka last week, to Casper, Wyo., the week before, and to Wyoming, Mich., the week before that — to preside over events largely ignored by the national news media but covered big-time by the local press. He raises a lot of cash for the Republican Party and its candidates — more than $40 million at 114 events since January 2005, many of them in off-Broadway political settings like Topeka.

And he reaps a full helping of love.

"How about a big Kansas welcome for Vice President Dick Cheney?" Representative Jim Ryun, a five-term Republican, says at a lunchtime fund-raiser on Thursday.

And a big Kansas welcome he gets: cheers, sustained applause, even some war whoops — yes, war whoops. Loving ones.

"Well, that warm welcome is almost enough to make me want to run for office again," the vice president responds. "Almost."

Mr. Cheney's favorability ratings might be in an underground bunker, somewhere beneath the president's (at 20 percent in the most recent New York Times poll). Critics deride him as a Prince of Darkness whose occasional odd episodes — swearing at a United States senator, shooting a friend in a hunting accident and then barely acknowledging it publicly — suggest a striking indifference to how he is perceived. Even admirers who laud his intellect and steadiness rarely mention anything about his electrifying rooms or people.

But then there are people like these, at the Capitol Plaza Hotel Manor Conference Center in Topeka.

"It's just such a big thrill to see and hear this man," says Marvin Smith, a farmer and former teacher.

Mr. Smith says most people he knows feel the same way, "except for a few of those peacemakers." He means protesters, a smattering of whom are picketing down the street.

"We love him here," Susan Wagle, a state senator, says of Mr. Cheney.

DOJ_NMG_0082382

After a sustained and rollicking ovation that inspires a rare smile with both sides of his mouth, Mr. Cheney starts into a variant of the same talk he has delivered literally hundreds of times. He tells how the first vice president, John Adams, enjoyed Senate floor privileges until they were revoked. (Mr. Cheney has told this story at least 48 times in official remarks since 2001, according to the White House's Web site.)

He skips the bit about how he had been the lone congressman from Wyoming — "It was a small delegation, but it was quality," which he has told at least 67 times as vice president.

He offers his standard homage to tax cuts, a warning about how terrorists are still trying desperately "to cause mass death here in the United States" and a derisive cataloging of the various "Dean Democrats," congressmen including Charles B. Rangel of New York, Henry A. Waxman of California and Barney Frank of Massachusetts, whose influence would grow if the apocalypse came and Democrats took over Congress.

The crowd boos.

"Don't hold back," Mr. Cheney urges.

The crowd laughs.

The lights over Mr. Cheney's head keep getting dimmer and then brighter, the kind of inexplicable distraction that can get an advance person fired but that also adds sizzle to the floor show. (There were no audible requests for Mr. Cheney to crowd-surf, shed his tie or perform "Free Bird.")

None of the Cheneyphiles here are mentioning Mark Foley, the former Republican congressman at the center of the House page scandal, or the precarious hold Republicans might have on Congress or, for the most part, the problems in Iraq. Nor is anyone mentioning Mr. Cheney's unpopularity in the polls, except in terms of all the unfair attacks from Democrats and the "liberal media."

"They throw so much trash at him, it's just unbelievable," says Morris Thomason, a rancher who lives in Belvidere, Kan., but who grew up in Casper, Wyo., Cheney's boyhood home. He spent his formative years with Dick Cheney himself.

Young Dick even came to his 13th birthday party, Mr. Thomason recalls, and gave him a bunch of stamps and a book. They water-skied together in an irrigation canal near Casper.

He has not spoken to Mr. Cheney since the latter was secretary of defense in the first Bush administration, or, Mr. Thomason says, maybe it was when he was chief of staff under President Gerald R. Ford. He will not be seeing him today, either, at least up close, because that would require a $1,000 contribution for the photo op, and Mr. Thomason's $100 ticket is only for the speech.

Mr. Cheney starts his 20-minute talk early and then is off to tour a barge factory in New Orleans and to speak at another fund-raiser.

"There was a peacefulness and a truthfulness to this man that really caught my heart," says the congressman's wife, Anne Ryun, who is clutching a Bush-Cheney placard from the 2000 campaign that the vice president has just autographed.

Ms. Ryun had spoken briefly to Mr. Cheney and says she had told him she was praying for him. She adds that his wife, Lynne, "is the most gracious, intelligent woman I've ever known of," and that she wants to model her life after her. Recounting this, Ms. Ryun's voice goes soft, and her eyes become a little glassy.

While Mr. Cheney spoke, 6-year-old Grace stayed behind at the airport and scored a private tour of Air Force Two. The Secret Service agents were impressed with her Cheney knowledge and admitted that it exceeded their own. She got her picture in the paper, made the local newscasts and became quite a sensation in her own right on the day Dick Cheney came to town, and it was a big deal.

Backstory: 14 Hours, Really, With Dick Cheney (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 17, 2006

ABOARD AIR FORCE TWO

The running joke among White House correspondents is that the most glamorous part of our job is ... telling people you cover the White House.

In fact, as much as reporters like to complain about life in the much-maligned White House press corps, it has its moments - careening around in motorcades with no regard for red lights, quips from President Bush about one's wardrobe, the tiny lamb chops at the White House Christmas party.

But what about covering the No. 2 man, Dick Cheney, widely seen as the most powerful vice president in history? After all, he is better known for being sequestered in undisclosed locations than for chatting up journalists.

DOJ_NMG_0082383

Then the invitation came: Would I like to spend a day flying around the country - well, actually, from Washington to Topeka to New Orleans, then back to Washington - as the "pool" reporter with Vice President Cheney? My job would be to go where I was told and file to my fellow reporters summaries of the vice president's actions and any color I felt like throwing in. I accepted.

On the appointed day, last Thursday, I arrived at Andrews Air Force Base, just outside D.C. in Maryland, at 7:30 a.m., whereupon I was asked to open all the doors, hood, and trunk of my car for an inspection by a military dog. I passed. Then it was on to the terminal, where I was met by Jamie, a friendly young press aide in the vice president's office. Two other reporters, Mike Allen of Time magazine and Brendan Murray of Bloomberg, joined us.

Soon we were boarding Air Force Two, a Boeing 757 modified for vice presidential needs, such as secure communication and a private section at the front with a large vice presidential seal on the door. Most of us flying that day - press, flight attendants, Secret Service, military, other aides - boarded via a stairway into the back of the plane. After we journalists had been shown our seats (coach size, while most of the other seats are business-class size), we were invited to go back outside and watch Mr. Cheney exit his helicopter, Marine Two, and board Air Force Two via a separate staircase into the front of the plane. Cheney and several additional aides boarded; we were airborne in minutes.

"Wheels up 9:25," I wrote in the pool report. "TVs set to Fox. Flight time to Topeka 2-1/2 hours."

Then they fed us: western omelets with salsa, hash browns, bacon, plain bagels with cream cheese, yogurt and granola parfaits with blueberries and strawberries. And that was after a fruit basket had been passed around. White House travel is known for its plentiful meals and snacks, and I had wisely skipped breakfast at home. (The Monitor will get a considerable bill for the flights and meals later.)

Next up, getting down to business. Lea Anne McBride, Cheney's communications director, came back to talk to the reporters about the speech the vice president would be delivering in Topeka at a fundraiser for Rep. Jim Ryun (R). Cheney was still putting finishing touches on his remarks, but he would focus on the economy and security, with an emphasis on "consequence," she said. The meaning of that last part soon became clear when we received an advance copy of the text: what to expect if the Democrats take control of Congress.

The speech was classic Cheney - red meat for core Republican voters at a time when anxiety is high over the GOP-led Congress's poor public image, the Iraq war, and scandals. Congressman Ryun appears in no danger of losing his seat, but no one's taking any chances.

"If the Democrats take control, American families would face an immense tax increase, and the economy would sustain a major hit," Cheney told the crowd.

If the Democrats were already in control, he warned, the USA Patriot Act, warrantless wiretapping - a program the White House calls the Terrorist Surveillance Program - and the program of detention and military trials would be in jeopardy.

Cheney named names - not just the top Democrats who would lead both houses if their party wins majorities, Nancy Pelosi in the House and Harry Reid in the Senate - but also probable committee chairs.

"I don't need to tell you what kind of legislation would come to us by way of committee chairmen like Joe Biden, Ted Kennedy, John Conyers, Henry Waxman, Barney Frank, or Jay Rockefeller," he said, eliciting boos and then laughter.

It was his 113th campaign appearance in the current two-year election cycle. The event raised $215,000 for Ryun, boosting Cheney's total fundraising for Republican candidates and committees since March 2005 to $40 million.

Speech over, time to sprint to the motorcade, as Cheney was whisked out of the room. Wheels up at 1:15 p.m. central time. On to New Orleans for Cheney's first visit since September 2005, right after hurricane Katrina.

En route, we were fed garden salads with spicy chicken strips and the world's densest brownies. (I wondered if Cheney was eating the same thing, but such detail is not observable. He never emerged from his private cabin during all our time on AF2.) Before long, we landed in New Orleans, where a blast of hot air hit us as we deplaned. We weren't in Kansas anymore.

On the agenda was a visit to the port and a tour of a tugboat owned by the Canal Barge Company, an example of a New Orleans business that is fully back in operation post-Katrina. Reporters were allowed to jam into the wheelhouse and watch the veep get a tour from the captain - but "don't crowd the vice president," a press aide warned.

Cheney then received a private briefing from the Army Corps of Engineers, after which reporters were treated to what the schedule called a "pool spray" - remarks by Cheney to the press, but no questions. Then it was time for more fundraising. While Cheney went off to a reception for the Republican National Committee (total take $180,000) the press was briefed by Don Powell, federal coordinator of Gulf Coast rebuilding. Briefing over, I had about 10 minutes of "filing time" to submit my second pool report, about enough time to get the computer set up, then packed up to leave. Then it was back to the motorcade, back to the airport, and back to Washington. Jambalaya, corn bread, and cupcakes were on the menu, soon followed by Dove bars (but who could possibly have room?) Wheels down at 9:30 p.m. Eastern time, a half-hour early.

Fabulous, I thought. I can get home in time to tell my kids to go to bed. I start out from Andrews in my '92 Toyota Camry, along with Mike Allen, who is hitching a ride with me back to D.C. After several miles, I sense trouble. The battery light comes on, and I know what's happening: My car is losing power. It dies in a tunnel on Route 295. Long story short, the tow truck arrives at midnight, and Mike, my guardian angel, flags us a cab.

It was a surreal ending to a day of adventure. I'm still not sure if I would describe flying around the country with the vice president as glamorous, but compared with breaking down in a tunnel underneath the Capitol and having to wait two hours for a tow truck, the answer is, absolutely!

Report Indicates Democrats Out-raising In Key House Races (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic candidates out-raised their Republican opponents in nearly half of 27 tossup races for the House from July through September, new campaign finance reports show.

Most of the GOP candidates — 19 — had more cash on hand as of Sept. 30. And as of last week, the Republican Party and its allies were spending more heavily in the 27 districts.

Still, independent analysts called the Democratic surge unusual and said it suggests momentum for Democrats going into the final weeks of the campaign.

"Most of the time the late money follows the winner, and the winner is mostly the incumbent," said Stuart Rothenberg, who ranked the 27 races in his Rothenberg Political Report. This year, "the smell of Democratic victory is in the air."

Six Democrats seeking open seats now held by Republicans in Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota and New York raised more money in the third quarter than their opponents. Another six challengers — four in Pennsylvania and one each in North Carolina and Indiana — also pulled in more than their opponents.

Democrats need to add 15 new seats to win a majority and control of the chamber. Republicans are pouring money into dozens of races to keep that from happening.

The National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) has spent $28 million helping candidates in Rothenberg's 27 tossup districts, according to Federal Election Commission reports. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) by contrast has spent $13.8 million.

Data from the non-partisan Campaign Media Analysis Group show a similar imbalance. As of last week, Republican Party committees and their allies had spent at least $16.5 million on TV in the 27 districts. Their Democratic counterparts had spent $10.6 million.

TV spending by the GOP committees and groups had totaled more than $1 million in three tossup districts. The aim was to defend Reps. Jim Gerlach of Pennsylvania and Mike Sodrel of Indiana and help Ohio's Joy Padgett succeed Rep. Bob Ney, who pleaded guilty last week in connection with the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Anthony Corrado, a campaign-finance expert at Colby College, said the large GOP TV buys indicate "they see their candidates as behind." He said it's unclear whether the heavy spending will do any good: "If the message isn't getting through and moving the poll numbers, the fact that you're spending more money doesn't matter."

NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the GOP ad campaigns have been effective and cash on hand is the best predictor of success. "It's what you have available to spend in October that's key," he said.

DCCC spokesman Bill Burton said there would be spending parity up to Election Day and said no amount of money could save some GOP seats. "Some people are so tied to the status quo in Washington that they will not be able to spend their way to victory," he said.

In Close House Races, GOP Incumbents Hold Advantage In Funds (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 17, 2006

Despite a rush of campaign donations to Democrats earlier this year, Republican incumbents in highly competitive races in the House have a substantial cash advantage going into the final weeks before the midterm elections.

Democrats spent more heavily over the summer and early autumn than their Republican rivals in pivotal House districts, leaving themselves at a disadvantage of more than 2 to 1 in money on hand, according to a Washington Post analysis of the latest campaign disclosures.

"What this means is that Republicans have the wherewithal to slow down the tide that's been running against them this year," said Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute, which tracks election funding.

To capture control of the House on Nov. 7, Democrats need to gain 15 seats. Analysts in both parties acknowledge that Republicans are virtually certain to lose at least a handful of seats. But whether that number falls short or surpasses the 15-seat threshold, they agree, could hinge on campaign fundamentals such as the amount of money available to candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0082385

At the same time, Democrats are on a better financial footing in open seats -- those in which an incumbent is not running. Of the 12 open House races considered tight, Republicans have more cash on hand in seven of them and Democrats are ahead in five, the Post analysis shows.

Election experts noted that funds raised by candidates are only part of the overall picture. This year, in particular, outside groups and the parties have been spending heavily in districts considered up for grabs.

But the cash in candidates' coffers is a significant factor in congressional contests, said Kent Cooper, co-founder of PoliticalMoneyLine.com, a campaign finance Web site. "It's also the best sign we have now" about which candidates hold an edge as the elections near, he said.

The Cook Political Report, a nonpartisan newsletter about elections, identifies 31 House Republicans in closely contested campaigns. According to their financial reports filed over the weekend, they had a total of $32.7 million in cash on hand as of Sept. 30, compared with $14.5 million for their Democratic challengers.

The National Republican Congressional Committee circulated an internal memo yesterday -- which a Republican gave to The Post -- noting that GOP candidates hold an average cash advantage of $450,000 in 25 of the most competitive districts.

In most years, this is not unusual. "Incumbents almost always outraise the challengers," said Anthony J. Corrado, a campaign finance expert at Colby College. But in recent congressional elections, incumbents generally outpaced challengers by more than 2 to 1.

What is notable this year, Corrado said, is that Democratic challengers have enough money to stage full-fledged efforts, and that is one reason the election appears to be so close. "Although they haven't matched the incumbents," he said, "challengers are raising the amounts of money that they need to be competitive."

In Kentucky's 3rd Congressional District, Democrat John Yarmuth has a third of the cash available to five-term incumbent Anne Northup (R), who reported $1.5 million in her latest filing.

"We knew that we were never going to have as much money as a 10-year incumbent," said Jason Burke, Yarmuth's campaign manager. Still, he said, the Yarmuth campaign has enough to advertise intensively through Election Day.

Northup's campaign said her cash advantage amounts to a powerful wall against Yarmuth's candidacy.

"Especially in a media market like Louisville, it's quite expensive to get your message out," said Patrick Neely, Northup's campaign manager. "Having a 3 to 1 financial advantage clearly better enables you to drive your message out, to get your voters to the polls, and to do all the things you need to do to win on Election Day."

The NRCC memo also noted that Republican Peter Roskam has an almost 7 to 1 cash advantage over Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth (D) in Illinois's 6th District, and that Republican Reps. Geoff Davis (Ky.) and E. Clay Shaw Jr. (Fla.) enjoy advantages of about 4 to 1 over their challengers.

The memo played down the cash disadvantages of two Republicans -- Mike Whalen in Iowa and Rep. Charles H. Taylor in North Carolina -- because they are millionaires who can fund their campaigns.

What's more, in Ohio's 18th District, where Rep. Robert W. Ney (R) is stepping down after his guilty plea in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, Republican Joy Padgett has more cash on hand than Democrat Zack Space -- $258,000 to $146,000.

Still, some Democrats in tough contests are financially outrunning GOP incumbents who are not self-funding. As of Sept. 30, Brad Ellsworth had about 50 percent more money at the ready than Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.), and Joseph A. Sestak Jr. had about 38 percent more cash than Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.).

In the 12 open-seat races that the Cook Political Report labels as close, Democrats had $5.7 million on hand and Republicans had $4.4 million.

The parties are scheduled to release their financial reports at the end of the week. At summer's end, the Republican and Democratic House campaign committees had similar amounts in the bank -- $36 million for the GOP committee and $34.9 million for the Democrats'. The Republican National Committee held an edge of nearly 4 to 1 over the Democratic National Committee in cash on hand -- $39.3 million to $10.9 million, as of Aug. 30.

That disparity at the national committee level -- if it remains about the same -- would give the GOP an additional benefit in the closing days of the campaign.

But Democrats are hoping that the national political environment, which has been hostile to the GOP lately, will mean that they will not need to raise comparable sums to be in the running this fall.

"It's not about total dollars," said Stu Rothenberg, author of a respected political newsletter, the Rothenberg Political Report. "In a wave election like this one, money isn't as important as mood and momentum -- as long as the challenger has enough money to be relevant."

Democrats are hoping such intangibles will hold sway.

DOJ_NMG_0082386

"Everyone knew the GOP would be well funded," said Bill Burton, spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "The question is how big does the Republican cash advantage have to be in order to convince voters that they somehow, all of a sudden, actually want to hold on to the status quo in Washington?"

Committee TV Spending Rises (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

Faced with a national political headwind that could produce devastating losses, House Republicans are largely continuing to spend resources to boost the more than two dozen incumbents who appear more vulnerable by the day instead of diverting funds to second- and third-tier races that now look more promising for Democrats.

Committee spending patterns likely will change in the next few days as the final House playing field settles and the two parties continue to play a game of chicken over which races they're prioritizing.

The National Republican Congressional Committee spent $9 million in independent expenditures on Friday — the largest one-day total for the committee this cycle — bringing the total number of races where the committee has invested at least $1 million for the general election to 18.

The NRCC has spent close to $1 million in at least two other contests, and all but one of these 20 seats are currently held by the GOP.

House Democrats, meanwhile, had spent more than $1 million in just three races as of Friday.

While the political committees continue to chart their spending strategy for the final three weeks of the election, newly released Federal Election Commission reports suggest that House Republican candidates in two dozen competitive races find themselves in generally better shape financially than their Democratic opponents.

But the opposite appears to be true in most of the closely watched Senate races of the cycle — where endangered GOP incumbents are lagging behind their challengers on the fundraising front.

House Republicans' biggest investment so far — not counting the special election earlier this year in California's 50th district — has been in Ohio's open 18th district seat, where the NRCC had spent $2.35 million as of Friday to defend the district being vacated by Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), an admitted felon. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had spent almost $900,000 on the race by that same point.

The NRCC had spent $2.24 million on the effort to re-elect Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) as of Friday, making his 6th district race the second-most expensive for the committee.

As of the end of last week, the NRCC had spent more than $7.2 million on four races involving GOP incumbents in Pennsylvania. The committee has spent close to $3 million on three GOP-held seats in Connecticut and $3.4 million defending three Indiana seats.

The NRCC's outlay Friday included more than $5.58 million for ad buys in 12 districts.

While most of the NRCC's ad dollars went to top races in Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Indiana, the committee also spent $350,000 on continuing a media buy to boost the re-election efforts of Rep. J.D. Hayworth (Ariz.), a six-term incumbent whom GOP strategists have portrayed as on solid ground when it comes to his re-election prospects.

The NRCC also spent $571,000 and $311,000 on behalf of Reps. Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.) and Nancy Johnson (Conn.), respectively, two Members who have looked less vulnerable than their home-state colleagues for months. Fitzpatrick was outraised by his opponent, Iraq War veteran Patrick Murphy (D), in the third quarter and had less cash in the bank than the Democrat did on Sept. 30.

NRCC Communications Director Carl Forti said the committee has not deviated much from the ad time it reserved earlier this year.

"We're basically just implementing the plan that we reserved back in August," he said.

In recent weeks the NRCC has added money to Iowa's 1st district open seat race, while the party is not spending money to save GOP-held open seats in Arizona's 8th district or Colorado's 7th district.

The NRCC has pulled back reserved ad time in Democratic-held districts in Texas, West Virginia, South Carolina and Ohio, all of which have been viewed as longer-shot opportunities for the GOP.

Meanwhile, Democrats have pulled reserved ad time in Colorado, where a competitive challenge to Rep. John Salazar (D) never materialized and Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R) is facing a much more difficult re-election than once expected.

The NRCC has spent close to $1 million to defend Musgrave thus far, while the DCCC has spent just $92,000. But an outside group recently announced an effort to pour at least $720,000 into defeating the sophomore lawmaker and will spend at least $600,000 on TV ads alone.

President Bush won 58 percent in Musgrave's 4th district in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0082387

But the latest example of GOP worries about holding onto traditionally staunchly Republican seats was manifested in a new ad buy this week in Idaho's 1st district, where according to a Democratic source, the NRCC just bought three weeks' worth of TV time to defend an open seat that seemed safely in Republican hands.

Democrats have yet to tip their hand about which second- and third-tier races they might be willing to redirect money to in an effort to force Republicans to spend on them, too.

"We haven't really seen them pop up in anywhere new," Forti said.

But some Republicans concede that Democrats may not have to invest heavily in other districts.

One GOP consultant familiar with fresh polling conducted last week said it showed Republicans in districts across the country in the worst shape yet this cycle.

"If it doesn't get any better than it was last week, it's going to be a bloodbath," the consultant said. "We'll see if it gets worse, or stays the same or gets better."

The DCCC has outspent Republicans in IEs in a handful of competitive contests. The largest disparity has been in Connecticut's 4th district, where Rep. Christopher Shays (R) is battling for re-election against Westport Selectwoman Diane Farrell (D). The NRCC had spent $777,000 while the DCCC had spent a little more than $1 million through Friday.

Republicans have outspent Democrats, however, in the 2nd district of Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.), and both parties have spent comparable amounts in Johnson's contest against state Sen. Chris Murphy (D).

Democrats have also spent more in Indiana's 2nd district, where they are working to defeat Rep. Chris Chocola, and in Kentucky's 4th district, where Rep. Geoff Davis (R) faces a challenge from former Rep. Ken Lucas (D).

National Republicans are no longer spending money on behalf of Chocola, who is personally wealthy.

Meanwhile, both parties are continuing to spend in Indiana's 8th district — which has turned into a marathon spending fight even as Rep. John Hostettler (R-Ind.) continues to appear headed for defeat based on public polling.

The two committees have spent almost $3 million combined on the 8th district race, and one party isn't likely to stop unless the other one does.

In several contests other than Colorado's 4th district, there has been great disparity in party committee spending to this point.

Republicans have spent heavily on the open seat race in Minnesota's 6th district. The NRCC had spent close to $1.5 million on the race as of Friday, while the DCCC had yet to report spending a dime. Democrats, however, are expected to go up on TV airwaves today on behalf of child safety advocate Patty Wetterling (D).

Also, the GOP has spent more than $1.2 million defending the open 6th district seat in Illinois, while the DCCC has spent less than $200,000, but a new ad buy is scheduled to begin this week.

In Georgia, the two committees appear to be spending inversely.

Republicans view the 8th district of Rep. Jim Marshall (D) as the better pickup opportunity, as evidenced by the NRCC's $454,000 investment as of Friday. The DCCC, meanwhile, has spent just $40,000 on the contest.

In Georgia's 12th district, the DCCC has spent $291,000 while the NRCC has spent less than $25,000.

The DCCC is not spending IE money in North Carolina's 11th district because Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.) has donated $1.6 million in personal funds to his campaign. Thus, the "Millionaires' Amendment" allows the committee to spend unlimited coordinated expenditures on behalf of former NFL quarterback Heath Shuler (D). The NRCC spent $876,000 there through Friday.

While local and national dynamics continue to play out in myriad ways in the two dozen House races currently rated tossups by Roll Call, the Republicans have a distinct financial advantage in many of them.

In the race to replace Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) in a suburban Chicago district, state Sen. Peter Roskam (R) had an almost 8-1 cash on hand advantage over Iraq War veteran Tammy Duckworth (D) as of Sept. 30. But Duckworth outraised Roskam by almost $400,000 from July 1 to Sept. 30, and seems to have bought the bulk of her TV time for the remainder of her campaign by the end of the quarter.

Several vulnerable House Republicans had cash-on-hand advantages of at least 4-1 over their Democratic challengers, including Reps. Steve Chabot (Ohio), Thelma Drake (Va.), Rob Simmons (Conn.), Geoff Davis (Ky.) and Clay Shaw (Fla.).

But Democrats were more enthusiastic about their financial standing in Pennsylvania's 7th district, where retired Navy Adm. Joe Sestak continues to outperform Rep. Curt Weldon (R), and in Minnesota's 6th district, where child safety advocate Patty Wetterling raised an impressive $1.3 million in three months and banked just shy of $1 million.

And in Senate races, several Democratic challengers were doing better than the Republican incumbents.

In Missouri, state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) raised $3 million in the previous quarter, while Sen. Jim Talent (R) took in $1.9 million. In Virginia, former Navy Secretary Jim Webb (D) outraised Sen. George Allen (R) by almost $1 million. In Pennsylvania, state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D) outraised Sen. Rick Santorum (R) and passed the incumbent in cash on hand.

DOJ_NMG_0082388

Democratic challengers also outraised incumbents in Rhode Island, Ohio and Montana.

Why Your Vote Doesn't Matter As Much (USAT)

By Ross Baker

USA Today, October 17, 2006

In 1811, Elbridge Gerry, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was serving as governor of Massachusetts as a member of the Democratic-Republican (later the Democratic) Party, which also held the majority in his state's Legislature. Determined to limit the influence of the rival Federalist Party, the Democratic-Republicans in the assembly adopted a new map of Massachusetts' congressional districts after the 1810 Census, a bill that Gerry duly signed.

One district was so bizarrely configured that Gilbert Stuart, the renowned American portraitist, added a few strokes to the outlines of the district on the map so that it resembled a huge clawed amphibian. He showed his changes to the editor of a Boston newspaper and told him, "That will do for a salamander."

The editor retorted, "Call it a gerrymander."

The name stuck, and so did the practice of drawing the boundaries of House districts for the political advantage of one party or the other. It is this venerable bit of political chicanery that will bolster incumbents of both parties and probably limit Democratic gains in the upcoming midterm elections that have historically favored the party out of power. Worse, it places in the hands of a tiny minority of voters in a handful of congressional districts the responsibility for indicating, with their ballots, the direction of the nation over the next two years.

In the past, midterm elections have meant trouble for the president's party, especially for those that took place during inconclusive or stalemated wars such as the present conflict in Iraq. Back in 1918 and up until 1950, wartime presidents who could not hold out to voters the key to military victory have seen their party's numbers in Congress plummet. Even in the absence of conflict, these elections have served as a kind of referendum on presidential performance between presidential elections.

In the most recent midterm elections, however, the political auguries have been tougher to read. In 1998, Bill Clinton's Democrats actually gained a few seats, as did George W. Bush's GOP in 2002. The once-powerful referendum effect of midterm elections in which the president's party pays dearly for its shortcomings has given way to minuscule losses and trifling gains that can be interpreted many ways.

One cause of this deflation in turnover in House seats is the ancient art of gerrymandering and the enormous advantage it confers, mostly on incumbent members. So even if a majority of voters in the Pennsylvania district of Rep. John Murtha, an outspoken anti-war Democrat, were to oppose his plan for withdrawal from Iraq, it is doubtful that he would suffer defeat.

If gerrymandering has been around for such a long time, why are its most extreme effects being felt only now? Three reasons:

·Mapping. The art of cramming friendly voters into the district of a member of Congress and producing for him or her a guaranteed safe margin of victory through the use of ingenious computer-mapping programs has become the new political alchemy.

·Connecting. The mapping of districts, by itself, would probably be enough to hold down the loss rate among sitting House members. But these incumbents have also become so skillful at connecting to their constituents that even though voters hold in contempt Congress as an institution, they rarely reject their own representatives.

·Cultivating. The incumbents are also helped by the fact that House members do a good job of cultivating the state legislators who draw the boundaries and are supreme in their fundraising abilities.

A few months ago, Democrats were beguiled by the iridescent dream that the elections of 2006 would be a rerun of the 1994 GOP landslide, except this time, the result would favor them. But 1994 was an exceptional year because of the large number of open seats. Almost one-quarter of all House seats were up for grabs, including several vacated by House members who decided to retire. A large number of these were conservative Democrats whose districts easily fell into Republican hands, thus accounting for the 54-seat Democratic loss to the GOP.

This year, there is no mass departure, and many experts put the number of competitive seats (those that either party has an equal chance of winning) at no more than 40 of the 435 seats in the House.

Scientific gerrymandering, and the astute use of other advantages that accrue to incumbents, have resulted in an electoral sea wall around the House of Representatives that can withstand all but the most powerful political tsunamis.

This year, it appears that only the gentlest tides will be lapping against this redoubt, and even though Democrats need only a 15-seat gain to recapture the House, such a narrow majority would carry no mandate.

These contests, moreover, have evolved into meaningless ratification of incumbents in the vast majority of districts.

DOJ_NMG_0082389

With further refinements in computer mapping, there is every reason to believe that the battleground will shrink still further and that control of the House and the indicative value of House elections will be the privilege of a minuscule percentage of the American electorate.

Handicapping Long Shots And Late Shots (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, October 17, 2006

If you make your living as a political analyst and handicapper (and the odds are very good that you don't), you're facing an interesting dilemma right about now. Do you add every possible House upset race that you can think of to your list of competitive races, or do you keep your list as small as possible, listing only those races that you truly believe might flip in November?

If you add longer-shot races to your list, you minimize the chance that you "miss" a race that changes party control. That's good, since it's always better to look brilliant than appear even a little clueless. But if you do that, you also give credence to long-shot candidates who probably won't flip a seat. And worse, you flirt with intellectual dishonesty.

In the past, I invariably added races about which I was skeptical, preferring to have too many races on my list rather than not enough.

This year, with a Democratic wave brewing, the handicapping problem is particularly acute. Given that waves are inherently unpredictable and likely to sweep in at least one or two candidates who should have no chance of winning — look no further than Republican Steve Stockman, who toppled House Judiciary Chairman Jack Brooks (D-Texas) in 1994 — I'm tempted to add anyone who could possibly ride a wave to victory. It's the easy way out, and I've always taken that route in the past.

But I've decided that I won't do it this year — at least not yet. I won't add Reps. Scott Garrett (R) in New Jersey's 5th district, Mark Souder (R) in Indiana's 3rd, Jim Ryun (R) in Kansas' 2nd, Cathy McMorris (R) in Washington's 5th or other potentially threatened Republicans just because their Democratic opponents have an allegedly encouraging poll or are up with TV ads. While I can't completely rule out the possibility that some or all of them could drown in a Democratic tsunami, I believe the chances are so small that I can't bring myself to put them on a list of endangered incumbents. As I said, at least not yet.

Take Garrett. His opponent, Paul Aronsohn, distributed a polling memo, based on an initial March survey and a late-September poll, that alleged his race against Garrett was "tightening up" and that a Democratic victory was "very possible."

But New Jersey's 5th district, represented by Garrett, is a Republican-leaning district that gave President Bush 57 percent of the vote in 2004. In 2002, Garrett drew almost 60 percent in an open-seat victory against a credible Democrat who outspent him, and two years later he won re-election with almost 59 percent.

Aronsohn's own polling shows the Republican generic vote advantage has been cut in half, but it still stands at 7 points — a significant edge. Then there is the trial heat, which shows Garrett's 25-point advantage in March having closed to 16 points in late September. But those surveys also show that Garrett's share of the ballot test has remained unchanged at 49 percent of the vote.

Even though the Republican "generic" number has slipped, and even though the "wrong track" number and President Bush's job approval rating have eroded, Garrett's trial heat number has remained the same, just a whisker under the 50 percent mark.

Sure, the ballot test in the poll has tightened, but only because some of the undecided voters went over to Aronsohn, whose share of the vote went from an anemic 24 percent in March to an only somewhat less anemic 33 percent at the end of September.

I can't say with absolute certainty that Aronsohn can't, or won't, beat Garrett next month, only that the chances seem so small that rating the race as competitive seems misleading. If, barring other evidence of an Aronsohn surge before Election Day, the Democrat does win, it will be a jaw-dropping upset, and I won't mind missing it.

The situation is a bit different, but only a bit, in Colorado's 5th district, where a media poll shows a dead heat between Democrat Jay Fawcett and Republican Doug Lamborn for the open seat of retiring GOP Rep. Joel Hefley.

